One of Cicero's greatest axioms is, Friendship is the only thing in the world concerning the usefulness of which all mankind are agreed. Friendship that is true, noble and lasting, is not that which is obtained by participating in any vice to satisfy or please one whom you may respect. When thus obtained it will not remain: as soon as you cease to sacrifice any of your moral courage then friendship is rudely scrapped, and he whom you daily met and conversed with is now your greatest enemy; for just in proportion as a good friend is sweet, a false friend is full of bitterness. Walking along with a person the other day, we were stopped, and my companion drawn aside by a business-looking man: after talking with the stranger a few minutes, he joined us again, and curiosity led us to inquire of him, who that might be. Our quickly returned answer was, only a friend of mine. What an answer! only a friend. Now we say that when only is applied as a limiting term to a person, there is an air of indifference and carelessness, which indicates that he is not a friend; but a repulsive disagreeable person, who my companion would just as lief had not stopped us on our way. There are those whom we esteem as friends, when prosperity attends us, who, as the chilling blast of poverty and want overtake us, are the first ones to drive us from their doors as vagrants. Give us a friend who was born in the winter time, whose cradle was rocked in the storm; he will last. As the great Spurgeon has it, I had rather have a robin for a friend than a swallow; for a swallow abides with us only in the summer time, but a robin cometh to us in the winter. To select a true friend you must know all about him; for upon a better acquaintance you may discover something you would certainly dislike and produce bitter and sinful feelings towards him. Will a friend induce you to indulge in such thoughts? Emphatically no! To have the true and real friendship of another you must inspire him with true and honest motives for such friendship. Be friendly to all; but make none your friends until they know you, and you know them

THE DISCOVERY OF INCONSISTENCIES CONTINUED.

MR. EDITOR:—I see that the Rev. J. P. Campbell has noticed my communication on Bishop Nazrey's position, as found in the Christian Recorder, Vol. II, No. 7, Feb. 15th, 1862, headed, "A Discovery of Inconsistencies."

He says, "Rev. T. Strother, of Terre Haute, thinks he has made a discovery of inconsistencies; and, after telling us what he conceives them to be, he tells us himself that he does not know what the major proposition is about which he is writing."

Now, Mr. Editor, while I very highly respect Elder Campbell, I must say here that he has misrepresented me very glaringly—either wilfully or inadvertently. I think, too, that he has given me very broad grounds upon which to criticise I commence that criticism on him by denying most positively that I ever used such language as he positively says I did. If any one wishes to know who has told the truth, let them read my communication, to which Elder Campbell refers, and they will see who has. It is found in Vol. II, No. 7, of the Christian Recorder. There you will see what I have said. Now, his major propositions and mine are different; for he proposes to explain or define Bishop Nazrey's position, and to speak ironically, I think he has made a beautiful thing of it. My major proposition, if I have one, is found in the predicate of the sentence which forms the heading of my communication, which predicate is, "A Discovery of Inconsistencies." Discovery of inconsistencies, then, is my major proposition.

Now, have I ever said that I did not know what those inconsistencies were? If I have, then Elder Campbell has told the truth; but if I have not said that I did not know what those inconsistencies were, then he has told the opposite of the truth!

I was so far from saying that I did not know what said inconsistencies were, that I went on to name the very circumstances which go to constitute those inconsistencies, showing them to exist, from the fact that General Conference, in discussing Bishop Nazrey's position in 1860, decided most positively that he was at that time identified with the Canadian Church; and Bishop Nazrey saying, at the same General Conference, that he held then the same relation to the A. M. E. Church in the United States as he had formerly held. I showed then that these statements made by these two parties were greatly at variance, and showed a wonderful discrepancy. I went on to give it as my opinion that it was impossible for Bishop Nazrey to hold a legal identification with two different and distinct denominations at one and the same time, which opinion I still hold, and expect to hold, until decided by authority different from Elder Campbell. I also went on to show other inconsistencies, which any one may see by reading said communication, that go to show great inconsistency in that which I stated at the outset I discovered inconsistencies in. It is to be regretted that Elder Campbell has spoken so carelessly in this matter, and has subjected himself to such glaring ridicule. He winds up his comment upon my communication by promising to furnish me with certain information, which he says I seem to need. He goes on to instruct me by saying that "H. J. Young read a request emanating from the Canadian Annual Conference, upon the subject of granting them permission to withdraw and form a separate A. M. E. Church in Canada." He says the whole was referred to a select Committee, which Committee, he says, reported favorably to the granting said request, and, after the Committee had given their reasons why such a request should be granted, they said, Your Committee, however, would greatly deprecate anything in the division that would have a tendency to sever the union existing between the A. M. E. Church of the United States of America and that of the Province of Canada, while we recommend the adoption of a book of discipline, in loyalty with government. We therefore recommend that in order to the continuation of a reciprocity of feeling and interest, a corresponding delegation should exist between the A. M. E. Church of the United States and the A. M. E Church in the Province of Canada, who shall fully participate in the deliberations of the General and Annual Conferences, but not vote. If any of the ministers or members desire to remove from one connexion to the other, they shall be received by certificate, with all their standing, so that a friendly relation may continue between the two connexions, although they exist under different governments, and shall be bound together by cords never to be broken. Adopted

It seems that the request emanating from the Canada Annual Conference, as Elder Campbell has it, was that they might be permitted to withdraw from the A. M. E. Church in the United States, and form a separate A. M. E. Church in Canada

The select Committee appointed to attend to the request of the Canada people reported favorably to granting said request. That is, I suppose, Elder Campbell means for us to understand that said Committee did grant the Canada people the privilege of withdrawing and forming an A. M. E Church. Well, I wonder where that Church is. I read of the B. M. E Church of Canada—but the A. M. E. Church of Canada is what I have never been so fortunate as to become acquainted with.

Over and above this, Mr Editor, I cannot conceive, for the life of me, how such a separation could take place, nor why the Canada people should ask such a thing. The A. M. E. Church to ask to be granted the privilege to separate itself from the A. M E Church!—and, what is still more astonishing to me, that this Committee granted the A. M. E. Church in Canada their request—that is, to separate itself from itself! and my astonishment is kept up to the highest pitch when I consider that the Canada people did make such a request of the A. M. E. Church in the States, which was nothing more nor less than to ask the privilege of separating itself from itself

And, Mr Editor, according to Elder Campbell's showing, this Committee, after they had granted the Canada people their request, and had spoken to full extent in favor of the Canada people withdrawing from the A M. E. Church in the States, then, with the same breath, so to speak, declared that they "deprecated anything in the division that would have a tendency to sever the union existing between the A. M. E. Church in the States and the A. M. E. Church in Canada." That was to say, taking all into consideration that they had said, that they were willing for the A M. E. Church to separate itself and become two distinct A. M. E. Churches, but that they sincerely hoped that in that separation they would not separate.

This Committee, also, according to Elder Campbell's showing, seemed to have thought it their duty to plan the form of a discipline for the new Church organization in Canada;—this they seem to have done, while they themselves belonged part to the Canada Church, and a part to the A. M. E. Church in the States. Where they have a precedent for anything of this sort, is what I cannot tell.

Elder Campbell says again, "Who told them (meaning the Committee appointed on Canadian affairs) to request Bishop Nazrey to resign forthwith whatever relation he sustained to the British M. E. Church?" Here, you see, Mr. Editor, he introduces a different Church from the one spoken of in the division. Now, I should like extremely well to know how Bishop Nazrey got legally into the B. M. E. Church, to make it necessary for him to resign that Church, in order to get legally out of it! I express myself thus from the fact that Elder Campbell says that the Committee appointed to determine which one of the Bishops should go to Canada have never yet reported. If this be true, how did the Bishops know which one should go to Canada? How did Bishop Nazrey know that he was chosen to go to Canada? Elder Campbell says Bishop Nazrey went to Canada and officiated as Bishop four years. I would like for some one to tell me how all this happened—legitimately? No one has ever yet told me that much!

Mr. Editor, I would now undertake to answer Elder Campbell's questions. Question 1st—"What force, if any, is there in these words, in accordance with the wishes of the Canadian Church?" I answer, about as much force as there is in the words, Bishop Nazrey did exercise legal authority in the A. M. E. Church and the British M. E Church, as found in Elder Campbell's communication. Question 2d—"How did Bishop Nazrey come to exercise Episcopal jurisdiction over the Ohio district, and also, at the same time, exercise jurisdiction over the Canadian Church?" Answer—I think, Mr. Editor, that Bishop Nazrey did not think that to act as he has was impolitic, as I hope he now sees it is." Question 3d—"Should the agreement of the A. M. E. Church General Conference for 1856, with the Canadians through their legally appointed delegates be respected or not?" I answer, Yes; it should not be; because, if I understand Elder Campbell, that agreement was for the A. M. E. Church to separate from the A. M. E. Church—a thing impossible, and, for that reason, if no other, should not be respected. Question 4th—"What effect should the protest of the delegate from the B. M. M. Church of 1860 to the General Conference of the A. M. E. Church have upon the subject in question?" None in the world—nor should it be respected; for the reason that the matter of resignation belongs solely to the one resigning.

TURNER ON THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

MR. EDITOR:—The late Message of President Lincoln to Congress, relative to emancipation, has given rise to more speculations, and created more surmises than any other document ever issued from the mansion halls of the White House; and likely no other Message ever, for the moment, was productive of so surreptitious suspense since this nation had its name. Its announciation seems to benumb the most active intellects, and paralyse the most flippant tongues.

Both Houses of Congress were thrown into a muzy wonder, as to how they would unwind the intricate strata of its apparent preternatural syllabication. Collegiate sons, who had been reared on the bread of literature, and had prowled through the fields of classic lore, gleaning from every source language, constructibility, and how its convoluted recirculations should be dismembered, were paradoxically magnetized, from all appearance, or else logic, rhetoric, and analysis, were proving recreant to the noble trust for which they had been procured.

But passing on from Congressmen to the lower grades of society, we behold governors, State legislatures, mayors, City counsellors, police officers, political petit-maitres, Irishmen, Germans, women, children, and, last of all in God's universe, the Ethiopian, all making terrible strides to get the paper. The newspaper boys are flitting up and down the streets as an India rubber toes and wiry springing heels, proclaiming, as they go, President Lincoln on emancipation! Silence, my the inmates of many houses, (who never think of a paper.) What's that? The boy shrills out again—President Lincoln on emancipation! Got the paper, get the paper! say the rich, poor, white or colored, whoever he may be, for all must see. Accordingly, the paper is bought, regardless of price; and the way they go at reading it!—every one is spell-bound, the children all come around, with eager anxiety, to see what is the matter, they look as though a death-warrant had arrived, the old folks are all breathless, the reader proceeds to chatter out the message,—listen—be quiet,—

"Resolved, The United States ought to co-operate with any State which may adopt gradual abolishment of slavery, giving to such State pecuniary aid to be used by such State in its discretion, to compensate for the inconveniences, public and private, produced by such a change of system."

But at this juncture the baby wakes up, and countermands the silence by a few sonorous yells, (great confusion.) Every solace is offered, and unless the irritated child soon learns the art of muteness, it is horrid away to some sphere where its interrupting loquacity breaks not the incorporate charm that enshrines every fibre of the mind.

The Ethiopian, too, with all his untutoredness verges out of his dreary iceberg cavern, as if touched by the thawing sun of a freer day. Laying hold of the Message, he grapples, with Herculean strength, to untwisting its most technical terminologies, hoping to congratulate in the person of the President a Moses waving a mace of independence, with a voice waxing louder and louder, exclaiming, Let my people go,—hoping to hear freedom's birth heralded in tones of volcanic mutterings,—hoping it (the Message,) to be the Jesus of liberty coming to dethrone the Herod of tyranny,—hoping to hear the Jubilee trumpet, Arise, ye slaves, and come to freedom! but, alas, alas, not yet, is the echo

Newspaper correspondents, too, join the puzzled van, and drift down the deep current of—I don't know what it means. Several days pass by, and no one dares to comment upon it. The thing is too tender—too near the heart-strings. The vitals of the nation are touched. The immortal negro is too precious—dearer than the thousands of the gallant sons of the nation, who have fallen the bloody victims of slavery's hellish caprice

The Generals, Colonels, Captains, Lieutenants and Soldiers, who have wallowed and died in human gore, at Bull Run and other places, the carnage hand and devastating sweep of death, which rocks the nation and convulses society, the widowed wives and orphaned children, are all insignificant and worthless when compared with the brave sons of Africa. Why, who would have thought, five years ago, that we were so valuable?

But what is the conclusion arrived at in relation to the true spirit of the Message? Sir, it is this:—A great many here have been blinded and made to believe that it portends hope for a brighter day; but I look at it as one of the most ingenious subterfuges, to pacify the humane and philanthropic hearts of the country, that was ever produced, and I believe it will result to the North what Senator Douglass' Squatter Sovereignty did to South Carolina. I have not time nor space to analyse the Message; but how some of our people can see so much in it to elate them, I cannot find out; for, after recommending it, it denies that Congress has any power to legislate on slavery—leaving it under the absolute control of individual States, with which control they have ever been invested. Before we raise our joys too high, mark this phrase,—giving to such State pecuniary aid to be used by such State in its discretion. In that phrase there is a broad field, a wide space, an ocean of thought. H. M. T.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CORRESPONDENCE.

Monday morning finds us in no very good plight to write for the press; while the services of the Sabbath are spiritually invigorating, they tax our physical and mental power. Last Sabbath was indeed a profitable and agreeable season with us.

Rev. James N. Gloucester left here on last Thursday, for Baltimore. He preached to most of the colored churches, to their edification, and received the deserved compliment of being a useful man. Having to visit Alexandria, I enjoyed the company of the Rev. gentleman, who seemed to be highly impressed with the wonderful change which was fast taking place on old "Virginny shore." It is enough to make any colored man enthusiastic. Alexandria has been a living monument of the barbarism of slavery. In her palmy days prior to the secession of Virginia, colored persons were liable to be taken up at any moment as runaway slaves—their color being considered a prima facie evidence of slavery; they were then under the necessity of proving their freedom or of being sold. Colored persons were not allowed to walk the streets after nine P. M.; to carry a cane weighing over four pounds; to stand three together; to be five in number in any store or place of trade, or to give white persons any impudence whatever. No colored man could lawfully conduct a religious meeting or perform a marriage ceremony. The slave pens of Bruce, of Rephart, et al., bearing on the same barbaric inscription in large letters, "Dealers in Slaves," were a terror to the slave population in the surrounding country. Movements present no such frightful aspect as they did. But now, the lords of these Satanic realms have found [illegible] in secession or Fort Warren; the slaves found in these pens have been released. The slave pens are now being fitted up as hospitals and store houses for the use of the army. Colored people have as much privilege now as in a free state, with the exception of having their oath in law. Standing on the road to Fairfax the contrabands could be seen coming in with songs of joy upon their lips.

The prospect for establishing a Bethel church in Alexandria is good, and if our honored and venerable father Smith had the youthful vigor and mental power of some of his predecessors, he would at this moment seize the golden opportunity. The colored people in Alexandria are right on the church question.

Wendell Phillips' great lecture at the Smithsonian on Friday night, is the theme of conversation in the halls of Congress and at the hotels. Bro. Moore just dropped in while we are writing this, and informs us that this distinguished orator gifted with genius and fortune, lectured at Israel church (A. M. E.) on last night, (Sunday.)

Rumor says that Rev. Mr. Tanner has resigned the pastorate of the Fifteenth street Presbyterian church, (colored.) He has been the installed pastor one year. It will be remembered that the Rev. gentleman declined going to California as an A M. E. preacher, to take charge of this church, being commissioned at the rise of the last General Conference of '60.

Hon. Owen Lovejoy lectured to a large audience of colored people last Monday night.

Capt. Hawkins, of Hannibal Guards, (colored) of New York city, was introduced to your correspondent; he is connected with this war in some way. We know nothing of the captain, but giving him credit for military talent, we hope that this war will develop it, and other things being equal, he will be of great use to his race.

In reading "Major General Commanding" McClellan's proclamation, it strikes one that he is accidentally or intentionally, trying to Napoleonize himself. He says to his soldiers before they have been under fire, what Napoleon said after his had been through the bloody struggle of Lodi and victoriously penetrated the heart of Italy. He declared that the fact that they belonged to the Army of the Potomac would be the highest glory; this remains to be seen, it is not the most probable thing in the world.

Our warm friends and pious members of the A. M. E. Church, together with the more humble itinerant preachers, deplore the unfortunate newspaper controversy which is going on in regard to the Bishopric. I do not think that there would be a great deal contention for the honor of initiating this controversy, as it seems to be regarded as being unproductive of any desired result. I write this in great haste

SACER.

Georgetown, D. C., March 17th, 1862

One is reminded of WASHINGTON by the reports recently received of Garibaldi. Retiring after his memorable successes in the opening struggle for Italian liberty to the Island of Caprera, he is now devoting himself entirely to agricultural pursuits. He employs many men in ploughing his soil, and takes an active part in the daily labors. His evenings are largely spent in reading the journals of the day.

A singular innovation has been made in Italy upon the great system of FREEMASONRY. It is that of admitting women into its membership, its offices, and its honors. Already, it is said, there are in the several Orders Sister Masons, Venerables, and Great Mistresses. If old reports are true, it is wondered what will become of the "secrets" of the system.

NOTICE

To all whom it may concern.

Port Royal Contrabands.—At a meeting held on Wednesday evening, at the Philadelphia Institute, by the Executive Committee of the Statistical Association of Colored People, of this city, the following resolutions were passed, which were read at the close of a concert by the Hutchinson Family last evening, given in aid of the escaped slaves at Port Royal:

Resolved, That the claims of the "Contrabands" in the vicinity of Port Royal and elsewhere call loudly upon the friends of humanity for material aid and sympathy.

Resolved, That while there is reason to regret that the Government has not more fully defined the status of these poor creatures, nevertheless it is clearly the duty of the Social, Civil and Statistical Association of the Colored People of Pennsylvania, not only to render aid as an organization, but also to commend these sufferers to the consideration of the various colored churches and societies of this city and State, that they may co-operate in the noble work of helping the Freemen's Association or other proper enterprises, which have undertaken to furnish food, clothing, and teachers, moral and religious, so much needed to relieve immediate distress and to inspire them with hopes of final deliverance.

Resolved, That we cannot lose sight of the Act of Congress, passed at its extra session, or of those proclamations emanating from the several Generals and Commanders of the Army, in which freedom has been declared to the slaves of all parties aiding directly or indirectly the rebellion.

Resolved, That in view of these acts, the slaves cannot (in our judgment) be considered other than FREEMEN.

One of the dignitaries of Great Britain, the Marquis of Westminster, has recently shown a noble disposition to do good. He proposes to place twenty-five thousand dollars in the hands of Trustees, to provide from the interest of it an annual pension of one hundred and eighty dollars for all Scripture Readers of the Scripture Readers' Friendly Society, when they shall be incapacitated by age, sickness or infirmity, from discharging their duty.

There are encouraging signs of a great change in the state of things in Austria in regard to religious toleration. It has long been known that a foreign Bible was by law a prohibited book, so far as any general distribution of it was concerned, and hence it has been comparatively unknown. Recently, however, a decree has been published, greatly modifying this law. Its free circulation is now permitted, subject only to the rules required for the general regulation of the Book trade. Great good will doubtless result from this decree.

An unhappy event has just occurred in IRELAND. The First Presbyterian Church in Antrim, one of the very finest of the Presbyterian body in Ireland, was recently entirely destroyed by fire.

Considerable feeling has been produced by a reported expression of the Earl of Shafesbury, saying, some months since, that, "in common with almost every English Statesman, I sincerely desire the rupture of the American Union." Now, however, he comes out and unequivocally and absolutely denies having ever said or thought any such thing, and professes real friendship for the United States. This will greatly relieve the minds of many, for in many ways this man had shown himself one of the noblest and most Christian and liberal of the persons high in place abroad.

A singular Book is about to appear under the editorial management of Mr. Alex. Bishop, at Glasgow, entitled, "The Proverbs of Scotland." It will include about four thousand five hundred, and they are arranged with a convenient glossary, and explanatory and illustrative notes. The only other country in the world that has ever shown a larger number of Proverbs is Spain, where a collection of about thirty thousand has been made.

Religious Intelligence.

THE CLERGY OF THE UNITED STATES.—The salaries of the clergy of the United States do not average five hundred dollars a year; and yet as a class, they are the best educated, the most influential, the most active, refined, and elevated of the nation. The biographies of a hundred clergymen who have families—taken as they come—show that of their sons, one hundred and ten became ministers; and of the remainder of their sons, by far the larger number rose to eminence as professional men, merchants, and scholars.

CLERICAL WEDDING.—The editor of the German Reformed Messenger, in narrating some of his experience in the way of ministers' perquisites, says: "In our experience we have married persons for 37½ cents; we have married on trust; and we have married for a counterfeit bill!" To this, The Independent adds: "We may soften our German friend's grievances, by quoting the case of the minister who received for a wedding fee a salt cod-fish, which, when he had taken it home for his table, was chiefly eaten by the bride and groom, who had called upon him at dinner!" The Independent properly thinks it unnecessary to mention that the potatoes and fixings on the interesting occasion were also furnished by the ministers! However, these are among the little things of a minister's experience. We recollect a case in which a clerical friend, very nearly related to us, not only married a strange couple for nothing, but lent them the money to pay the town clerk for their marriage license; and the loan stands to this day, "as good as new."—Calendar, (Episcopal) Hartford, Connecticut.

A GOOD TYPE OF CHRISTIANITY.—A missionary among the Karens, says:—"I do not think I ever heard a Christian Karen complain because he had too many children to provide for, and I never knew an orphan scorned for among them; aunts, uncles, and cousins, all claim them as their special charge."

MISSIONARY FRUIT.—The Missionary Advocate states that ten years ago the first Missionaries were sent to Corisco. Now there is a presbytery, a church of sixty-three members, including fifty-two converts from heathenism, and forty more are seeking a spiritual knowledge of Christianity. There is an eldership, including three native converts, all candidates for the ministry. There are Sabbath schools numbering one hundred and sixty pupils.

Rev. N. B. JOHNSON has been sent out by the Board of Domestic Missions of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, as an agent to look after the temporal and spiritual interests of the refugee slaves at Beaufort, S. C.

The venerable and excellent Bishop M'ILVAINE, of Ohio, now in England, was recently entertained by Queen Victoria, at her breakfast-table, as a mark of respect for him, and for the United States, of which he was a devoted and loyal citizen.

Rev. O. D. MILLER, of Nashua, N. H., has renounced spiritualism, after having been several years its devoted adherent and advocate, and has published his solemn protest against it, as a system of evil to any community.

Rev. WM. A. LEECH, an Episcopal minister of the Diocese of Massachusetts, has been solemnly deposed from the ministerial office by his Bishop, Rev. M. Eastburn, D. D.,—having declared that he renounced the holy office, and would not officiate any longer in its duties.

Rev. SAMUEL HANSON COX, D. D., LL. D., is reported to be about to resign his charge of the Ingham Female Institute, at Le Roy, N. Y.

Mrs. EMMA P. DOUGLASS, a returned labourer in the Baptist Mission in Burmah, died recently in West Philadelphia. Her husband, since their return, has become Pastor of the Blockley Baptist Church in this city.

Rev. W. C. SHIPMAN, missionary of the American Board and Pastor of the Native Church at Kaw, Sandwich Islands, died on the 21st of December last, 37 years of age and leaving a widow and three children.

An encouraging state of things exists among the London Cab and Omnibus drivers. A regular chaplain is secured for them, and religious services are held for their good. At the close of the old year, a midnight meeting was held in a large coach-shed in the omnibus yard at Islington, fitted up with seats, and tastefully arranged, and about six hundred persons of this class, together with many of their wives, were present. A most interesting season was enjoyed. Great good is anticipated from the moral and religious efforts that are making in behalf of this often neglected class.

In Great Britain and the United States much has been said about Young Men's Christian Associations. Rome is now skilfully, and with great effect, adopting them. In various parts of Ireland, especially, they are being organized, and by the lectures, which form one of their features, their libraries, and other things—all of which are of an intensely Romish character—the interests of Romanism are greatly advanced, especially among the young. Truly, God seldom raises up a good, without Satan shortly producing a counterfeit!

Evangelism in Germany.—A separation between the Church and the world is in many parts of Germany becoming more marked. The world is assuming a much more threatening position, and the children of God are becoming more faithful. A spirit of prayer appears to be growing. In many districts family worship is more regular. Young men's societies are acknowledging united prayer to be one of the most powerful means of advancing the cause near their hearts. Many are seeing more clearly that mere intellectual perception of the truth, or slavish bowing to a prescribed ritual, gives little strength in life, or comfort in death. At the great fairs of Leipsic, Frankfort, and elsewhere, one will find godly merchants meeting in the evening for prayer and reading the Scriptures. Those who were most active in opposing the work of God in the Elberfeld Orphan House last year, have publicly expressed sorrow for the steps they then took. Meetings on the Sabbath evenings for prayer and conference are becoming much more common, and, though the clergy generally discountenance such proceedings, still the meetings are held, and the prayers are much more spiritual and earnest.—News of the Churches.

Preaching to the Secessionists.—The Rev. Mr. Passavant, the Western editor of the Lutheran and Missionary, in the last issue of that journal, gives the following interesting account of a religious service held by him among the secession prisoners at Wheeling:

On a recent visit to Wheeling, Va., to dispense the Lord's Supper to the vacant English Lutheran Church in that city, we were permitted by the officer in charge to preach to the secession prisoners in the Athenæum. The hall in which they are confined is large and airy, and being well heated, is as comfortable as such quarters can probably be, where all the operations of cooking, sleeping, and living, are promiscuously carried on. The number of prisoners is upwards of 100; and when we mention the character of many of them as bush-whackers, bridge-burners, murderers (of our pickets, and often of their inoffensive Union neighbours,) their appearance may be imagined by those who are familiar with the class of "poor white trash" in the slaveholding States; the tools of others, for good or for evil. A jug of whisky and the scare-crow of Abolition was sufficient to identify them with secession and its bloody work. Deeply are these men to be pitied, for they are for the most part the ignorant dupes of designing and desperate leaders.

The services were commenced by a hymn, and a prayer by the venerable Dr. Weed, of the Presbyterian Church, who frequently conducts a service among these unhappy men, standing on a chair. We then addressed the assembled prisoners. In all the Bible, no words seemed more appropriate than those of Jesus: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest;" and we sought to apply this gracious invitation to their burdened hearts. The scene before us was deeply affecting. Their attention and their tears did not so much touch our hearts as did the adaptation of the gospel to the most guilty of men. Jesus says "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance," but it is only when sin appears thus "exceedingly sinful," that it becomes possible to realize the infinite mercy of the Redeemer to poor, sinful and fallen man.

At the close of the service a number took our hand, and, with many thanks, bade us farewell. Several of these were aged men, and seemed sadly out of place in such associations. Perhaps, on some missionary tour in Western Virginia as may yet pull at the latch string of some of our Athenæum congregation, and enjoy the hospitality of their cabins.

Interesting from Winchester

Enthusiasm of the Ladies.—Bouquets to the Soldiers.—The People Unanimous for the Union.—Skirmish with a Detachment of Ashby's Cavalry.—Destitute Condition of the Inhabitants.—The Railroad.—Gen. Banks' Headquarters.—Gen. Jackson's Present Location, &c.

SENTRY HOUSE MD. March 14, 1862.

I have just arrived here from Winchester. The place is quiet, and every one there professes Union sentiments, and the Union flag floats triumphantly everywhere.

Some of the citizens have gone on a frolic, and declared it to be the best Fourth of July in the history of Winchester.

Ladies make artificial patriotic bouquets for the army, and throw them from the windows as their brawny deliverers march past, to the tune of the "Star Spangled Banner."

The enemy have but about forty prisoners up to this time, captured by our cavalry since the occupation of Winchester. Nearly one hundred horses have fallen into our hands, branded "C. S." In a skirmish about six miles from Winchester to-day

Three of the Ashby cavalry were taken. But one man of our troopers has been taken since the occupation of Winchester, and that one through an accident to his bridle.

Business in the town is beginning to revive. The railway is open nearly to the Potomac, and the first train passed over to-day.

The old stage has recommenced running to Martinsburg, and stores are opening, one after another.

The populace demanded the military bands to play "Jackson's Retreat," amid uproarious laughter and rejoicing at the termination of the Reign of Terror.

The enthusiasm is universal. Winchester is far more loyal than ever before. The enemy have not retreated a great distance from the town, for their cavalry are still within seven or eight miles of it.

Our troops are fully covered against all contingencies. The success of our whole movement on the Upper Potomac, so far, has been more complete and happy than the most sanguine could expect.

It is reported that General Hamilton will be promoted to take command of Lieutenant's division, and that the latter will command a corps d'armee.

WINCHESTER, Va., March 13, 1862.—This afternoon, while twenty-six of our cavalry were foraging on the Strasburg road, three miles distant, they came upon a large barn, bearing evidence of having recently been occupied by Ashby's men.

While our teams were loading with hay, about two hundred of Ashby's cavalry came near, and threw out two companies as skirmishers. Our men covered the departure of their teams, and prepared to resist an attack, which was finally commenced. At length six Wisconsin pickets came up with rifles, and killed two of the enemy. One of our cavalry dashed upon the enemy, amid a shower of bullets, and killed one of the rebels with his pistol.

The enemy made no effort at a charge, but gradually advanced as our troops fell back to the town in good order and unharmed.

It is a noticeable fact that for several months the inhabitants of this section have been entirely without coal, and with limited means of transporting fuel into the towns.

The gas works at Martinsburg, Charlestown and Winchester are closed for want of stock.

The cars to-day only reached Halltown, four miles out of Harper's Ferry, owing to the previous destruction of the bridge.

No movements of importance have taken place to-day.

Gen. Jackson was in person at Middletown this morning, five miles north of Strasburg.

Ashby's cavalry still hang on the rear of Jackson's retreat.

From General Banks' Corps D'Armee—Army Newspapers—Good Feeling in Winchester—Private Rights Respected—Another Fight with Ashby's Cavalry.—WINCHESTER, Va., March 15.—General Hamilton, who yesterday afternoon, waited upon by nearly all the officers of the division, to congratulate him on his advancement, and also to express their profound regret at the necessity for his departure. A Pennsylvania regimental band gave him a serenade, and his staff accompanied him as far as Berryville.

This morning, Ashby's rebel cavalry, with two guns, were driven three miles beyond Newton by a force of United States artillery, infantry, and cavalry. Many shells were thrown on both sides, but, as far as is known, there were no lives lost.

Captain E. A. Pendleton, the Quartermaster of Ashby's Cavalry, was taken prisoner yesterday morning.

The cars reached a point three miles this side of Harper's Ferry to-day. The road is in the worst possible condition, requiring extensive repairs, to be available for heavy transportation. On several occasions obstructions have been placed on the finished track by secessionists.

Col. Gordon, of the Second Massachusetts Regiment, has been appointed to the command of the brigade vacated by the transfer of Gen. Hamilton. All is quiet to-night.

WINCHESTER, Va., March 16.—The members of the Indiana Regiment are publishing a daily sheet here, called the Army Bulletin.

I have received a large well-edited paper, published by a regiment at Leesburg, called the Advance Guard.

The churches here were open to-day, and were well attended by citizens, as well as officers and soldiers.

It is worthy of remark that there has not been seen nor heard of a single invasion of private rights, nor a case of intoxication, since the arrival of the army here. This is highly appreciated by the secessionists, and tends greatly to disabuse the Southern mind of the impression that we are barbarians.

Joseph Seaton's theatrical corps, which for weeks has followed the division, opens here to-morrow night.

The sutlers freely dispense necessary groceries to the citizens, taking, in some instances, corporation shinplasters in payment.

Progress.—Those who at one time complained of the slow progress of the war have no cause for such complaints now. Scarcely a week elapses without two or three important battles taking place, and in every direction our army is pushing forward vigorously against the enemy. Price has been recently routed in Arkansas, Fort Craig has been gallantly defended against great odds, new successes have been gained in Tennessee, Commodore Dupont has taken possession of the whole sea coast of Georgia, and of the strategic points of Florida, and the army of the Potomac has occupied Manassas and Winchester.

New Madrid is Ours.—Cairo, March, 14, 1862.—The rebels evacuated New Madrid last night, leaving a quantity of guns and stores which they were unable to carry away.

Mail-Clad War Vessels.—Ericsson's Monitor has produced a great commotion in Congress, as will be seen by the bill introduced by the Naval Committee in the Senate to-day, making a heavy appropriation for iron-clad boats and batteries.

The bill introduced by Senator Hale, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to-day, provides for the construction, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, of an iron-clad steam vessel of not less than five or six thousand tons burden, and of great speed and strength, to be used only as a ram, for which purpose $1,000,000 be appropriated. Also, $13,000,000 for the construction of iron-clad gunboats, $733,000 for the completion of Stevens' Battery, and $500,000 for extending the facilities of the Washington Navy Yard, so as to roll and forge plates for the armored ships.

The completion of the Stevens' Battery, which has hung fire so long, is provided for in the bill.

Our Foreign Relations in a Most Favorable Condition.—The relations between the United States and foreign nations are now entirely free from any apprehension whatever of disturbance. The tone of all correspondence is conciliatory and amicable. It is considered the British, as well as the French Ministry, is evidently gaining strength, owing to the discountenancing of sympathy with the secessionists.

In the House of Commons, Lord Palmerston, replying to Mr. Wyld, said that at the present moment the United States did not maintain as many guns on the coast of Africa as they were required to do by treaty, but this was occasioned by the exigencies of the war in which they were engaged. He expressed his conviction that the federal government was anxious to co-operate effectively with England in the suppression of the slave trade, and, as a proof of its feeling in the matter, he alluded to the case of Captain Gordon, then under sentence of death in New York for engaging in the traffic.

Gen. M'Clellan.—The Herald says: "We believe it will soon be made apparent, that while the detention of the main rebel army at Manassas all this time has materially contributed to our late great victories in the South and West, the escape of the rebels from Manassas without a battle will not retard, but facilitate the final overthrow of the rebellion. We contend that the rebel Johnston at Centreville was too near our Potomac army to be kept in ignorance of its movements, and too far off to be taken by a forced march on any line. His detention and his retreat, we doubt not, have been timed by McClellan, and the combination pieces which will shortly be executed. The President fully comprehends and approves it, of McClellan's plan, and has entrusted it to the command of the Army of the Potomac."

The Army of the Potomac.—Address of General McClellan to his Soldiers.—The Time for Action has Arrived.—HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, FAIRFAX COURT HOUSE, Va., March 14, 1862.—Soldiers of the Army of the Potomac: For a long time I have kept you inactive, but not without a purpose. You were to be disciplined, armed and instructed. The formidable artillery you now have had to be created. Other armies were to move and accomplish certain results. I held you back that you might give the death-blow to the rebellion that has distracted our once happy country. The patience you have shown, and your confidence in your general, are worth a dozen victories.

These preliminary results are now accomplished. I feel that the patient labors of many months have produced their fruit. The army of the Potomac is now a real army—magnificent in material, admirable in discipline and instruction, excellently equipped and armed. Your commanders are all that I could wish.

The moment for action has arrived, and I know that I can trust in you to save our country. As I ride through your ranks I see in your faces the sure presage of victory. I feel that you will do whatever I ask of you.

The period of inaction has passed. I will bring you face to face with the rebels, and only pray that God may defend the right.

In whatever direction you may move, however strange my actions may appear to you, ever bear in mind that my fate is linked with yours, and that all I do is to bring you where I know you wish to be—on the decisive battle field. It is my business to place you there. I am to watch over you as a parent over his children, and you know that your general loves you from the depths of his heart.

It shall be my care, as it has ever been, to gain success with the least possible loss; but I know that if it is necessary you will willingly follow me to your graves for the righteous cause.

God smiles upon us! Victory attends us yet! I would not have you think that our aim is to be attained without a manly struggle. I will not disguise it from you. You have brave foes to encounter—foemen well worthy of the steel that you will use so well. I shall demand of you great, heroic exertions; rapid and long marches; desperate combats; privations, perhaps. We will share all these together; and, when this sad war is over, we will all return to our homes, and feel that we can ask no higher honor than the proud consciousness that we belonged to the Army of the Potomac.

GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN,
Major General Commanding.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to be Opened in Ten Days.—BALTIMORE, MARCH 16.—The work of repairing the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad is progressing rapidly, and the whole road will be in complete working order in ten days. Seven trains from the Ohio reached Martinsburg to-day with provisions.

The Harper's Ferry bridge is nearly completed, and when this is effected a daily train will be run from Winchester to Baltimore.

General Shields telegraphed to-day, that the energy of the company in pushing forward the repairs has more than met his most sanguine expectations.

A large force of men is employed on the whole line, and the broken machinery at Martinsburg is being removed to the repair shops.

The Government has engaged the company to run military trains also on the Winchester road.

The Battle of Pea Ridge turns out to have been the hardest fought, and one of the most complete victories of the war. It has resulted in the death of 1,000 rebels, the wounding of nearly 3,000 more, and the capture of 1,600 more, together with thirteen pieces of cannon.

The Proposed Tax Bill is now attracting great attention in Congress and throughout the country. Many amendments will doubtless be offered, and a considerable number adopted. That the war will entail heavy pecuniary burdens is inevitable; but they will, in the main, be cheerfully assumed by the American people. Every good citizen should be prepared to surrender a part of his resources to preserve the whole. Practically, the rebellion compelled the nation to choose between anarchy and virtual destruction, and a herculean effort which would, necessarily, be attended with great expense, to preserve the Republic and all its mighty interests. Self-preservation and patriotism impelled us to adopt the latter alternative, and having adopted it, all the sacrifices that may be necessary to maintain it will be submitted to. The people not only that the war be conducted as vigorously and economically as possible—that no time should be lost in striking the enemy frequently and effectively, and that no money should be unnecessarily squandered.

The amount of revenue that should be collected to maintain the national credit during the continuance of the war, is estimated at from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 per annum. The latter sum, great as it may appear, is but about one-half the amount of revenue derived in times of peace by the British Government from the people of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland. There are single articles of luxury upon which we annually expend nearly as much as this whole sum. The annual agricultural and manufacturing products of the country in ordinary times, are estimated at $4,000,000,000, and all the national taxes now contemplated will probably not yield more than five per cent. of this amount. All the interests, and all the citizens of the country, will be expected in some way to contribute to the revenues of the nation; but if the burdens are fairly and equitably distributed, they will not fall very heavily upon any class, for those who may be called upon to contribute large amounts will have correspondingly large incomes or estates.

Victory—Island No. 10 is Ours, with all the Enemy's Ammunition and Transports—General Halleck Serenaded.—St. Louis, March 17th.—In response to a serenade to-night, General Halleck announced, from the balcony of the Planter's Home, that Island No. 10 is ours, with all the ammunition and transports the enemy had there.

Burnside Victorious at Newbern, North Carolina.—Baltimore, March 18.—The steamer Commodore arrived here this morning direct from Gen. Burnside's expedition.

She brings the announcement of the capture of Newbern, North Carolina, and the defeat of the rebels there, with the capture of a large number of artillery, after a hard fought battle.

Our loss at Newbern was about ninety killed and four hundred wounded. Our men displayed great bravery.

Married.

By Rev. W. D. W. Schureman, Feb. 20th, 1862, Mr. JOHN CHARMAN to Miss HARRIET STILL, both of Bordentown, New Jersey.

Married, on the 29th day of December, 1861, Mr. JOHN ELSBY to Miss HARRIET E. BERRY, all of West Philadelphia. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Joseph H. Smith, of Burlington, N. J.

Died.

In Thornbury Township, on the 5th inst., ANNA ELIZABETH, daughter of Brinton and Anna Mary Richardson, aged 6 years.

Parent, weep not for Lizzie; she is happier now than we.
By faith in Christ her Saviour, her happiness we will see.
She is hovering round the Throne of Him who in his word did tell,
"Suffer children to come to me, for I do all things well."
In our Sabbath School we loved her; she was so meek and mild:
There were none we esteemed above her—the lovely little child.
But let us not lament our loss, she hath gone with Christ to dwell:
He gave, He took, He can restore—"He doeth all things well."
By her Teacher,
J. H. HEATON.

Died, in New Jersey, February 23d, MARY M. NIXON, wife of Perry Cox, late of Philadelphia.

OFFENDING THE LITTLE ONES

Aunt Ellen went to take care of Mrs. Gray's family while she visited some friends. Lucy Gray, the eldest child, was about ten. She had a cousin from the country staying with her named Mary. Mary brought all her good home habits with her; she was orderly, industrious, and obliging, and she was a child who loved to pray.

But she was timid, and often afraid of Lucy. Lucy teased her so. Lucy was an idle, disobedient child herself, and she seemed determined to make Mary so. She would laugh at Mary for studying, calling her 'little school ma'am,' and she often tried to hinder her praying. Mary did not like to be laughed at, as no one does. Sometimes she would go away by herself and cry, and wish she were at home with her dear, dear mother; sometimes she would give up to Lucy.

'Lucy,' said Aunt Ellen, one day when they were alone together, 'I'am afraid you offended your cousin Mary.'

'No, Aunt,' said Lucy, 'she is very good natured; she never gets angry.'

'You do not know what I mean,' said Aunt Ellen. 'I mean the Bible use of offending.'

'What is the Bible use of "offend?"' asked Lucy. 'I thought "offend," was to make angry, and be sulky.'

'Will you try and find a verse in the New Testament which has offend in it?' said Aunt Ellen.

Lucy's curiosity was excited; and while Aunt Ellen went to superintend something in the kitchen, she took her New Testament and a Concordance and began to search. Do you know what a Concordance is? It is a dictionary of Bible words. She looked for offend. She found a number of directions to the Old Testament; but as Aunt Ellen gave her the New, she at last picked out Matt., xvii. 6, and, turning to the place, found the words, 'Whose shall offend one of these little ones which believe in me, it were better for him a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea.' Lucy read it over and over. Then she read before, to see who said it. It was the Lord Jesus.

'It must be something very wicked, to deserve being killed in this way,' said Lucy, and she read it again.

At last Aunt Ellen came back.—'Aunt Ellen,' asked Lucy, seriously, 'what does offend here mean?'

'In this place,' said she, 'and in many other places in the New Testament, it means to tempt or lead others into sin; so that by 'offending one of these little ones,' our Lord does not mean vexing them, ill-using, or making them angry, but tempting or leading them into evil, or throwing hinderances or ("stumbling blocks") in the way of their doing what they ought to; and this he calls wicked, though it were better to die than to be guilty of it.'

'And what does 'little ones' here mean?' asked Lucy.

'Jesus had just before taken a little child, and told his disciples that unless they were converted, and became as little children, they could not enter into the kingdom of God, and then he says they must not tempt to evil, one of these little ones who believe on him, so as to hinder them from doing right. It means, therefore, those who are young in years and easily impressed for good or evil,—those children or grown people who are destrous of doing their duty, but who are shy and timid,—who having no great confidence in themselves, find it hard and almost impossible to stand against laughter and teasing. These are offended in the Bible sense, when they are laughed or frightened out of the Saviour's service.'

'I am afraid I have offended cousin Mary,' said Lucy in a low tone. 'I never knew this before. I wish I had not done it. But, Aunt Ellen, children often laugh at other children who are serious or try to do right; they only do it for fun.'

'But what a wicked sort of fun it is!' said Aunt Ellen. 'It is such fun as Satan wishes; but how displeased Jesus is with it!'

'Aunt Ellen, I never knew so before,' said Lucy; 'I never knew so before.'

Perhaps there are other children like Lucy. Let them study this verse. It lays bare a common fault; but its commonness makes it no less serious and displeasing to God. Beware, then, lest you offend. Beware also how you suffer yourself to be offended, lest you are laughed or frightened away from Christ and the hope of heaven.—Child's Paper.

THE OLD WOMAN'S PRIDE.

The sinfulness of pride is a popular theme with moralists of all degrees. But, to our view one of the best hits yet made, was that made not long ago by the good but eccentric Rev Mr. L——, of Mississippi. It is in these terms.

'You don't know how far pride will lead folks. Listen, and I'll tell you:—When I was a young man I travelled one of the circuits contiguous to the sea-shore. The people didn't wear fine silks and calicoes as they do now. No, they thought themselves very fine if they could get calico to wear on Sunday; but the people were just as vain in calico as some are now in silks. It is not the muff we wear that makes the sin; 'tis the degree of homage we pay to it. In that circuit there was an old woman. Her wealth consisted in a pot of land, a churn, and a cow. But she got proud. Oh bo! Yes; and she thought she must have a calico frock to hear the young man in next Sunday.—And so to get it she sold her cow and bought it. Ah ha! Bought a frock?—Yes, and bless God, while she was making it she saw the churn, and she said to herself that she'd have no use for the churn, without the cow; so she sold the churn, and with the money bought a bonnet—and, bless God, when I went to church next day who should come in, big as life, but Mrs. —— with the cow on her back and the churn on her head.

THE DOGS OF ST. BERNARD.

Four great roads cross the Alps from Italy to Switzerland, one of which is the pass of St. Bernard. At the top of this road, eight thousand feet above the level of the sea, in a dreary region of snow and rock, is the famous monastery of St. Bernard. It is a great, strong, square, stone building, standing alone, occupied by monks and dogs, whose kind attention to travellers has made them famous throughout the world. Every stick of wood, and everything to eat, has to be brought up from the village below, on the backs of mules at a great expense of time and money. Around, are tall, grim rocks, a little lake, scarcely thawing in August, and snow-banks glittering through all the Summer sunshine. Dreary as it would seem to be, a beautiful velvet moss creeps into life on the Southern slopes, and in the sunny hollow of the rocks, blooming with little pink-blue and purple flowers, making one feel that the most desolate path may have friendly smiles.

Perhaps the most interesting sight at the monastery is the dogs, frisking and rolling about in the porch in pleasant weather—great broad-chested, short-haired, strong-limbed fellows, to whom many a poor, benighted traveller, perishing in those wild snows, owes his life. From November till May, a trusty servant, accompanied by a monk, goes half way down the mountain every day in search of travellers. Two large dogs follow on, with little casks of meat and drink strapped on their backs; and so keen is their scent, that they will discover a man at a great distance, and find out the roads in the thickest fogs and heaviest falls of snow. Oftentimes all they can see of the dogs is their tails, moving along through the snow.

One of the most remarkable of these noble dogs was Barry, who is known to have saved the lives of forty individuals. Besides his cask around his neck, he carried a warm garment on his back; and if he failed to rouse the traveller into some sense of life by his warm tongue and breath, he would race back to the house, and bring somebody to the rescue. One day Barry found a poor boy asleep, and almost frozen to death, in the celebrated glacier of Balsore. Barry warmed the boy licked him, woke him up, and gave him something to drink, and carried him on his back to the monastery. The joy of the poor parents, who can describe? After a life of service, Barry was sent down the mountain to a warm and comfortable home, where he passed the rest of his days in humble quiet, at the death he duly was carefully buried, and his skin was stuffed, and there he may be seen in the museum of Berne, standing as large as life, with his collar and bottle round his neck, ready to start on his labors of love.

The dogs are short-lived. Many die from diseases of the lungs, and others are lost in the falling of avalanches, and other accidents. Neither men nor dogs can long stand the severe climate and thin air of so great a height. Both are often obliged to go down into the valleys below, and remain amid milder scenes. The leader of the pack now is named Plato—a brave, big creature, doing deeds of usefulness and valor which might put to blush the life of many a one of human understanding, who never risked a thought, much less a deed, to help his fellow men.

ABOUT ACCOMPLISHMENTS

What are popularly termed "accomplishments," are of considerably less than no value at all, unless the pupil reaches such a degree of excellence in them as to render them worthy of the name. Young ladies who speak French badly, draw villanous designs, or

"Learn to force, by unrelenting knocks, Reluctant music from a tortured box,"

are not "accomplished" in French, painting or music, and, for any purpose of ornament, might as well have neglected them altogether. Indeed, the lady who can do none of these things has the advantage of one who does them badly, and has thus simply added to the number of her natural imperfections. Accordingly, one who has no natural talent for "accomplishments," or lacks time or money to become proficient in them, should forego them altogether, in favor of those solid and useful attainments which nobody can dispense with, and of which even a little is far better than no knowledge at all.

THE LITTLE TEACHER.

"Alice, Mary, come with me to the summer-house in the garden. I have something to tell you," said little Joseph as he returned home from a visit to his Aunt Lizzie's. So the girls ran for their bonnets, and were soon seated in the summer-house, amid flowers and fruit, eager to hear what their little brother had to say. They had not long to wait, for his eyes sparkled and his face beamed with smiles, while his lips parted, and he exclaimed, "Oh, girls! Aunt Lizzie has been so kind to me while I was away, and she has taught me so many things, which I dare say will be as new to you as they were to me, and now if you will listen, I will teach them to you."

"First she asked me what shape the earth on which we live was? Now, as nobody had ever told me anything about the earth, I did not know what to say, but, after studying a little, I said I thought it must be either square or round, (I could not tell which,) and flat like a pancake." "No, dear," said Aunt Lizzie, "it is round like a ball." "Why it is strange we do not fall off? said I." "Not strange at all," said she, "for God has so wonderfully constructed it, and endowed it with the great power of attracting all objects to itself, which power is called the attraction of gravitation." "Then she said that two-thirds of it are covered with water, and that it turns over once every day or twenty-four hours, and moves around the sun once every year. Is it not very strange to you that we do not fall off on our heads when we are on the under side, and that the water does not spill out of the great ocean? I always thought that when the sun went down behind the great hill west of our orchard, that it had gone to bed, but you see it could not go to bed and lie still, if the earth stood still as I thought it did, for you know it comes up in the mornings out of the east, and how could it get there if the earth stood still, and the sun went to bed and slept? Don't you see, girls, how very foolish it was to think so?"

"Well," said Alice, "where does the sun go to then?"

"Did Aunt Lizzie know?"

"To be sure she did," said Joseph. "You know I said the earth was round. Well, Aunt Lizzie said what we live on is called the Western Continent. But you do not know what a continent means, do you?" And little Joseph's eyes glistened at the thought of how much he knew.

"No," said the girls, "we never heard of such a big long word before."

"Well," said Joseph, "it means a vast extent of land, and surrounded on all sides by water. Just let me run and get an apple off you tree, and I will show you as Aunt Lizzie showed me." "There now," said he, as he came running back with a nice big apple in his hand, "we should have a candle to represent the sun, but as we have none, Alice must hold up her hand, and we will call it the sun. Now, Alice, hold your hand just so; and now we will call this part of the apple the Western Continent where we live. Now there is another continent right opposite us called the Eastern Continent, and people live there as well as here. Well our earth keeps turning on, and turns us away from the sun, and when it begins to get dark here the earth has turned so far that the people on the other side begin to see daylight coming; for when it is day here it is night there, and when it is night there it is day here. Aunt Lizzie said the sun standing still could not shine all over the earth at once, but one side of it would always be in the dark if the earth stood still. But you see the earth turns the same way I turn this apple; that is, from west to east; and as it turns over, the sun shines on both sides, giving daylight to all people, but not to all at the same time: consequently there is day and night on both continents or hemispheres."

"Now," said the girls, "what do you mean by hemispheres? You must remember we are not acquainted with as many big long words as you are, and we do not know what they mean."

"Yes," said Joseph, "I intend to tell you what it means. First I must tell you that sphere means a globe or ball, (something round like the apple,) and hemisphere means half a globe or half a ball."

"Aunt Lizzie said all the people in the world do not live on both the continents, but that there are a great many islands in the oceans and seas, and that they are inhabited. Some of the islands are very large and some are very small, and she said a great many of the people are heathen. That means they do not know nor worship the true God. Aunt Lizzie says they make images of wood, some of stone, some of clay, and some of gold and silver, and call them gods, and worship them, and sometimes they worship the sun, moon, and stars, and also rivers. A great many good people called missionaries have gone out to teach those poor heathen to be Christians, and it requires a great deal of money to carry them there, build churches, buy books, and get all things they need."

"I suppose they must be very rich people then that go to instruct the heathen?" said Mary.

"Oh no!" said Joseph, "none scarcely at all are willing to go but the poor Christians, and they are supported by the missionary societies of the Christian Churches. They are very poor, and need all the assistance we can give them. Aunt Lizzie says we must not spend our pennies we get to buy candy with, but save them to buy books for the poor heathen, and I am going to do so, won't you, girls? We will save all we get, and when Aunt Lizzie comes here we will give them to her to send. But there is the tea-bell calling us, so we will have to stop talking this time; but if you girls would like to hear more of what Aunt Lizzie taught me, we will come here to-morrow, and I will tell you about something else."

"O yes!" exclaimed Alice and Mary, "we could listen to you for a whole day, it is so pleasing." SYLVIA.

READ some portion of the Bible every day. It not time for a whole chapter, read part of one, or even a verse. Take up that book of books reverently, for it contains the words of the great God. Utter a silent prayer for help to understand and practise its precepts. But think not that you will earn heaven by reading or much prayer, for the one teaches us how we shall be saved; by the other, we "must know our responsibility to God."

FIGHTING ON SABBATH

Our little readers have all heard of the first three great battles fought between the United States troops and the rebels, since the present war began. These battles were Bull Run, Ball's Bluff, and Somerset, or Mill Spring. All these battles were fought on Sabbath—God's holy day—the day of rest; for Sabbath means rest. We want our little readers to remember, that those who commenced the battle, or those who commenced the attack, were beaten by the opposing forces. Those on our side commenced the attack at Bull Run and Ball's Bluff, and the result was defeat, while the rebels commenced the attack at Somerset, and they were defeated. Does not this show us that God will not suffer those who break his holy Sabbath to escape punishment? Dear children, we hope you all keep the Sabbath. And if you should be tempted to break it by bad boys, remember that God will surely punish you. We want you also to read the little story, in another column, about the little boy who was tempted to go on a river excursion on Sabbath day. The story is a true one, and was written by a cousin of the little boy who met with such a sad end. "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy."

COURAGE—TRUE AND FALSE

Reader, did you ever see a large boy thrusting his fist into the face of a smaller one, and daring him to fight? What kind of feelings did the sight raise in your breast? Were they not of contempt for the larger, and of pity for the smaller boy? Did you not feel like taking the part of the smaller boy and protecting him? Yet mean and cowardly as it is, how many such instances do we see? You can scarcely pass along the streets without witnessing something of this kind every day. Pacing up one of the streets of our city, I espied two boys fighting, and upon inquiry found, that one of the boys had been teasing and troubling the other until as he said he had "enough of him." Was this true courage? No! If your comrades trouble you, let them go on, and never mind them; they will soon get tired when they find that you take no notice of them. Noticing an injury is like adding fuel to the fire: it only makes it greater. Remember the old adage, "Sticks and stones will break my bones, but words will never harm me." True courage consists in doing what is right, despite the jeers and sneers of our companions. Show me the boy or girl that has the courage to say, No! and I will show you a boy or girl that will succeed in the world.

AMICUS.

A CHILD'S FAITH.

The following incident occurred a few months ago, and is strictly true:

My little brother, four years of age, was repeating his prayer before retiring for the night, when a brilliant flash of lightning, accompanied by a very loud peal of thunder, startled me both, so that we clung to each other for an instant. Then I told him, that God controlled the lightning, and could protect us from it. He said, "Does God love you?" I hope he does, I replied. "Then He won't let the thunder hurt you, will He?" His faith was so simple and confiding, that I felt rebuked for want of faith in God's promises. And many who have been Christians for years, would be glad to possess faith like these little ones.

ELLEN.

A SCENE AT A REVIEW.

There was a beautiful instance of fine horsemanship displayed at a late review held at Vienna, upon the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the establishment of the military order of the Maria Theresa, when some thirty thousand cavalry were in line. A little child in the front row of the spectators, becoming frightened, rushed forward just as a squadron of hussars were charging at full tilt—swooping down with maddening velocity, nay, almost on the child. Terror paralysed alike the spectators and the mother of the child, while the lovely and amiable Empress almost fainted with horror, for the child's destruction seemed inevitable. The little one was almost under the horses' feet—another instant would have sealed its doom—when a hussar without lessening his speed or loosening his hold, threw himself along his horse's neck, and seizing the child, placed it in safety in front of his saddle without so much as changing the pace or breaking the alignment in the least. A hundred thousand voices hailed with pride and joy the deed, while but two voices could but sob their gratitude—the one a mother's, the other that of her sympathizing and beloved Empress. A proud moment that must have been for the hussar, when his Emperor, taking the enamelled cross of merit, attached it to his breast—a proud monument alike for the sovereign and the man.—London paper.

A NOBLE ACT.

A noble ship was bearing down on the English coast under a stiff breeze and a lowering sky. It was not many hours before she was in the teeth of a violent storm, rolling and plunging in the angry waters. The wind shrieked through her cordage, and her huge timbers groaned from stem to stern. She at last struck and became unmanageable, and hoisted signals of distress. A crew of brave and hardy men from the shore put out to rescue her living freight. Among those on board was a negro with two orphan children under his charge. The boat was soon filled with the affrighted passengers, and there was room for but one more—room for the negro, or the two little ones. Who should be saved—who left behind to perish? The faithful negro did not hesitate. Over the ship's sides he lowered the helpless children into the life boat, and only called out, "Tell Master, Coffie did his duty."

Hannah More was asked to write a poem on this touching event, but she declined, saying, "No art could embellish so noble an action."—Child's Paper.

TO STOP BLEEDING

A correspondent of the American Agriculturist writes that bleeding from a wound, in man or beast, may be stopped by a mixture of wheat flour and common salt in two parts, bound on with cloth. If the bleeding be profuse, use a large quantity, say from one to three pints. It may be left on for hours, or even days, if necessary.

SEWING MACHINES.
SEWING MACHINES.
WILCOX & GIBBS
Price with Hemmer and Feller,
$35 00.
THIS MACHINE HAS POINTS OF SUPERIORITY PECULIARLY ITS OWN.
Stitching, Hemming, and Felling with a Single Thread.
It forms a fast, even, and elastic seam, which is ornamental and to rip in seam, even if the seam be cut at frequent intervals, and also under all circumstances remains unbroken.
A Patented device (great utility to matters), prevents the possibility of the machine being run in the wrong direction, or the balance wheel running a lady's dress.
Another feature which deserves particular attention is the WILCOX FATENT NEEDLE CANNOT BE SET WRONG.
Two thousand stitches or two yards of work, can be done in one minute without dropping a stitch.
These Machines are simple and accurate in their construction, so as to prevent the use of the shuttle, and with one thread produce all the practical results of the two thread machines, and more, for these fail without basting, and hem the finest muslin without puckering.
Although at about half the price of the other first class machines they will accomplish double the sewing in a given time.
"It is unquestionably the good, by far, Family Sewing Machine that the public have long been waiting for."—Boston Transcript.
"It is indeed a wonderful production, and for family use especially, no other will bear any comparison with it."—Philadelphia Evening Journal.
"A marvellous wonder."—Scientific American.
"Among the best and most serviceable sewing machines. Light and elegantly finished, and so simple in its construction that it seems almost impossible for it to get out of repair."—Pittsburg Chronicle.
"Has combined with its very peculiar merits all the really valuable improvements of the highest priced machines."—Pennsylvanian.
"This machine, in the opinion of the committee, fills more nearly the requirements of a perfect family machine than any on exhibition."—Franklin Institute Exhibition Report of 1859
"Taking into consideration simplicity, cheapness, durability, and doing all work, the committee were unanimously in favor of the Wilcox & Gibbs as a single thread machine."—Pennsylvania State Agricultural Society's Report
"We must, in justice, express our confidence in the merits of the Wilcox & Gibbs Sewing Machine. We consider that a gap at destruction has been supplied by it, by saving frequent doubt, that two threads are not, as we supposed, necessary to a good lockstitch."—Christian Advocate and Journal, June 21, 1860
"We have seen some of these machines in use, and like them highly of it them of any of the number we have tried."—Richmond Whig
The undersigned, Missionary in Constantinople, has examined more than twenty different kinds of Sewing Machines, and after six weeks' experience with Wilcox & Gibbs' Patent, has purchased one of them, as the best adapted to the wants of his family, and as the least liable to require repair. OLIVER CRANE.
Smyrna, July 3, 1860.
The undersigned, during eighteen months, has had in almost constant use, in his family, a Wilcox & Gibbs Sewing Machine, upon which has been made the clothing of his large family—from muslin to pilot cloth including the clothing required by his several boys; and in no case have the seams failed, although in hard service. The machine now in use is the family has required no repair, and is, in all respects, well supported and durable.

GREAT IMPROVEMENTS IN SEWING MACHINES.
EMPIRE
SHUTTLE MACHINE.
PATENTED FEB. 14, 1860.
Salesroom—510 Broadway, New York.
This MACHINE is constructed on an entirely new principle of mechanism, possessing many rare and valuable improvements—having been examined by the most profound experts, and pronounced to be SIMPLICITY and PERFECTION combined.
The following are the principal objections urged against Sewing Machines:—
1—Excessive fatigue to the operator.
2—Liability to get out of order
3—Expense, trouble, and loss of time in repairing.
4—Incapacity to use every description of material
5—Disagreeable to use while in operation
THE "EMPIRE SEWING MACHINE" IS EXEMPT FROM ALL THESE OBJECTIONS.
It has a straight needle, perpendicular action, makes the LOCK or SHUTTLE STITCH, which will neither rip nor ravel, and is alike on both sides—performs perfect sewing on every description of material from Leather to the finest Nansook Muslin, with cotton, linen, or silk thread, from the coarsest to the finest number
Having neither CAM nor CAM (OR) WHEEL, and the least possible friction, it runs as smooth as glass.
EMPHATICALLY A NOISELESS MACHINE.
It requires fifty per cent. less power to drive it than any other Machine in market. A girl of 12 years of age can work it steadily without fatigue or injury to health
Its strength and Wonderful Simplicity of Construction render it almost impossible to get out of order, and is Guaranteed by the Company to give entire satisfaction
We respectfully invite all those who may desire to supply themselves with a superior article, to call and examine this
UNRIVALLED MACHINE.
But in a more especial manner do we solicit the patronage of
MERCHANT TAILORS, COACH MAKERS, HOOP-SKIRT MANUFACTURERS, SHIRT & BOSOM MAKERS, DRESS MAKERS, CORSET MAKERS, GAITER FITTERS, SHOE-BINDERS, VEST AND PANTALOON MAKERS.

CHILDREN TEETHING.
MRS WINSLOW,
AN EXPERIENCED NURSE AND FEMALE PHYSICIAN, PRESENTS TO THE ATTENTION OF MOTHERS HER SOOTHING SYRUP FOR CHILDREN TEETHING
—which greatly facilitates the process of Teething, by softening the gums, reducing all inflammation—will allay ALL PAINS and SPASMODIC action, and is sure to regulate the BOWELS
Depend upon it, Mothers, it will give rest to yourself and
RELIEF AND HEALTH TO YOUNG INFANTS.
We have put up and sold this article for over ten years, and can say, in confidence and truth of it, what we have never been able to say of any other medicine—never has it failed to effect a single instance, to effect a cure when timely used. Never did we know an instance of dissatisfaction by any one who used it. On the contrary, all are delighted with its operations, and speak in terms of commendation of its magical effects and medicinal virtues. We speak in this matter what we know, after ten years' experience, and pledge our reputation for the fulfilment of what we here declare. In almost every instance where the infant is suffering from pain and exhaustion, relief will be found in fifteen or twenty minutes after the syrup is administered.
This valuable preparation is the prescription of one of the most experienced and skilful nurses in New England, and has been used with never-failing success in
THOUSANDS OF CASES
It not only relieves the child from pain, but invigorates the stomach and bowels, corrects acidity, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. It will almost instantly relieve GRIPING IN THE BOWELS, AND WIND COLIC, and overcome convulsions, which, if not speedily relieved, end in death. We believe it the best remedy in all cases of Dysentery and Diarrhœa in children, whether it arises from teething, or any other cause. We would say to every mother who has a child suffering from any of the foregoing complaints, do not let your prejudices, nor the prejudices of others stand between you and your suffering child, and it recover from you, we say, positively, to follow the use of this medicine, if timely used. Full directions for using will accompany each bottle. None genuine unless the fac-simile of CURTIS & PERKINS, New York, is on the outside wrapper
Sold by Druggists throughout the world

THE CITY OF GOD.

REV. XXI. and XXII.

O land of light beyond the skies,
Our Father's mansions in thee rise!
Swift come the hour when we shall view,
The heavens all changed, the earth all new!
Our hope shall be fruition then,
And God, our God, will dwell with men,
And we who traced the narrow road
Pass to the city of our God.

No sigh shall speak a bleeding heart,
No tear shall tell of inward smart,
All that then is shall breathe of peace,
And all that was forever cease;
No more the ransomed creature groan,
For He that sitteth on the throne,
The once-living and the true,
Shall by His word make all things new.

The vaunted sun shall shine no more,
No moon nor star shall gild that shore:
God and the Lamb dispel the night,
And ransomed nations with delight,
Over golden streets, by living streams,
Walk in Their inebriated beams,
Where nothing enters that defiles,
And God in Christ forever smiles.

The blood-bought host within thee sings;
Apostles, martyrs, priests and kings:
Not merely raptured Jesus view,
But gazing are made like him too—
The veil is dropping—Hark! a tone
Comes sweetly floating from the throne;
"Be steadfast, and the scene that shines,
To faith, afar, shall soon be thine."

Selections.

THOUGHTS OF PASSING EVENTS.

We seldom take up a secular paper, which is a vehicle of general intelligence, but we meet with an order passed by some provost marshal or commanding general, prohibiting the sale of intoxicating drinks to the soldiers. A brief experience shows that they are fraught with all manner of evil in the army. To a remark which we made the other day, which was in substance, that a single company of sober men might guard almost any number of unarmed prisoners, an officer who had been in the army replied, that a company could not keep even a single regiment of our own soldiers in any kind of order and obedience, if they were permitted to indulge in the free use of whisky. What a triumphant vindication of the temperance men, who have, for more than thirty years, been laboring to banish from society the common use of intoxicating drinks as a beverage; and who, more than twenty years ago, succeeded in persuading all intelligent men, who had any real regard for human welfare, to discontinue such use, wherever they were active and persevering in their labors. Since which time little progress has been made. In families, and in communities, drinking habits produce all such evils as they are found to produce in the army.

A day or two before the celebration of Washington's birth-day in St. Louis, the Provost Marshal issued an order, that all the houses in the city in which intoxicating drinks were sold should be closed from an early hour on Saturday morning until Monday morning, that the exercises of the day might not be disturbed by riotous conduct. What is this but a sentence of condemnation passed on all such establishments as the nurseries of disorder and riot?

The mild and judicious, yet firm and determined, course pursued by Gen. Halleck, we think, must receive the approbation of all reflecting men. We should take care not to become wrathful and vindictive in the prosecution of the war, because we have to deal with wrathful and vindictive men; and we should adopt no severe or retaliating measures, but such as are required by the necessities of war. In his 45th order he declared that it is his "desire to impress upon all officers the importance of preserving good order and discipline among the troops in the armies of the West advance into Tennessee and other Southern States. Let us show to our fellow citizens of those States that we come merely to crush out rebellion, and to restore to them peace and the benefits of the Constitution and the Union, of which they have been deprived by selfish and unprincipled men. They have been told that we come to oppress and plunder. By our acts we will undeceive them." He then refers to former orders against pillaging, marauding, and the destruction of private property; that women and children, merchants, farmers, and mechanics, and all persons not in arms, are not to be molested in their persons and property.

These "selfish and unprincipled men" have succeeded in convincing the masses in the South, that the "yankees," in other words, all the people of the North who are not secessionists, are barbarians. Selfish and unprincipled men they are; for, to say no more, many of them have travelled in the North and know better. Perhaps, indeed, they have returned home, vexed and chagrined, on account of the superior civilization which exists where society is not afflicted with their "peculiar institution." Do you wonder how the mass of the Southern people can be so ignorant as to be deceived by them? Give not way to too much wonderment. Reflect, for a moment, on the ease with which the artful demagogue can wield the masses in the North for a time. Think of the crowds in our Northern cities that run to see and hear a "Russian prophetess," who publishes the "good news" that she is among them, who has cumshaw thousands in Russia, France, and England with her wonderful mode of discovering human destiny. Even in the Gulf States, and in South Carolina, it is not doubted that many of the common people have been forced into the secession ranks, or were deceived by these selfish and designing men, and would, could they only be undeceived and assured of protection, return to their allegiance with hearty good will. As far as our armies have yet penetrated the State of Tennessee, they have found many ready to welcome them, expressing their joy at seeing once more the "old flag of our Union." In south-western Missouri, as the Union troops advance in pursuit of the rebels, they find the country almost desolate; the simple, confiding people, believing what they had been told by selfish and unprincipled men, fled at their approach; but as soon as they saw that the Federal army was as gentle as a lamb towards all peaceable citizens, they began to take courage and return to their homes. Everything should be done that can reasonably be done to undeceive the masses in the South. There was no reason for the rebellion; no cause which can at all justify it; in no sort, or manner, or sense, was the South the victim of Northern oppression or wrong; the rebellion was not necessary to defend the institution of Slavery from any violence of which it was in danger from the prevalence of the Anti-Slavery sentiment in the North, though it was used as a pretext and deceived many; on the other hand, had there been a statesman—a real statesman—among the leaders of the rebellion, he would have seen that secession would not, could not, preserve Slavery, but must hasten its downfall. The rebellion was wholly the work of "selfish and unprincipled men," who were true to nothing but their ambition, and from whose bosoms ambition had banished every humane and patriotic sentiment. But let us not be high-minded and too confident. Have we no such men in the North? Yes, we have, and by far too many of them. We have enough of them to bring swift destruction on us, even if we were in a moment, and by a miracle, delivered from our present danger, unless we take more care than we have hitherto done not to exalt them to high stations in the Government. We need a revival of the doctrine held by Washington and the statesmen of his day; that is, that "knowledge, morality, and religion are necessary to the good government and happiness of mankind." Those who believe this doctrine should not suffer themselves to be divided by mere political issues, or by party questions, which are of no real value, and which few of them understand. It is startling to see a Presbyterian elder, or a Methodist class leader, standing beside and supporting a regular profane drunken demagogue while he is making a stump speech, merely because he is the leading candidate of his party.

An unusual interest, or an interest which has not been witnessed for some years, seems generally to have been taken in the late celebration of Washington's birth-day. It was well. He was at least well, if the speakers dwelt on the virtues of that great man; if they took care to show that had he, and but a few others, been "selfish and unprincipled men," all the efforts of our fathers to maintain their just liberties would have been in vain; and if they took care to show that, in the revolutionary war, a principle—a fundamental principle—of all rational liberty was at stake. We have been asleep for some years. We have been studying too much how to "sell, and buy, and get gain," as if this were all that is necessary to render a people prosperous and happy. Formerly a great interest was taken in the celebration of the 4th of July, and addresses were delivered by chosen speakers in nearly every town and neighborhood. Perhaps many of these addresses were little worth, but many of them were well calculated to keep alive the spirit of patriotism, and to show our youth what they must be and do, if they would preserve our liberties. Our school books contained some reading which was carefully selected to give the youthful mind some idea of the nature of our institutions, and of their high value. And in our academies and colleges, such instruction was imparted to our youth in a more advanced stage. All this has of late been comparatively neglected. The consequence is, that a generation has come forward, in many of whose minds the mention of Washington's name excites no other emotions than such as are excited by the mention of Bonaparte's name.

It seems that the intelligence of the capture of Fort Donelson made such an impression on the minds of the Confederates at Richmond that they resolved to change their programme, and have less parade at the inauguration of Jefferson Davis as President of the new nation which has Slavery for its "corner stone." It was agreed to dispense with festivities, as not in keeping with the gloomy prospects of the Confederacy. As to the "ball," a lady said: "It would be disgraceful to be dancing and enjoying ourselves after such defeats, and while our poor soldiers are suffering." This is becoming; the lady commands our respect; and had we the opportunity, we would commend her example to the attention of Mrs. Lincoln. But, while this is so at Richmond, our theatres and other places of "amusement" are open in the North. In St. Louis we have a Professor Henry advertising that he is about to open a "dancing school." Of what he is a professor he does not say; and, till better informed, we shall take it for granted that he is a professor of the art of flirtation.

In a late article we spoke of the opposing forces at Fort Donelson being about equal. Such was our impression from the first reports. Though it now appears that the Federal forces out-numbered the rebels, there still was no such disparity as to make the surrender of the fortress a necessity so soon, if it had been defended by earnest men, who had a confidence in the goodness of their cause. Among the rebel prisoners, many admit that they engaged in the rebellion under constraint, though their officers are said to be sullen, haughty, and insulting.

ELIHU BURRITT

MESSRS. EDITORS.—Having long been familiar with the name of Elihu Burritt, "the learned blacksmith," as he has been called, it was with pleasure I availed myself of the opportunity yesterday evening of hearing him deliver a lecture on "Benevolent Associations; their philosophy and power." Any Biographical Dictionary which embraces modern names will inform such as consult it that Mr. Burritt is a native of Connecticut, was born of obscure parentage in 1811, was apprenticed at the age of sixteen to a blacksmith, was led to the study of languages through his desire to read the Scriptures in the original tongues, and that, while still working at his humble avocation, he had acquired celebrity for his acquaintance with the principal languages of ancient and of modern times. Nor has Mr. Burritt earned only the reputation of a linguist, and added another name to the list of those who have pursued and acquired knowledge under difficulties, or "have grown," as a late reviewer expresses it, "under compression." He has gained the more amiable fame of a philanthropist, laboring earnestly, as he has done, for the social amelioration and elevation of his fellow men. He has devoted himself with zeal to the promotion of temperance, of cheap ocean postage, of the abolition of American Slavery, and of the principles of the Peace Society. In 1846 he visited England, that home of practical philanthropists, where he succeeded in establishing a society, designated "The League of Universal Brotherhood;" its object being to employ all lawful means for the abolition of war. Within the past two or three years he has advocated the view that in order to extinguish slavery in the United States, the general government should purchase and liberate the slaves. Whatever may be thought of the feasibility of some of his favorite projects, there can be little doubt as to the good will toward man which pervades and characterizes them. Having offered this sketch of Mr. Burritt's life and labors, I shall now advert more particularly to the impression made upon me yesterday on seeing and hearing him.

In appearance, Mr. Burritt is not distinguished. He looks a good deal like a quiet farmer, with a less healthy appearance, however, than the tillers of the soil generally have. He does not affect the fine gentleman; but stands before you an unassuming man, whose kindness of disposition alone apparently constrains him to claim the public ear or eye. His cast of countenance, especially the conformation of the nose, seems to me to bear a considerable resemblance to that of Mr. Seward, with this difference, at least, that the face of the latter has, as I fancy, a very sinister expression, while that of the former has an ingenuous and honest expression.

In his lecture, Mr. Burritt displayed a good deal of research and analytic power. He traced the operation of the social principle from the earliest times, the Bible being accepted as his chief historical authority. I know not to what religious creed Burritt adheres; but it was very pleasing to observe the reverence with which he referred to the subject of religion and to the sacred writings. A great many aspirants for fame now-a-days, as public speakers or writers, are at pains rather to show that they are free from the trammels, so-called, which the religious world groans under. Sometimes the patronizing air with which a sentence or sentiment from the Bible is quoted, is quite as offensive as a direct assault on Scripture; the speaker or author seeming to say, "See how humble I am in noticing such an antiquated volume; but know ye that I do this only for the sake of weak-minded people who still attach importance to the declarations of that old Jewish book."

Mr Burritt gave a prominent place to the influence exerted by the church in bridging over the chasms which separate man from man, and nation from nation. He eloquently depicted the process by which the Christian religion abolished the mutual antipathies of nations, classes and races in the Roman Empire, thus tending to effect a far nobler union than the iron rule of the Cæsars and the senate could secure. The influence of the crusades in knitting together people of diverse habits and tongues, and inspiring different ranks and races with common ideas was alluded to. The beneficial effects of the invention of printing in promoting among nations a certain community of intellectual goods, and in bringing men in different climes into sympathy with each other, was touched upon. The impulse given in the same direction by the discovery and colonization of America was hinted at, while the newspaper, steam, and the electric telegraph, were noticed as powerful agents in the furtherance of sociality among the kindreds of earth. The lecturer next addressed himself to the exhibition of the power exerted, especially within the present century, by combinations of men for the advancement of benevolent objects. Particularly as illustrations he adduced the achievements of the British Anti-Slavery Society and the Anti-Corn-Law League, both of which at first feeble and small, at length rose to commanding influence, and amid a blaze of glory achieved their ends. The success which has attended these associations, he remarked, was desirable not only in itself, but also for the confidence which it begat, that great evils in society can be righted by peaceful agitation steadily pursued. The great missionary associations by which the spiritual good, and temporal, too, of heathen millions are sought, were adverted to as furnishing very notable proofs of the power which such societies may put forth. There was no allusion made to Free-Masons, and other secret societies which put forward such high pretensions to the honor of being benevolent associations. In conclusion, Mr. Burritt expressed his desire to see the brotherhood of men more generally recognized, and the old mode of settling disputes between nations by the sword exchanged for the more rational and Christian method of peaceful arbitration.

On the whole, I liked the lecture well; and the lecturer stands higher in my esteem now than he ever did before. He seems an honest, conscientious man, one who will not court applause by pandering to vulgar prejudices. He does not find everything good in one country and everything bad in another. He shows himself capable of rising above the narrow local conceptions by which many are controlled, and speaks like one who loves the race better than a race, and the nations better than a nation. His acquaintance with history is not limited to the last seventy or eighty years, and like a good eclectic philosopher he can discover and appreciate the noble and the great in other countries than that in which he first drew breath. For this comprehensiveness and breadth of sympathy I honor him. At the same time he appeared to me in his lecture to lay undue stress on some things, and to cherish unwarranted expectations in regard to the triumph of good sense and feeling over prejudice and passion and selfishness. He seemed to me also to forget that intercourse among nations may lead to serious complications and quarrels, increasing, rather than diminishing, the tendency to war. I would also take exception to the notion which pervaded a good part of his lecture, that in the middle ages, and even till the 17th century, the nations of Europe had slight intercourse with each other. This may be true as relates to nations; but I think it can be shown that, among the learned or reading classes, of those times, there was a very close intimacy maintained. The use of the Latin language in the composition of books, and in social or epistolary intercourse among the educated, brought all the learned men of Europe near to each other; and in fact there seems at the time of the Reformation to have been a far greater measure of correspondence between the thinkers of that day, than subsists at the present hour between the educated men of different countries and tongues.

Mr. Burritt's style of composition is very fine. Perhaps it is too ornate, and I noticed a recurrence of alliteration in his lecture which I should not have expected. Mr. Burritt ought to leave such petty tricks to those who need them to give a kind of glitter to their sentences.

I cannot praise Mr. Burritt's vocal modulations. He falls into a heavy sing-song tone. He travelled through his manuscript in heavy marching order: this was a defect. But how difficult it is for any speaker or reader to detect and remedy his own mistakes and defects in the use of his vocal organs! What speaker has not felt a desire to have the opportunity of sitting in a seat, and hearing himself at the same time speak from the platform or pulpit? How much good might accrue to us could we combine these incompatible things, and be at once the absorbed speaker and the cool, impartial, and critical hearer! H.

ANECDOTES OF THE AUTHOR OF THE COURSE OF TIME.

The first homily which Mr. Pollok delivered at the Divinity Hall, is spoken of as a curious and remarkable production. It was founded on Romans, v. 19: "By one man's disobedience many were made sinners." His mode of discussion appears to have been singular, nay original. He departed out of the beaten track of theological dissertation, and expatiated forcibly on the evils growing out of the apostacy, on the whole animal tribes and instincts. The interest and indeed amusement of the class increased as he proceeded; nor did they conceal their feelings, but on the contrary, violated the order of the occasion by bursts of laughter and exclamations of condemnation. The poet, however, was not to be silenced by such a course of conduct; but continued with philosophic coolness to read the homily. Having reached that part of the discourse, in which he sought to show what earth would have been, if the virus of sin had not polluted it; he appeared to grow more energetic, and to rise in majesty and force according to the canons regarding the climax; then elongating himself, and bending over the pulpit, with outstretched arm and look of indignation exclaimed, "Had not sin entered our world, no idiot smile would have gathered on the face of folly to put out of countenance the man of worth." Never perhaps, before or since, has there been such a rebuke administered in that hall of learning. The faces of the students were instantly crimsoned with shame, and deep silence continued until he closed his homily with the significant language of Milton

"Dear patrimony
That I must leave ye now."

It is needless to say that the class, as a whole, expressed their opinion freely concerning the homily. It was "bombast and nonsense." "The Professor, however, took a different view of it. His criticism was decidedly favorable. He approved of it. He said the division was textual and proper. The discussion of the first two heads correct, under the third, some things were advanced, which might advantageously have been omitted. It showed that the author possessed no small amount of poetical talent, which, however, he would advise should be more sparingly used in sermonizing."

It is impossible to tell what results might have followed on a contrary criticism from the Professor. Dr. Dick in this instance gave encouragement to the poet, and relieved him from an obloquy, with which the students by their injudicious remarks, had covered him. Many a young man of the most brilliant talents, has been hopelessly injured by an unjust animadversion on his mental efforts. The Story of the poet Keats will remain a melancholy monument of this truth.

The poet had also a narrow escape from being wrecked before the Presbytery of Glasgow.

The second exercise was a sermon on 1 Thess. v. 21: "Prove all things." It was delivered before a committee of Presbytery in Paisley; and what adds to the interest of the incident, is the fact, that every member of that committee but one expressed their disapprobation of it. Some went so far as to refuse to sustain it, in the first instance. Dr. Ferrier, however, soon gave a new colouring to the affair. He proceeded to give an elaborate criticism of it; taking up seriatim the plan, doctrine, style and effect. Nor was there one of the committee, after his lucid exposition and defence, who attempted to interpose a negative in sustaining it. Judicatories should always judge according to intelligent and well defined criteria. Now, is any one competent to sit in a judicative seat, who has not prayerfully computed his responsibility.

"AND WHEN THE TEMPTER CAME TO HIM."

The tempter here spoken of is Satan, the great enemy of souls. He was so bold as to attack the Saviour, but without success. It cannot be matter of surprise to us, to know that he is still at work, and with greater success, with sinful and erring mortals. He is described by the apostle Peter as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour. He is present with us in our most solemn and devout duties. His success in his evil work, however, is more apparent in our private walks and social intercourse. When in private, especially on the Lord's day, when spending the day at home either from necessity or choice, under the guise of solitude, an acquaintance is seen passing the door, or window, and it is difficult to resist the temptation to seek a little social chat.—The moment is improved, a tete a tete is the result; and the conversation is anything but edifying to the soul that would have heaven in prospect. Satan always succeeds to a certain extent, in doing evil to both parties by such interviews. It may be, a book of an improper character that is lying near, becomes the agent in tempting to spend a few dull moments in the perusal of it, and thus vitiate, rather than improve the mind by the foul sentiments it contains. Such books should not be admitted into the houses of those who would protect themselves and young people from contamination and crime. The secular newspaper, published the last of the week with design to give the opportunity, may be the temptation to profane the Sabbath by those who will submit to it, by its perusal on the Lord's day. Such a practice should not be tolerated by those who would respect the holiness of the Sabbath. The semi-secular and semi-religious newspaper should also be excluded from Sabbath-day reading, by those who would regard their own spiritual interests and the spiritual interests of others. When such a paper is first taken up on the Sabbath, and in looking at its contents, the eye catches the heading, "WAR NEWS," or some flashing advertisement, or something else connected with the secular department, is it heeding the sentiment contained in the sixth petition in the Lord's prayer, "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil," to take up such a paper for Sabbath reading? I ask of those who may have done so, if they have been careful, to select the proper pieces for Sabbath day, and to exclude others? I ask what is the testimony of experience? Think, too, if the mind be in a proper state for spiritual improvement, to turn away from reading in the secular columns of a newspaper, even in the church, on the Sabbath day, and then begin the public worship of God by singing the first verse of the 112th Psalm:

"Praise ye the Lord. The man is blessed
Who fears the Lord aright," &c.

The subject is a very solemn one, and should command attention. I had intended to say more upon the subject, but I must desist for the present. The scriptures say: Resist the Devil and he will flee from you. R.

THE ROUGH HOUSE AT HAMBURG, GERMANY.

A brisk controversy is at present going on in Germany respecting a religious association in the Protestant Church, called the Brothers of the Rough House. More than half a dozen books have been published against it, or in its defence, and a large portion of the periodical press have taken part in the discussion, which is still attracting great attention throughout Germany, and which is making the object and the operations of the society extensively known among all classes of the people. The controversy is not yet ended, and bids fair to be of considerable influence on the religious life of the entire country. It, therefore, well deserves that we bring it to the notice of the American churches.

To many of our readers, the name of the Brothers of the Rough House will not be altogether unknown. They are a religious association of men, founded by Dr Wichern, and educated in "The Rough House" near Hamburg, the great parent and central institution of the Society, for becoming school-teachers, for taking charge of orphan and poor houses, of houses of refuge, of hospitals and prisons, and for devoting themselves to other works of Christian charity. The founder, Dr. Wichern, is well known as one of the most distinguished divines of Germany, and, in particular, as one of the chief promoters and organizers of the Home Missionary Societies of the National Church, over whose general meetings, held in connection with the church Diets, he has been accustomed to preside. The association, though by the strictness of its organization it bears apparently some resemblance to the monastic orders of the Roman Catholic Church, is entirely free from all Romanizing, as well as High Church tendencies, and enjoys the entire approbation of the evangelical churches of Germany, which look upon its members as its most efficient missionaries. Some years ago, Dr. Wichern received a call to Berlin as a member of the Supreme Ecclesiastical Board of the Prussian State Church and a counsellor of the state ministry, because the Government wished to secure his valuable services both for the administration of the largest German church, and, in particular, for a reformation of the prisons of the state. In both these positions which he occupied in Prussia, he has exercised a great and salutary influence. More recently, he has been enabled to lay at Berlin the foundation of a large establishment similar to the Rough House of Hamburg. Although the opponents of evangelical Christianity have often had occasion to declare their dissatisfaction with the religious principles of Dr. Wichern, yet they have generally given credit to his philanthropic zeal, and his institutions had but rarely been exposed to attack. Not a little sensation was, therefore, created by a work of Dr. von Holtzendorff, a law Professor at the University of Berlin, entitled "The Brotherhood of the Rough House. A Protestant Order in the Service of the State. From Documents not before Published." (Die Brüderschaft des Rauhen Hauses. Berlin, 1861.) As might be expected from the sensation title, the book found a rapid sale. Every one was anxious to see the startling discoveries made in "documents not before published," and in which the author charges the brethren with being a kind of Protestant Jesuits, an association of hypocrites, and most dangerous both to church and state. Those who were personally acquainted with the institution of Dr. Wichern, were not a little surprised to find that the sensation pamphlet produced absolutely nothing but what all the numerous friends of the institution had known for years, and no discoveries could be found in it except it were the author's astonishing ignorance of the subject. He shows himself throughout a blind partisan; he objects to the common prayer of the Brethren and the common celebration of the Lord's Supper; and draws inferences as to the dangerous character of the institution from such regulations as recommend to the members to profess the Lord Jesus by a holy and quiet life, to keep peace with everybody, to live pure and chaste in words and deeds, etc. A particular importance is attributed to the "discovery" of a secret language which the Brethren use in their correspondence, because the author says, "It might be used for secret political societies, for plots and robberies;" and yet the language is not more nor less secret than stenography, and the author had no trouble to get the key to it. To refute such arguments and charges was easy for the members of the association, and the task has been ably performed by one of their prominent men, Rev. Mr. Oldenburg, the chaplain of the jail in Berlin. His work (Die Brüder des Rauhen Hauses. Wieder Herrn Dr. von Holtzendorff Berlin, 1861) has given general satisfaction to the evangelical churches, and is recommended by the entire religious press of Germany. From the last papers received from Germany, we learn that Professor Holtzendorff has replied to the work of Oldenberg and other defences of the Rough House, in a pamphlet, entitled "The Order of the Brothers of the Rough House and their labors in the House of Correction, with further Communications from the Documents not yet published." (Der Bruderorden des Rauhen Hauses, etc. 1862.) As the title indicates, the author now seeks to limit the controversy mostly to the influence exercised by the Order of the Brothers of the Rough House and their labors in the House of Correction, with further Communications from the Documents not yet published.

EPISCOPAL VISITS.

I will be on the Westchester Circuit on the 29th of March. The Elder may make arrangements up to the 5th of April. I will then leave for Oxford on the Pennsingtonville Circuit, and remain to the 12th, on which day I will leave for Lancaster Circuit, where I will remain a week. The Elders or Preachers will make their arrangements and inform me of them. W. NAZREY.

NOTICE.

We wish to say to those brethren who are so long-winded, that they will excuse us from publishing their articles, for we have some articles on the Episcopal Controversy which would take up some two or three columns. We cannot publish such lengthy articles as those every week from brethren. If brethren desire to discuss the matter, let them do so in short articles, and more especially if they have written two or three long articles on the subject. We want brethren to write on various subjects. We like the style that Rev. J. P. Campbell has of condensing his article down upon the subject.

LETTERS.

We received a letter from Rev. William Jackson, of Vincennes, Indiana, with three more subscribers and their money. Brother Jackson says he hopes that I would not consider him troublesome. Certainly not, Brother Jackson; we never consider any one troublesome when they are doing good. We shall have no objection, if you do so every day, and will thank you into the bargain. We say to you, Brother Jackson, that you and your dear companion deserve much credit, and may the good Lord bless you in all your acts to do good.

A letter from Rev. G. A. Rue, of Providence, R. I., and its contents, was received by us. The brother states that they are without a house to worship in. We can greatly sympathise with you and your congregation, Brother Rue, but never mind. The poet says:—

"Though troubles assail, and dangers affright,
Though friends should all fail, and foes all unite,
Yet one thing secures us, whatever betide,
The promise assures us the Lord will provide."

We received a letter from Rev. A. M'Intosh, of the Branch Church, Chicago, Ills., which has been organized since last Annual Conference by Bishop Quinn. We are glad to hear from our old friend, for we did not know what had become of him.

Rev. William J. Davis, of Jacksonville, Ill., sent us a letter. The names and papers are all right, Brother Davis.

A letter from Rev. G. H. Graham was received by us. All right, Brother Graham. May the good Lord bless you in your labors.

Rev. W. A. Dove, of Chicago, Ills., sent us a letter. The package sent is all right.

NOTICE.

The General Committee is hereby notified to meet on the 8th day of May, in the city of Philadelphia, at 9 o'clock, A. M., in Bethel Church, in the minister's study. E. WEAVER,
Book Steward and Editor.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE BALTIMORE CONFERENCE.

The Baltimore Conference will meet in Israel Church, Washington, D. C., April 17th, 1862, at 9 o'clock precisely, by order of the Bishop, Baltimore, March 19th, 1862. J. M. BROWN, Secretary.

P. S. The members will please be prepared upon all their collections, especially the Two-Cent, Bishop's Support, Missionary Collection, Widows' and Orphans', and Contingent Money. Those brethren in Delaware and Pennsylvania will not forget that the churches in those regions made no report last year, and this year we shall expect a strong effort and a good report. Let old Baltimore not be behind in any particular, especially to those dependent upon us. J. M. B., Sec.

REVIVALS.

The Rev. Henry Davis, at the Union Church, is having quite a good time. This is Brother Davis' second revival during the present winter, and it seems that God has blessed his labors wonderfully this year.

In the Zion Mission Church, Rev. Stephen Smith, the elder in charge, has also a great revival going on in his church. He informed me that it is the greatest he has ever seen in the church. Many souls are brought to the light of the gospel, and the altar is crowded every night. May the good Lord bless, guide, and conduct the van. There seems to have been a pretty general stir in the church. O that God may speed her on her journey.

The Rev. Michael Sluby, of the Smyrna Circuit, Delaware, has also been conducting a revival for the good Lord. All hail to the King of Kings.

APPOINTMENTS FOR BETHEL CHURCH.

On Sabbath, the 30th inst., preaching will be held in the above place in the following order:—Rev. S. T. Jones, of Harrisburg, Pa., at 10½ o'clock, A. M.; Rev. E. Weaver, General Book Steward, at 3 o'clock, P. M.; subject, "Only take heed to thyself, and keep thy soul diligently, lest thou forget the things which thine eyes have seen, and lest they depart from thy heart all the days of thy life; but teach them to thy sons and thy sons' sons." Rev. J. C. Gibb, of the Presbyterian, at 7½ o'clock, P. M.

J. WOODLIN, Elder in charge.

ZION MISSION CHURCH.

Rev. J. Woodlin, of Bethel Church, will preach on Sabbath at 10½ o'clock, A. M.

NOTICE.

The M. E. Conference has been in session for something more than a week in this city, and adjourned on Friday night.

MONTHLY REPOSITORY

The Monthly Repository, Vol. IV., No. 3, for March, has made its appearance. We have scanned it over slightly, and we think this number the best of any one we have seen of the monthly. It has both original matter and selections. We find three articles from Bishop Payne, as follows: "Religion of Nature and Religion of Grace," "The Dream," (Villeman,) and "God is Eternal," (to children.)

The Editor (Rev. John M. Brown) speaks of the Recorder being burthened with the Episcopal question. This number of the Repository is pretty well laden with the Bishop's General Conference and the Canadian question; and, from the remarks of the Editor, he intends to continue the discussion of the subject. We think the article of Rev. J. P. Campbell, of this week, in relation to the duty of our Bishops, in calling a Bishop's Council, which ought to be called by "Bishops Quinn and Payne," is of good common sense, and is just what we said in our last number. It is true we have been neutral upon the subject, but not because we knew nothing about the affair, for we profess to know all about it from the beginning to the end; and when the proper step shall have been taken, then, if it is necessary, we shall speak out

VISIT TO BURLINGTON.

Last Sabbath morning, in company with Bishop Nazrey, we took the boat for Burlington, N. J., and arrived about 10 o'clock, A. M. We wended our way to the church, and as we came in close proximity our ears were saluted with sweet voices echoed to God and the Lamb. We ascended to the main audience room, when we found that it was a love feast. The Rev. Joseph Smith, the elder in charge, who was sitting in the pulpit, caught our person as the door was opened, and descended from the pulpit, meeting us at the front of the altar with friendly smiles, shaking our hands, and invited us to take our seats in the pulpit, which we did. The members and friends lost no time in speaking, which, by the way, was very interesting. This was a strong evidence that God is the same everywhere. Our soul felt much lifted up on hearing so many of the old gray-headed fathers and mothers speak with such unshaken confidence of the love of the blessed Jesus shed abroad in their hearts, and the anchored hope they had in the Christian rest. After the love feast closed, there being some eight or ten minutes before preaching, the elder in charge, (Rev. (Rev. J. H. Smith) and the Bishop, held a council in the pulpit; and, behold, to our great astonishment, they fixed upon us to speak in the morning and at night. We were expecting the Bishop would lead in the morning, but, however, we being loyal, obeyed. We exhorted them to God and the Lamb, and afterwards Bishop Nazrey administered the Lord's Supper. There was undoubtedly a good feeling in the house. At 3 o'clock, P. M., the Bishop preached a very excellent discourse from the following text:—"There is a river, the streams whereof make glad the city of God," &c. The Bishop got pretty warm, and, indeed, he said that he felt more like old times than he had for a long time. The good Lord seemed to have been with the Bishop. At 7½ o'clock we preached. There was a good feeling all the time. The Burlington people are a fine people, and we were glad to find them so much attached to their minister. This is what we love to see. When a minister is sent to a station or circuit, let him be a blessing to the people, for that is what gospel ministers are for. The congregation is engaged in prayer for Brother Smith, that he may be returned to them again. And, by the way, they want Burlington a station, which we believe ought to be one, and hope that our Conference will make it one. There are several more places which ought to be made into stations, viz.: Trenton, Bordentown, Gouldtown, and Salem. These places we believe would do much better as a station than to remain as they are. We would not want any better field for operation than any one of the above mentioned places. In the conclusion of the remarks upon our visit, we would just say that the Rev. W. D. W. Schureman's wife is lying very low, and not expected to live many days. We made her some three calls while in Burlington, and she informed me that all was well, and that she was just waiting for Jesus. We can greatly sympathise with Brother Schureman.

THE FRIENDS' REVIEW.

We are happy to receive, as an exchange, The Friends' Review. The copy we have is Vol. XV No. 29. The Editor is our friend, Samuel Rhoads, and is well fitted for that position. We have not been able to read it entire, but what we have examined we are well pleased with the matter and the manner of arrangement. It is published weekly at No 109, North Tenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa Price, $2 00 per annum.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

MINISTERIAL NEWS

BISHOP WHITTINGHAM, of the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of Maryland, has sent to all the ministers in pastoral charges under his care, a Prayer of Thanksgiving for the late victories of the national arms, to be used by them within eight days after being received. This Bishop cannot have much sympathy with secessionism.

Rev. JOHN L. LENHART, of the Methodist Church, and a chaplain in the United States Navy, was lost from on board the frigate Cumberland in the unhappy conflict with the Merrimac, near Hampton Roads, on Sabbath, the 9th inst.

Rev. N. O. BENTON, Chaplain of the Fifty-first Regiment of New York Volunteers, was wounded in the battle at Newbern, N. C., on Friday, the 14th inst., and has since died of the wound.

Rev. GEORGE WILLARD, late of the Protestant Episcopal Church, has left that denomination and been received into the Presbytery of Kalamazoo, Michigan.

EMANCIPATION AND ITS OPPOSITION

Much has been said, and still is being said, amongst those who are really opposed to freedom. All sorts of schemes are resorted to for the purpose of impeding and obstructing God's righteous plans to bring about emancipation, but truth, like its Author, (God,) must prevail. Let us notice some of the most inhuman and frivolous objections made, as follows:—

1. It is claimed by the opponents of God's righteous plan to bring about this essential movement for emancipation, that, if the slaves were all set free, they would all flock to the North, become paupers, indigent, and worthless. Certainly not; don't every cool, candid, and impartial man know that if the slaves were set free in the South, and they knew that they were free, that ninety-nine out of every hundred would remain just where they are and till the ground? Most assuredly they would. It would be quite the reverse, for the colored men and women would flock from the North to the South, and many of the whites would do likewise. Hence it is clearly to be seen that this objection goes to the ground for the want of common sense.

2. It is said that the two races can never live together on this continent. Why? Have they not been living together for more than a century? Did not the two races stand side by side in fighting for this country? Did not General Jackson declare, in his proclamation to the people of color, that if they would help the whites to quell the foe that they all should be free men, and stand upon one common platform? Did not God declare that out of one blood he made all nations? We answer he did. Where is the man of truth, candor, honesty, and impartiality who will dare to deny the above facts. Can we wonder that there are so many who claim to be infidels when these plain and simple truths are denied by men of high rank?

3. It is also claimed by others, that, in case the United States' Congress should declare all men free, that there would be a mixing of the races. Why, bless my life, that is just the plan to put a stop to it. There are many things that might and could be said on this subject. We were born in the South, and we have a pretty good knowledge of what the slaves as a mass would do, and for a proof of it we refer those who differ from us to the black emancipated. The distinguished C. M. Clay, of Kentucky, set all of his slaves free, and they all stayed South and worked for pay. This is the truth.

This is the first time that we have said anything about the matter before the public, and we have hardly touched what we can say about it.

THE CHRISTIAN RECORDER.

To the friends of the Christian Recorder, and all others who desire so to be, permit us to say that it yet lives, and regularly makes its way every week to its attentive readers, and we are proud to say that there is no paper read more in proportion to the circulation than the Christian Recorder, either in the city or out of it, but more especially as a weekly visitor. The friends are coming up from every direction, which is a strong evidence of its being well liked, but it does not come up so strong but what it might come up more so. Let every preacher, class leader, steward, trustee, and Sabbath School superintendent say that the Christian Recorder, the only organ of the church, shall live, and it will live. Where is Baltimore city, with probably near two thousand members, and with her four stationed pastors? We are sorry to say it. The truth is a pretty thing indeed. We have not a single subscriber in the whole city of Baltimore! Washington, Georgetown, and Port Deposit are all doing what they can. Baltimore, what is the matter? Have you seceded? Louisville, Ky., and St. Louis, Mo., in the South, are doing, as they say, what they can, and show that they are loyal to the Union, and we hope that Baltimore will show herself so in the future by sending up two or three hundred subscribers more or less. We are very sorry to hear of the indisposition of our active and beloved Brother Waters, who used to take from fifty to one hundred copies per week, but since he has been sick there has not been anything done. We are in hopes to hear of better things soon. I heard Rev. Bishop Payne make a remark to this effect, when preaching the late Rev. Dr. Bias' funeral sermon: "That if you want to know a man, live in the house with him." The Bishop had lived in the house with the Dr., therefore he could speak truthfully of him. The Recorder is published in the city of Philadelphia. The citizens love the Recorder, and they prove it by subscribing, giving advertisements, and donations.

YOUTH'S EVANGELIST.

This is the name of a most interesting Sabbath School paper. Its variety of new and rich cuts are quite numerous. Mr. James M. Ferguson is the Editor and Proprietor. We have examined the Evangelist, and we can say that the matter is well adapted to the use of any Sabbath School. We would recommend our churches to patronize the Youth's Evangelist. The prices are reasonable:—For a single copy, twice a month, 35 cents, four copies to one address, $1.00; specimen copies sent free of charge. Those desiring to subscribe for this excellent paper can address JAMES M. FERGUSON, Box 518, Philadelphia, Pa.

FOR THE CONTRABANDS.

The African M. E. Church (Bethel) has taken up for the benefit of the Port Royal contrabands, on last Sabbath, $100. This shows clearly that the colored people are not asleep as a church. They had another meeting on the night of the 27th inst.

WENDELL PHILLIPS.

On last Wednesday evening at Concert Hall, that renowned orator and distinguished advocate of human freedom, Wendell Phillips, addressed a large and highly intelligent audience, on "the war and the times."

The prolonged applause which greeted the lecturer as he appeared on the platform, and which frequently interrupted the course of his remarks, attested the enthusiasm of the audience as well as their cordial approbation of his views.

But a few months ago Mr. Phillips was hooted through the streets of Boston by a mob, and assailed with a shower of brick-bats for having expressed the views which to-day render him one of the most popular men in the political world. His having recently spoken at Washington, is at once an evidence of the radical change which has occurred in public opinion on the subject of slavery, and an indication of the future triumph of the principles of common justice and humanity.

Eloquence with him is nature, not art: it is a part of himself. In him there is neither rhetorical affectation, nor theatrical rant. On the contrary, his usual attitude is stiff, and his gesticulation is, perhaps, ill-timed and awkward; occasionally, his eyes kindle and lips part in a smile, but in general his countenance wears a placid, earnest expression. But his clear, mellow tones and copious flow of words; his terse and vigorous style and apt modes of expression; his startling historical parallels, and his keen insight into human nature;—these are among the elements that constitute the charm of his oratory.

The reports of the lecture which have appeared in our daily papers are garbled and meager indeed.

The report of the Press represents Mr. Phillips to have said the public generally were indebted to the New York papers for their news. He, however, said nothing of the kind, but in alluding to Washington City, he did state that the people there obtained the most of their news from the New York papers.

From the same report one would naturally infer that the speaker had been coldly received and frequently hissed; but on the contrary his allusions to the "Quaker guns" at Manassas, and his withering sarcasms as applied to General Mc Clellan, were hailed with rounds of deafening applause. What would have been thought, asked the lecturer, of a Napoleon with an army of a quarter of a million men on the shores of the Potomac, remaining for months in blissful ignorance of the existence of wooden cannon at Manassas? The tumult which followed, fairly shook the walls, and furnished sufficient proof of the unanimity between the speaker and his auditors.

The following dilemma also elicited loud plaudits: General Mc Clellan either was ignorant of the existence of those wooden guns at Manassas, or he was not. If he was ignorant of their existence it does not redound to his credit; if he was not, he deserves to be censured for having allowed the enemy to make good his escape.

The lecture occupied an hour and a half in its delivery, and was probably the most brilliant that Mr. Phillips has ever delivered. There are doubtless, thousands in this city who would be delighted to hear the lecture on Toussaint L'ouverture, and it is to be hoped that its author will one day repeat it in Philadelphia.

THE COLORED PEOPLE AND THE STATE LEGISLATURES.

MR. EDITOR:—Several States, including Pennsylvania, have introduced in their Legislatures bills prohibiting colored persons coming into them to settle. These legislations, says the Philadelphia Ledger, succeed each other with great rapidity, and cannot, therefore, be the result of different political bias; but are caused mainly by the silent workings of the law of races, quickened by redundant population, and the fact that the arable lands of the United States are mostly already taken up. These repellant forces, says the Ledger, must continue to swell as the white population grows from the thirty million of to-day to the one hundred million in 1900, and to the two hundred million in 1930. And then asks Will not the next move be to expel these descendants of Africa? I answer first, that these legislative acts, succeeding each other with rapidity, are no evidence that they are not the result of political bias, but rather that they are the concerted acts of politicians. These legislations have always had three objects in view. The first was to conciliate the Slave States; the second was retaliation on what is called abolition fanaticism; and third, to excite the prejudices of the laboring whites against the free negroes.

Secondly: this rebellion threatens the interest of a large class of persons interested in slavery, both north and south, and these enactments are intended at the present to encumber and obstruct the General Government on the subject of emancipation. These interested classes influence in some way the State Legislatures, or certain members of them, to get those bills passed. If we watch the petitions, and then the debates that follow their presentation, we are struck very forcibly with the idea that they have not been sprung on certain men, for they show their complicity, and are those generally who have the most abhorrent idea of free negroes.

By the silent law of races, I suppose, is meant the brutal antagonism which impels the stronger and barbarous races to subject and rule over their weaker neighbors, or make the weaker melt away before the withering contact of the stronger. But does the Ledger know that there is really a higher law, to which the civilized world is rapidly tending—the law of love, justice and humanity? Such sentiments as those uttered by the Ledger will be regarded as libels upon the humanity of the Christian world. The world is silently, but certainly, marching onward to a higher and nobler destiny. If the arable lands are taken up, and there is redundant population, as the Ledger says, why has not the circumscribing and restrictive lines of slavery, which says to free labor, thus far and no farther shalt thou come, quickened those Legislatures to demand more space as an outfit for population? No, Mr Editor, straws show from whence the wind blows, the vail is too flimsy, men see through it, and know every move behind it. If these Legislatures have not been quickened to ask and demand more space, the moral sentiment of the people demands that the wicked system of human bondage shall cease from among them, and this wicked rebellion, which distracts the land from one end to the other, has grown out of the contact of slavery, and its attendant horror with this very moral element. This fight is not an unmeaning retaliation, but a revolution of ideas, deep in the moral sentiments of the people—the monster evil grappling for supremacy, and the people resisting its demands. We will see which will survive the ordeal, Liberty or Slavery. The repellent forces, continues the Ledger, must continue to act with more and more vehemence as the population increases, until the negroes are expelled from the land. This might have some force, perhaps, if the civilized world was going backward. But taking the past as a guide for the future, unless slavery and barbarism shall overthrow the institutions of freedom, the American people will not, in 1930, be found chasing a few unarmed and harmless negroes through the States of this Union, sword in hand to expel them; and, perhaps, persons who make public such declarations at the present, should they be permitted to live until then, would desire to conceal the sheet on which the declaration was written. Slavery has stayed the progress of the civilization of the world, and the downfall of slavery will only intensify men's desire for free and liberal institutions. Already the drifting sentiment of Christian denominations points with unerring certainty to that fact. By the rebellion of this hour, the Christian churches stand disenthralled. The pent up fire of our holy religion has been under the bone of governmental compromises to the behests of slavery, to what has in many respects been regarded as a Christian duty for peace sake; but now the obstruction has been removed. The rebellion has roused the Church. She will light up the moral heavens with her radiance, and teach man a better Christianity. With Christianity, liberal governments, and the appliances of civilization with the common destiny of mankind before us, with his disposition to assimilate, what beacon or repellent forces, or his inhuman instincts? The men who are bruted over the land and branded as fanatics at this day, when the history of the struggle between liberty and oppression is written, perhaps, it will only be said of them, that they were in advance of their generation in civilization. A. FIELD.

SABBATH-SCHOOLS.

Jacksonville, Ill., March 14th, 1862.

MR. EDITOR:—As I know you to be a true friend to the Sabbath-school cause, Sir, I suppose you would like to hear what we are doing in the way of Sabbath-schools in Jacksonville. Rev. Sir we truly have an interesting Sabbath-school here, of from forty to forty-five scholars, and six teachers; a very interesting Bible-class, of single and married ladies; and two interesting classes of young people in the New Testament, and the other minor classes. Our Sabbath-school is one of the most interesting I have been in. We now have a concert connected with our Sabbath-school, which makes it very interesting. Its officers consist of a President, Vice President and Secretary. Our Sabbath-school concert meets on the second Sabbath in every month, and as it has often been remarked that the Sabbath-school is the nursery of the church of God, most assuredly that saying is true. Just look abroad in the world, wherever the gospel is preached, and there see the thousands of little children that are now gathered into the Sabbath-school rooms, and there they are taught to read the word of God, and hundreds of them are gathered out of the streets to Sabbath-school. There is another fact we notice: those children that are brought up in the Sabbath-school are very apt to make the most useful members of church. When those religious principles are taught them while young, Rev. Sir, not only are the youth benefited by the Sabbath-school, but see the thousands of young ladies and gentlemen that are regular scholars in Sabbath-school, and by this means they are brought to attend public worship on the Sabbath day. In the Sabbath-school there are many middle-aged, and even old persons are taught to read the word of God. Now let me say a word to Sabbath-school teachers: be ye faithful, and when time shall be no longer here, may teachers, children and parents all help to swell that number which John saw, that came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. We also have a good day-school. Respectfully yours for the elevation of our young and rising generation of the colored race.

FALSE WITNESS-BEARING.

Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor.

The 9th commandment provides for the security of every man's property, that he may suffer no wrong nor detriment in his goods. This provides for the preservation of his good name, which is a much dearer possession, for a good name, saith the wise man, (Prov. xxii. 1,) is rather to be chosen than great riches. And, therefore, it ought to be preserved and guarded by us, although not delicately and nicely, yet tenderly and with respect; whose contemns fame will soon prostitute virtue, and those who care not what others say, will soon arrive to such impudence in sinning as not to care what they do themselves.

Indeed, a good name is so excellent a blessing that there is but one thing to be preferred before it, and that is, a good conscience. When these two stand in competition, credit must give place to duty, and in this case it is far better to lose our repute with men, than our acceptance and reward with God. It oftentimes so happens through the ignorance and general corruption of mankind that what is honest and pure and just, is yet not of good report amongst them. Piety is but affectation; strictness of life a peevish hypocrisy; the cross a scandal; Christ himself a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners, his doctrine heresy, and his miracles impostures; and if thou lightest upon any such froward and perverse censures—as too many such there are in all ages—who think it strange, as the Apostle speaks, that ye run not with them to the same excess of riot: speaking evil of you, seek not by any base and sinful compliance to redeem their good opinion; but rather glory in the testimony of their railing, and account all their reviling speeches to be but so many votes for your blessedness. Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall speak all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake. Matt. v. 11.

Never covet a good name by bad actions; for what will all the concurring applause of the whole world signify to thee, if yet thy conscience condemn thee louder than they can extol thee. This is but to have music at the door. When all the while there is chiding and brawling within, it is far better that others should wound thy credit than thou thy conscience. That is a wound which their tongues can never lick whole again. All the reputation thy popular sinning can bring thee will be but like hanging bells at a horse's ears when all the while his back is galled with his burden.

Whoever will be a Christian must resolve to go through bad report as well as good; he should desire the one, but not anxiously refuse the other. And if any bespatter him, let him be careful that it be only with their own dirt, and not with his, with their own malice, not his miscarriages; and whilst he thus keeps his conscience clear, he may be assured that his credit shall be cleared apart that day when all their unjust reproaches shall but add a crown and diadem of glory to his head. But where a good name is consistent with a good conscience, we ought to prize and value it as one of the choicest of God's blessings in this world, and to use all lawful means to preserve it, for a good name will render a man more serviceable to God, and the fitter instrument to promote his honor and glory in the world, and, therefore, the wise man Eccles. vii. 1, compares a good name to precious ointment,—diffuses its fragrancy through the room where it is poured forth, and affecting all that are in the room with its delightful odor. So do men's gifts when they are famed with a good name delight and attract others, and by a sweet and powerful charm allure them to imitate and practice those virtues which they see to be so commendable, and, therefore, we find it the Apostle's care (2 Cor. vi. 3,) to give no offence in anything, that the ministry might not be blamed, though it be our great folly to estimate men's counsels by their own practice. Since a diseased physician may prescribe some wholesome medicine, yet so it comes to pass.

TWO CENT MONEY.

We call the special attention of the brethren to page 210, New Discipline, in relation to the two-cent money, and especially to the 16th paragraph under the same page. We do hope that all of our brethren having charge of circuits and stations will obey the General Conference of our beloved Zion, and commence in time to collect their two-cent money, and if the brethren have so far obeyed the law by making a collection every month, or every two months, we are quite sure that there will be a change in matters pertaining to our financial department. Suppose that Bethel Church, of Philadelphia, with over two hundred members, (we will say twelve hundred, though there is said to be some fifteen hundred,) should comply with the request; twenty-five times twelve would be three hundred dollars,)—and this, it will be remembered, is only twenty-five cents a head. At the very lowest estimate, this is what Bethel Church will owe us at our Annual Conference.

The Union Church, placing the membership at two hundred, at twenty-five cents each, will be fifty dollars. Baltimore (Md.) Bethel Church has about twelve hundred members; suppose that she is caused to do her duty—that the minister should feel it his duty to see that each member pays his or her twenty-five cents per year; there would be three hundred dollars due the Book Steward, to be appropriated as per Discipline. Ebenezer Church has at least two hundred members, and twenty-five times two hundred is fifty dollars.

Now here would be seven hundred dollars,—leaving out Washington, New York, Brooklyn, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Louisville, Indianapolis, Chicago, and St. Louis, and besides hundreds of churches on circuits, and other stations where brethren are. If brethren will only do what the regulations of the Church have demanded of them, all would be well. We believe that there is not a member in our Church but what would consider it a great insult to say that they were too poor to pay the small sum of twenty-five cents a year for the benefit of the Book Concern and of our brethren who have labored hard to carry the glad tidings of the gospel to the dying world.

We are glad to see that Rev. Bishop Nazrey has notified all of his Conferences and members to come prepared to give a good account of themselves. So you may look well to the eastern brethren, and govern yourselves accordingly; for if he enforces the law, which he is bound to, somebody's head may have to come off. We hope that the other Bishops will do the same.

SOMETHING FOR THEODORE TO CONSIDER FROM MOSES.

A.

Let Theodore consider—is an intelligent man to be condemned for maintaining that two contrary propositions can never be so reconciled as to place a man under a moral obligation to support them, as both being equally true at the same time?

B.

Let Theodore consider if it is an unheard of thing for a man to own two horses and one carriage at the same time, and that he should harness them together—hitch them to that carriage—seat himself in it, and drive them both at the same time for his own accommodation and comfort. Again, would his friend be justly censurable who defends him in his legal right to the ownership of the horses and carriage, and the right to drive them at pleasure while the legal right remains?

C.

Let Theodore consider this assumed proposition—namely: The eagles and lions met together, in conventions, for a long time, under the general name of animals—having three kingly rulers over them, all of whom were eagles. In process of time the lions, for reasons best known to themselves, asked leave of the Convention, at one of its meetings, to withdraw from it, and form a separate government of their own, under the generic name of lions. This prayer was granted. The lions farther asked that one of the kingly eagles might be allowed to withdraw from the convention of eagles, and reign king over them. This petition the eagles would not grant. And they, by resolution, refused to give the lions one of their kings. But instead of giving the lions one of their kings to reign over them, they pass a resolution by which they appoint one of their kings to serve the lions, according to the wishes of the lions. The lions, in giving expression to their wishes, say that they wish him to serve them as long as he lives. This request is most solemnly granted by the eagles. Now, if at any time subsequent to the last named act, the eagles should repent their bargain, and want to take the services of their kingly eagle from the lions, or else deprive him of the right of being called a kingly eagle, would his friend be justly blameworthy if he should defend the rights of the king against the assaults and attacks of the eagles upon this kingly eagle of their own troops? If they are not satisfied, is he the party to be blamed?

D.

Let Theodore consider, that the maxim, "No man can serve two masters," involves no contradiction of the fact that a man may have two or more masters at the same time. The history of the world shows that the thing may and does exist. That maxim was designed to teach this important lesson—that no man can have and enjoy a just and right state of feelings or affections toward two objects of opposite characters and designs, as opposite as God and Satan—the work of God and the work of the devil—the love of God and the love of the world. But here is no contradiction of the notion that a man may have two masters at one and the same time.

E.

Let Theodore consider the following most ridiculous affair:—

Two men made a bargain about a threshing machine. Both were owners of it between them as common partners. One of the parties, A., sold his right to the other, B. The bargain was so curiously made that, if B. chose, he could justly claim all the time and use of the machine without A. having any other claim, save that of being part owner. At this state of things, A. became dissatisfied, when he saw what a foolish bargain he had made. Becoming very angry about the matter, A. declared, and went to war against the threshing machine, and continued his war upon the machine until he fell down, also upon the battle-field, before a sharp threshing instrument, having teeth. Who ever heard before of such ignorance? Did you ever before hear two parties making a bargain about a thing, and then becoming dissatisfied with the bargain, going to war with the thing about the contract made between the two parties? MOSES.

MR. EDITOR:—Sir, we are yet alive, thank the Lord, and have a portion of health and strength allotted us. Spring has returned, and the sun is pouring forth his glory over the earth. Seed time and harvest is coming, and we are glad. Though war has sounded long and loud, yet we live. Hard times with pinch and want have surrounded us, and still we live. We hope for better days. When war shall cease with the nation, and confusion in the church, then peace will be in the land, and love among Christians. God is in the midst of his people, beholding the evil and the good. He knows them that are his, and will keep them in time of trouble. There is nothing escapes His omniscience. Men may despise His law, and transgress His commands, but the wicked shall not go unpunished. He says by the mouth of His holy prophet, "The lofty looks of man shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of man shall be made low, and the Lord God alone shall be made exalted in that day." It is not worth while, therefore, to think that we will do as we please. There is the law, and it must be obeyed, both the higher law of God, and the law of the land. Let controversy cease, then, and let God, the laws, and Christians settle all difficulties; then we shall have the columns of our paper for a more noble and glorious purpose. As Christians, we may do the will of God, and then we shall live and prosper. I will close this communication by wishing you great success, Mr. Editor, hoping your untiring efforts may be backed up by the abundant aid and assistance of the public.

Yours in Christ, WILLIAM H. CHASE.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CORRESPONDENCE.

Last Sabbath was a day long to be remembered in Georgetown. Not only on account of the attendance of the people, but the manifestation of the goodness of God. In the morning the pastor preached. The most interesting feature was the sermon at night, of the great preacher, poet, and orator, Rev. C. W. Dennison; he spoke an hour and a half, and every one was sorry when he stopped. He argued the equality of the human race, the iniquity of slavery—pictured in glowing colors its final overthrow—the prospect of the colored people for freedom—their duties to themselves and their God. Another important feature was that a very large collection was taken up for the preacher's salary; and the most important of all was that the Spirit of God seemed to be moving upon the people.

The young men of our church in Georgetown recently purchased a handsome gas chandelier at a cost of $54, which they presented to the church on last Wednesday night. The presentation speech was made by Mr. John Ferguson, the response on behalf of Trustees by the pastor; a collection of $10 was lifted on the occasion.

On Monday night, 23d instant, Rev. C. W. Dennison of the U. S. N., lectured to the colored people of Israel Church. In the course of his remarks, he said, "I see Lynch is at hand, with the REPOSITORY and Repository, which I hail with delight—they are organs that are a credit to you—to-day I showed the Repository to a senator; he looked upon it as an argument in favor of emancipation. I had it while in Congress; members looked at it with delight. The RECORDER, too, edited by Weaver, who works the shuttle, and brings forth mental raiment in symmetry and beauty to adorn the mind. I hope Lynch will administer 'Lynch law' to the man who does not rally in behalf of these organs." These were his words; we followed in the same strain and sold all the RECORDERS on the spot—could have sold 200. I should have said, that this gentleman has written a letter to the New York Evening Post and Commercial Advertiser, making mention of these and other efforts and facts creditable to our people.

The Bishop is in Washington. The Wesleyan Conference meets here on the 15th proximo. With our Wesleyan brethren, we hold a warm Christian intercourse—they are not selfish. We could wish that they might be blessed more abundantly in their labors.

Rev. Alexander Crummell is here. We trust this learned divine will say just as little about Africa, at this present time, as he can. When a strong party is forming in the nation to banish from the shores of America the colored man, because there is a prospect of his chains falling off, it is no time to lead directly or indirectly any aid to the scheme of sending the colored people out of the country. No more at present. SACRA.

BISHOP NAZREY, OR THE TRUE STATE OF THE CASE.

In the 63d number of the CHRISTIAN RECORDER, vol. 2d, we have seen the beginning of an article from Rev T. Strother, of Terre Haute, on "The discovery of inconsistencies continued." We propose to write a short rejoinder to that article, if need be, when we have seen the end of his long and tedious, dark and gloomy story.

We conceive in our minds that the question, What relation does Rev Willis Nazrey sustain to the A. M. E. Church? has been already sufficiently discussed for all practical purposes in a newspaper discussion. Three different answers have been returned to that question; and by the critical investigation of these, the bottom has been most assuredly fathomed.

The only thing now remaining to be done is one of the following alternatives, viz.:

First. All parties who are not immediately interested and concerned in his administration, let Bishop Nazrey alone in the full and peaceable enjoyment of all the rights and privileges conferred upon him by the General Conference of the A. M. E. Church, and, also, by the Episcopal arrangements of the Bishops, made at the General Conference for 1860. We have no fears that Bishop Nazrey will ever be found engaged in an attempt to subvert, alter, change, overthrow, and annihilate the doctrines and disciplines, government and usages, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church.

Secondly. Let the three Bishops, Quinn, Nazrey, and Payne, meet in a Bishops' council, as they really ought, and are in duty bound to do, and amicably settle it. If there be any difficulty found by them in the Episcopal relation of Rev.

Willis Nazrey. This should be done on or before the meeting of the first one of our Annual Conferences to be held for 1862

Thirdly. If the Bishops meet in council as they should do, on or before the meeting of the first Annual Conference for 1862, and they learn at that meeting that they cannot agree upon such terms as will give to them and all parties concerned mutual satisfaction, let them agree to recommend to the Special General Conference to meet at a given time and place, especially to settle this and other questions to be named in the call.

Is there anything unreasonable, unchristian, or unholy in these propositions? If there be anything of the kind, we await an answer from our bishops and elders, or from some one of them having authority, and who understands the subject.

Port Royal Contrabands.—At a meeting held on Wednesday evening, at the Philadelphia Institute, by the Executive Committee of the Statistical Association of Colored People, of this city, the following resolutions were passed, which were read at the close of a concert by the Hutchinson Family last evening, given in aid of the escaped slaves at Port Royal:

Resolved, That the claims of the "Contrabands" in the vicinity of Port Royal and elsewhere call loudly upon the friends of humanity for material aid and sympathy.

Resolved, That while there is reason to regret that the Government has not more fully defined the status of those poor creatures, nevertheless it is clearly the duty of the Social, Civil and Statistical Association of the Colored People of Pennsylvania, not only to render aid as an organization, but also to commend these sufferers to the consideration of the various colored churches and societies of this city and State, that they may co-operate in the noble work of helping the Freemen's Association or other proper enterprises, which have undertaken to furnish food, clothing, and teachers, moral and religious, so much needed to relieve immediate distress and to inspire them with hopes of final deliverance.

Resolved, That we cannot lose sight of the Act of Congress, passed at its extra session, or of those proclamations emanating from the several Generals and Commanders of the Army, in which freedom has been declared to the slaves of all parties siding directly or indirectly the rebellion.

Resolved, That in view of these acts, the slaves cannot (in our judgment) be considered other than FREEMEN.

PIETY

"Impress the sacred things in one of the first lessons a pious parent will teach his child. It is noticed that a well trained child when talking about God, will pronounce that adorable name in a subdued and solemn tone. It is noticed also that he will soon learn to assume a reverential air while a blessing is asked at the table—that he will lay aside his toys and look thoughtful when the Scriptures are read, and the morning or evening prayer is offered—that he will learn to handle the Bible or hymn book with more care than any other volume—and to assume and maintain more seriousness on Sabbath than on any other day of the week. This reverence for sacred things is greatly increased when he becomes old enough to study the catechism, in which he is taught that the third commandment is violated, not only when people "curse, swear, lie, or deceive, in the name of God," but even when they "treat irreverently any of the institutions or ordinances of God." This feeling moreover is increased to a still higher pitch when he reads of the terrible displeasure which God has ever shown against persons who made a profane use of sacred things. The Philistines trifled with the ark of God, and as a punishment were visited with a series of destructive calamities, which well nigh proved their ruin. For only looking into the ark, the inhabitants of Bethshemesh were smitten of the Lord until more than fifty thousand of them were slain. For touching it, when he had no right to lay his hand upon it, poor Uzzah was struck dead with a blow from heaven. For plundering the temple of God, and carrying its sacred vessels to Babylon to be devoted to profane uses there, Nebuchadnezzar was deprived of his kingdom, and driven from the abodes of men to eat grass like an ox in the fields. For impiously quaffing wine, during a Bacchanalian feast, from these sacred vessels, in honor of his gods, Belshazzar was compelled to gaze upon a mysterious hand, writing upon the wall the sentence of his doom, the very tracing of which, without the knowledge of its meaning, made him grow as pale as death, and tremble till his knees smote together. The lamb-like Jesus could allow himself to be stoned, and spit upon, and reviled, and crowned with thorns, and mocked in his dying agonies, without uttering a word of complaint. But when he saw the sacred temple profaned by secular merchandise, his holy indignation was roused to such a height, that he collected a bundle of whips, and at once drove the mercenary traffickers terror-stricken from the place, sounding in their ears, as he applied the whips to their backs, "It is written, My Father's house shall be called the house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves." For eating and drinking irreverently at the table of the Lord, some of the Corinthian Christians ate and drank judgment to themselves, becoming sickly, and dying, on account of the sacrilege

All these examples show that God has drawn a distinct line between sacred and profane things, and that it is exceedingly dangerous to attempt to blot out that line, and act as though it had n ver been drawn. It is true, some of these examples are extreme, and there may be but few people anywhere who would now be guilty of the sacrilege they exhibit; yet it must be acknowledged that there is at the present day, both in the church and in the world, a growing tendency to irreverence for sacred things. The pulpit, from which nothing but solemn truth should emanate, is often changed into a rostrum, from which flashes of wit, and flights of fancy, and floods of stories, are poured forth, to amuse, astonish, and "bring down the house." The singers who lead off in the praises of God, will often borrow the affected style of the opera, and drown all devotional feeling by the horrid incongruity. And the congregation, in some instances, as soon as the psalm or hymn is announced, will irreverently turn their backs upon the altar, and gaze upon the gallery, as though the singers were a troupe of actors and actresses, and they themselves had come together for no higher purpose than to witness the performances. Thus, irreverence for sacred things is cultivated in the most sacred places, and what is no less deplorable, it is becoming cultivated in other places, under the specious pretence, made by worldly-minded people, of showing respect to religion and the religious community. The managers of secular concerts, in order to get the approval and patronage of the Church, will announce, that while the audience will be entertained by a number of natural and sentimental songs, there will also be mingled among them a number of sacred hymns. Thus they hope to give the church and the world, God and Mammon, both a chance!

We believe that sacred music is appropriate in a concert But then it must be employed to the exclusion of every other kind that is trifling and ludicrous It must not be sung by persons who have condescended to borrow the ridiculous style of costume often worn by theatrical performers And when it is sung by them, alternated with such songs as have been mentioned above, the performance becomes revolting to every Christian mind, and a direct insult to high Heaven. It is just as great a sacrilege to bring this very solemn part of the worship of God's house into such unhallowed associations, as it was for Belshazzar to bring the sacred vessels of the temple into his Bacchanalian feast. And it matters not how good the intentions of those engaging in it are, the sacrilege remains. We are not authorized to "do evil that good may come." We are not allowed, even with good intentions, to trifle with the holy things of God. Uzzah's intention in laying hold of the ark was to steady it and keep it from being harmed by the rough jolting it received on the cart, but still his good intention did not save for the sacrilege, and he was instantly smitten to the earth. The people who sold doves, sheep, and oxen, in the temple, doubtless intended them for sacrificial purposes, but still they incurred the sore displeasure of Jesus for profaning his Father's house.

Domestic Items.

From the Army at Winchester, Va.—Winchester, March 20.—A portion of Gen. Shields' reconnoissance has returned from Strasburg.

Jackson is reported to be near Mount Jackson.

Last night, the provost marshal made an unexpected descent upon a gambling house recently opened at Winchester, and arrested four of the proprietors and several army officers who were present. The latter were released on parole, but the proprietors were placed in jail. The apparatus and other property of the establishment, valued at $500, were also captured.

Winchester, March 21st.—Mr. William Prescott Smith, with other officers of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, went over the road to Martinsburg on Friday. They expect that section to be opened by the 1st of April.

They also made arrangements to permanently open the Potomac and Winchester road.

Snow, to the depth of an inch and a half, fell last night, and is still falling.

Speculations on the Future.—There must be a great battle and many slain, but we must gain it and occupy Richmond. The capital in our possession, Virginia is once more within the Union, and the war assumes another phase.

When we drive the rebellion within the Cotton States, the war no longer becomes a war of pitched battles. Virginia, Tennessee, and Kentucky, are just the States to fight in. They are fruitful, productive, well cultivated, and wealthy. An army in these States can be self-sustaining. Plundered Virginia, along the eastern counties, will show how armies manage to live on the people around them. In Carolina no army could live for a year as the army of Beauregard did at Manassas. It would exhaust the State. It could not be readily supplied, as the means of transportation are very limited and primeval. Once conquer Virginia, and embrace within the lines of reoccupied territory the States of Tennessee, North Carolina, and Missouri, and this war loses even the character of a rebellion. It makes no longer any pretensions to a Confederacy. Holding no single part, without commerce in a single city, no one line of railroad which controls a single manufacturing district, driven from the mountains, where nature builds masked batteries and strengthens their military power, their army becomes the army of the guerilla, and their boasted government the scattered remnants of a brutal, revengeful, and marauding faction.

This will be the main result of the coming victory in Virginia. It will end the rebellion by virtually ending the great army which has given the rebellion respectability in the eyes of the nations of Europe. This contest will then be no longer one of war, but one of legislation.—Press.

More Iron-Clad Vessels to be Built.—The Secretary of the Navy has made arrangements for constructing a half dozen additional iron-mailed vessels of the style of the Monitor, except that they will be something longer and larger, and the tonnage will probably reach the neighborhood of one thousand tons. The smoke stack is to be heightened, so as to prevent smoke from being blown down and suffocating the crew. With this change, the officers of the Monitor said to Mr. Fox, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, that they had no fear of going to sea in her. Indeed, Mr. Ericsson is preparing specifications for constructing a Monitor-shaped ship which shall be over three hundred feet long. Should this style of iron-clad vessel be the only one fit for seagoing, then we are ahead of the navies of the world. The new vessels are to have turrets a foot thick, of iron, and fifteen-inch Dahlgren guns are to be used in them.

The Rebel Cavalry Seizing Union Men.—March 17.—On Sunday night, a portion of Ashby's Cavalry approached within four miles of the town and impressed every man they could lay hands on to serve in the rebel army. Houses of the inhabitants were visited by them, and the male occupan takes off without scruple. This information come from persons who have escaped, and made the be of their way to Winchester.

Arrivals from Woodstock.—Nine men have just arrived in town who have made their way from the neighborhood of Woodstock, twelve miles south of Strasburg, And thirty from Winchester. They were two or three days getting through, taking to the mountains and secreting themselves whenever anything indicated the proximity of rebel troops. They were in rather a pitiable plight, with little to eat, and seemed to hail the Federal encampment as a haven of rest and safety for them. These men are amply provided for as fast as they arrive. Various other straggiers have arrived here during the past two or three days, and others will, in all probability, be coming in.

Good News from Winchester.—March 23, 10 o'clock, P. M.—We have this day achieved a glorious victory over the combined forces of the rebel Generals, Jackson, Smith, and Longstreet. The battle was fought within four miles of this place. It raged from half-past ten o'clock this morning until dark. The enemy's strength was about fifteen thousand, and the strength of our division was not over eight thousand.

Important News from General Burnside - Immediately after the occupation of Newbern, North Carolina, General Burnside started an expedition to Beaufort, North Carolina, but the place was evacuated before our troops approached.

On the day that General Burnside occupied Newbern, sixteen thousand rebel troops were on the road between Goldsborough and Newbern.

The battle near Winchester was much more disastrous to the rebels than we had supposed, five hundred of them having been killed or wounded, and the survivors have been driven back to Strasburg For thermore, we have made three hundred of them prisoners, and captured, at least, one thousand small arms.

The last mentioned fact will best attest the complete panic into which the enemy were thrown

Our latest intelligence from Island No. 10 is to 3, P. M., of Wednesday last, at which time our gunboats had succeeded in silencing all but two guns of the upper battery. The island is said to be dotted with tents, and the rebels are estimated to number at least twenty thousand. It is almost impossible that they can have held out for this length of time. We are momentarily expecting the news of their surrender.

Foreign Summary.

The state of morals in different countries is strikingly seen in the following, which is taken from official records. In Paris, 38 out of every 100 of the children born are illegitimate; in Munich, 48 per cent. are in this condition; in Vienna, 51, or more than one half, are so; but in London, only 4 out of the 100 are so; and in the United States, less than two in the 100. Why this difference in favor of Protestant and Bible-reading countries?

The Jesuits still live. Late statistics published by their general at Rome, say that their total number at the close of last year (1861) was 7,231, and that of these, 2,203 were Frenchmen. How many are there in the United States?

A sad picture of the condition of the lower classes of the Poor in England is presented in the fact, as stated in the London Spectator, that nearly 200,000 persons are now receiving parish relief. This is four and a half per cent. of the entire population of the country.

The number of Fires in London during last year (1861) was 1,193, of which 53 resulted in the entire destruction of the property ; 7 were very formidable, and 1,133 were slight ones. Accidents in these fires, 100 were caused by gas, 150 by candles, 9 by children playing with fire, 17 by Lucifer matches, 17 by smoking, and only four were proved to be by incendiarism though 14 were suspected to be s

A singular process has sprung up in India of quite exciting interest. As Railroads have opened up, the facilities of travelling are far greater than they were formerly. The question is, how far is the merit of pilgrimages to celebrated shrines effected by this mode of travelling? The priests are discussing it with much ardor.

To the names of Principal Cunningham, Dr. Symington, and others who have recently been called to rest from their labors, must be added that of Rev. Andrew Reed, D. D., whose visit to this country many years since, in company with Rev. Dr. Matheson, will long be remembered, and who died, after being pastor of Wycliffe Chapel, London nearly 40 years. Feb 25th, aged 74 years Also, Rev. James Sherman, of the "Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion," and the gifted and popular successor of Rowland Hill as pastor of Surrey Chapel, London, died in the pastoral charge of a new church at Blackheath, (whither he had retired in 1854,) on Feb. 15, aged 66 years. His preaching was always sought by crowds, and in 1837 he preached a sermon to which 84 persons attributed their saving conversion, as it was accompanied by the Holy Spirit.

Scotch remonstrance is proverbial. It is seldom their simple shrewdness is found at fault. The following is characteristic. Some months since, three dessens of Dumbarton left on a pleasure trip for Paris. After spending the first night in a hotel, one of the party next day took a stroll alone in order to see the sights of the city, but missed his way back to the hotel, the name of which he had forgotten, a predicament rendered worse by his ignorance of the French language. After searching fruitlessly for it for some hours, he hit upon the expedient of purchasing from an old fruit-seller her stock of gooseberries, with which he patrolled the streets, shouting, "Gude Scotch grosets, a penny the pint!" Words so outlandish to Parisian ears soon collected a large crowd round, amongst which was a resident Scotchman, who straightway accosted the amateur fruit-vender, and after learning the "fix" he had got into, piloted him in safety to the hotel.

Efforts are on foot to re-lay a Telegraph Line between Ireland and Newfoundland. Mr. Cyrus W. Field, the leading American operator in this matter, has had an interview at the Foreign Office with Lord Russell on the subject, and it is understood to have been of a very encouraging and satisfactory character.

It is reported that Smith O'Brien has challenged Sir Robert Peel to fight a duel, offering to meet him in Belgium or France.

Mr. Peabody, the very successful American in business in London, has a fortune that brings him an income of seventy thousand pounds sterling per annum. He has just offered to give one hundred thousand pounds to the "Albert Memorial," if the funds that shall be collected for it will be devoted to the erection of a charitable institution. If this is not done, he will expend this amount in building convenient houses for the working classes of London. Truly, this is having money to some good purpose.

In France much distress is reported to be prevailing among the working classes. The Emperor is said to have just sent 250,000 francs out of his own private purse, to be distributed among them at the great industrial centres.

Victor Emmanuel was received at Milan on the 6th instant very enthusiastically by the numerous crowds of people of all classes.

In Bulgaria there has been a great agitation on religious grounds. On account of the intolerant and haughty course of the Greek Patriarch, the Archbishop has seceded from the Greek Church and joined the Roman Catholic. Two thousand two hundred of the Bulgarians had united with him in this, and a great excitement was thus aroused between the two churches

In China things are still in a troubled state. The rebels had invested Shanghai, and the Consuls of the Allied Powers had declared the city now under their protection. If the rebels, therefore, persisted, as in their infatuation it was very probable they would, the most unhappy consequences might follow.

The facilities of communication between London and Paris have become very great and rapid. A person can breakfast in the former city, and sup in the latter—and recently the first edition of the London morning papers has begun to be regularly delivered to readers in Paris in the evening of the same day.

Though late, a movement is on foot to erect at Geneva a memorial of Calvin. Dr. Merle D'Aubigne, and others of the ministers of that city, have sent out a circular to all who in any way sympathize with his doctrinal views, for aid in the work. In this circular it is proposed to have for this memorial a hall erected in a central position on the shores of the lake where he fixed his home, to be used for public meetings, and also for preaching the gospel to the working classes As Calvin forbade any monument to be raised over him, it is thought this would be most in accordance with his spirit and wishes.

Some idea may be formed of the immense naval efforts of Great Britain from the character of the IRON-CLAD ships that she is now erecting. Four are now under orders. Each is 400 feet long, 59½ broad, and will have a tonnage of 6,815. The iron coating will be 5½ inches thick. The outer plates of each vessel will weigh two thousand tons. The armament will be thirty-six 100-pounders on the main deck, twenty-one on the spar deck, two 200-pounders in the bows, and a pivot gun of the same calibre in the stern. Each vessel will cost $2,000,000, will throw its shot nearly five miles, and will require, at least, twenty-six months for its being built.

It should be a matter of grief and execration that the Slave Trade, with all its fiendish horrors, is said to be exceedingly active on the West coast of Africa since the withdrawal of the United States Squadron from those waters. Surely, Spain, and all countries that will tolerate its being carried on, ought to be held to an immediate and strict accountability.

Another desolating and terrible explosion has just taken place in the English Mines. It occurred in the Cathin Coal Pit, which a Mr. Crowsley, an extensive iron master, owned, and where about two hundred men were employed. Fifty lives were destroyed. These occurrences have a most painful frequency.

A rumor is very current in Paris that Archbishop Hughes, of New York, now in Europe, will be strenuously urged by the French Emperor upon the College of Election at Rome for the Popedom on the demise of Pope Pius, now in the Pontifical chair. No man knows better how to promote the interests of the Papacy in this western world than Bishop Hughes.

BEWARE HOW YOU USE IT.

BY THE MOUNTAIN HARP.

"All admit the influence one sex has over the other. None will deny the influence the wife has over the husband, the mother over the son, or the sister over the brother; but while we know that we possess that influence, we should be careful, very careful, how we use it. Men, in the majority of cases, will not be commanded or coerced into any measure. Tenderness, persuasion and affection may and will accomplish much, while a different course will estrange him farther from you. Oh! how the words of a criminal, who was convicted for a state prison offence, now ring in our ears. He said: One kind word, one affectionate look from my wife, would have saved me from this!

The readers of this paper may remember having seen the above quotation under the head which we use, going the rounds of the press, and credited to the Christian Secretary. It is here requoted for the purpose of adding a few remarks, which our lady friends in particular will please note, as not altogether impertinent.

1. The influence of woman, now felt and acknowledged throughout the whole civilized world, is greater than many suppose it is. It is greater than most women seem to be aware, greater than some men allow.

2. That influence is not always properly used. It is sometimes misdirected—it may be knowingly, but oftener, we are persuaded, unreflectingly; and, again, as the case referred to above seems to indicate, merely not exerted at all—which is equivalent to misdirection.

3. That influence misdirected, or not used for good, may be made a most fearful curse. There was a time when "one kind word, one affectionate look" from the criminal's wife, would have saved him. It was denied him, and that denial sent him for years to prison. A young man was visited in his cell, the day before his execution for murder, by his mother. In answer to her tears and sobs, his only answer was, "Mother, you never taught me better."

4. That influence, properly used, may be both to its subject and its object a great blessing Instances are not wanting. How often has the sister reclaimed her falling or fallen brother—the mother her son—the wife her husband!

A woman, rather good-looking, and apparently well-bred, was in town with her drunken husband I happened to meet them in the store of a friend, where they were making some little purchases. She had the money, and he wanted some "change," and appeared anxious to get where something else was sold, though then he could hardly stand. He coaxed, and she teased. At last she gave him the change—twelve and a half cents. I felt sure it was going over another counter. But no—though his hand is on the door-latch, hers is there, too, and she just happens to remember that in his own work-shop at home he needs a gimlet and a little glue, and a few nails; and the twelve and a half cents are invested. The man was rather a rough-looking customer; but for his wife he had only smiles and kind words, perhaps because for him she had only smiles and kind words. That woman will reclaim that man if he can be reclaimed. And, though he be not in all things the man she deserves, she is certainly the very woman for him

MORAL: "Beware how you use it."

THE BIRTH OF THE SNOW DROP.

(Adapted from the German.)

It was on a very gloomy-looking day, while the thick snow was lying on the ground, and the wind was whistling through the naked trees, that an old man stood in the middle of the field. His heavy, gray beard was covered with shining sleet, and icicles were hanging from his long white locks.

Every body who had a home was seated by his warm stove, and telling winter stories to his children; in fact, there were very few persons out of doors, it was so cold. But this old man, though he shivered very much, seemed to like the snow and the bleak winter wind. He had no hat on his head; and, as his eyes looked out over the white fields, and along the winding valleys, and up the white mountain-sides, he smiled, as if saying to himself: "How I love the cold winter!"

But suddenly the smile left his wrinkled face! He shook his head, and the sleet fell from his beard, and the snow-flakes and icicles dropped off from his long gray locks. Then he doubled his fist, and, standing as straight as he could, he shook it at something in the sky. And what was he shaking it at but the bright sun, which was just now peeping out of a dark cloud, and beginning to shoot down warm beams upon the snow-fields and icy-mountains? It was the bright sun that made the old man angry. He shook his fist again; he stamped upon the ground, he spoke bitter words; and then, as he looked at his feet, and saw the snow melting there, great tears rolled down his cheeks. If you had seen the old man, you would have said: "What can make you so angry? How I pity you, you poor old man!"

As he turned his eyes aside, he saw a boy near by him, who had all the while been watching him, and laughing at him. He wore a beautiful green cloak, and had long pink boots on his feet. He had bright blue eyes and rosy cheeks. When the old man saw him, he became more angry than ever.

"What are you doing here?" he asked; "you are an impudent upstart. It seems as if you don't want me to cover the earth, and keep it warm any longer. You are an unruly rebel, and bring trouble and mischief with you wherever you go. What is the use of your waking up the flowers, and butterflies, and grasshoppers so early? Don't you know that the sooner you wake them, the sooner they must die!"

"Why do you bother yourself about these things, you old grumbler?" replied the beautiful boy, "Haven't I got a wreath of flowers on my head, and a bouquet on my breast? and can't I find every where a frozen pond, which will serve me for a looking-glass? Let me attend to my business, and you may attend to yours."

"Oh! you silly boy," the old man answered; "you don't think about anything but your beauty. Why not permit old people, like myself, to enjoy their age in rest and quiet? You not only want to wake up the flowers, and butterflies, and grasshoppers, but you want to put every body to work again. Even the children in their warm cottages you would turn out of doors, and send to school."

"Well, old man, that is my work. You can do nothing but scold and fret all the time. I know well that every living being loves me, and for weeks has been longing to see me, because I have stayed away this time much longer than usual. But I know somebody whom no one loves, and that is you, you snow-bearded old man. You are the enemy of children, and every poor person hates you, and——"

The old man would not let the boy say more, but, stooping down and picking up a handful of snow, threw it into his beautiful face. As quick as thought, the happy smile and bright red color left his cheeks. With a loud scream he fell down on the ground, and, as his green cloak dropped from his shoulders, it became white like the snow. The poor boy was a great sufferer, and looked for all the world as if he were dead. But a moment before he was so gay and happy; now he was helpless, and lying in the snow!

When the old man saw what he had done, a smile played over his wrinkled face. Immediately he doubled his fist and shook it again at the sun, who was hiding once more behind a dark storm-cloud. Then he stooped to snatch up another handful of snow.

As quick as thought the boy revived and he determined to improve the present moment. He sprang up again and with one leap he jumped on the old man's back. Then he shouted and laughed so loud that the very valleys rang again with his joyous words.

"I have got you now, you old complainer," he said, as he stood on the old man's shoulders and [illegible] gray head. "I have got you now, you old jailer, who would like to keep all the pretty things forever in your old prison-house. I exercise them and keep them there just as long as you can. I will break their bonds and set them free. And for my work all the flowers and trees and birds will praise me as long as I live. I'll show you what it is you must suffer for your wickedness. Wait now, and I will soon bring your kingdom to an end."

The old man tried hard to shake the boy from his shoulders. But the more he tried the weaker he grew, and finally he found it impossible to do it. And what was very remarkable, the longer the boy stood on the old man's shoulders the larger he grew. You could see him grow, until his arms became as strong as a blacksmith's. Gradually the old man sank beneath his weight, and lay helpless on the ground. Just then the boy stood with both feet on his head, and all you could hear from the aged sufferer was a faint sigh. He tried to speak, but he could not do it at first

Suddenly the happy boy shook his cloak, which now was green again, in the fresh breeze. Then he smoothed his curls, and kissed his hand at the sun as it came out from the cloud once more.

After this he stooped down and said these words to the old man's ears:

"Now, will you confess that I have conquered you? Old grumbler, will you give up now?"

The old man sighed and then whispered: "I believe I will. Don't hurt me any more. I will go away willingly."

"That is all I wish," shouted the boy. "I don't wish to inquire if you will go away of your own accord. But every year I have to go over the same trouble and conquer you again. I should think you would have learned long before now that I can conquer you in the end. Why will you be so stubborn?"

"Oh! oh! How heavy you are on my poor aching head! Oh! how the warm sun burns me! Let us make peace and separate as good friends."

"I will never make peace with you," said the boy, "until you will give me a pledge that in the future you will never undertake to conquer me again. If you do this, we shall be friends."

"What do you mean?" grumbled the old man.

"I mean will you give me a certain sign which will come again every year in token of our friendship? And when that sign appears, will you take your departure quietly without putting me to the necessity of giving you another fresh drubbing?"

"Yes, I will agree to that. But what sort of a sign will it be?"

"I will tell you," responded the boy. "Since it is to be a sign of our friendship, it must bear both your color and mine."

Then the old man smiled as if tickled with that new thought "My color!" he answered, "and what else?"

"It shall be a little flower," said the boy, "which shall signify your departure and my coming. Do you agree to that?"

The old man whispered: "Yes, right willingly." Then the boy leaped down from his head and threw his arms about his neck. And arm in arm they kneeled down to the ground and kissed it.

"Now, let me go," said the old man; "I am very tired and weak, and must depart for some other country to restore myself once more."

Then he went away, but limped as he walked off. The happy boy raised his arms toward the heavens, and the bright sun smiled down upon his rosy cheeks. "Can that be a blue bird?" said he to himself. "If so, I have no time to lose."

Quick enough he gathered his green cloak about him, and walked all over the hills and valleys of the earth.

Button the spot where the green-clothed boy and the gray old man kissed the earth, a flower is now blooming. Through the melting snow it shoots up its tender stalk, and on the top of it there hangs a little blossom. The little flower is as white as the old man's beard, and the leaves around it are as green as the boy's bright cloak

"SNOW-DROP!" That is what people call the flower. Every year when the snow melts it comes again to make all things happy. It is just what the beautiful boy said it should be—a sign of universal joy

Now, children, would you like me to tell you who these two wonderful persons were? The old man with the gray beard and long locks was frosty, gloomy Winter; but the boy with the green cloak and pink boots was bright happy Spring

God made them both

LITTLE WILLIE'S FUNERAL

Willie Lincoln had his acquaintances among his father's friends, and I chanced to be one of them. He never failed to seek me out in the crowd, shake hands and make some pleasant remark; and this in a boy of but ten years of age was, to say the least, endearing to a stranger. But he had more than mere affectionateness. His self-possession—aplomb, as the French call it—was extraordinary. I was one day passing the White House, when he was outside with a playfellow on the sidewalk. Mr Seward drove in, with Prince Napoleon and two of his suite in the carriage; and, in a mock-heroic way—terms of amusing intimacy evidently existing between the boy and the Secretary—the official gentleman took off his hat, and the Napoleon party did the same, all making the young prince President a ceremonious salute Not a bit staggered with the homage, Willie drew himself up to his full height, took off his little cap with graceful self-possession, and bowed down formally to the ground, like a little ambassador. They drove past; and he went on unconcernedly with his play; the impromptu readiness and good judgment being clearly a part of his nature. His genial and open expression of countenance was none the less ingenuous and fearless for a certain tincture of fun; and it was in this mingling of qualities that he so faithfully resembled his father.

With all the splendor that was around this little fellow in his new home, he was so bravely and beautifully himself—and that only! A wild-flower, transplanted from the prairie to the hot-house, he retained his prairie habits, unalterably pure and simple, till he died. His leading trait seemed to be a fearless and kindly frankness, willing that everything should be as different as it pleased, but resting unmoved in his own conscious single-heartedness. I found I was studying him, irresistibly, as one of those sweet problems of childhood that the world is blest with, in rare places; and the news of his death (I was absent from Washington, on a visit to my own children at the time) came to me like a knell heard unexpectedly at a merry-making.

On the day of the funeral I went, before the hour, to take a near farewell look at the dear boy; for they had embalmed him to send home to the West—to sleep under the sods of his own valley—and the coffin-lid was to be closed before the service. The family had just taken their leave of him, and the servants and nurses were seeing him for the last time—and, with tears and sobs wholly unrestrained, for he was loved like an idol by every one of them. He lay, with eyes closed—his brown hair parted as we had known it—pale in the slumber of death; but otherwise unchanged, for he was dressed as for the evening, and held, in one of the hands crossed upon his breast, a bunch of exquisite flowers—a message coming from his mother, while we were looking upon him, praying that those flowers might be preserved for her. She was lying sick in her bed, worn out with grief and overwatching.

The funeral was very touching. Of the entertainments in the splendid East-room, the boy had been—for those now assembled, more especially—a most life-giving variation. With his bright face, and his apt greetings and replies, he was remembered in every part of that crimsoned curtained hall built only for pleasure—of all the crowds, each night, certainly the one least likely to be Death's first mark. He was his father's favorite. They were intimates—oftenest seen hand in hand And there sat the man, with a burden on his brain at which the world marvels—bent now with the load of both heart and brain—staggering under a blow like the taking from him of this child! His men of power sat around him—McClellan, with a moist eye when he bowed to the prayer, as I could see from where I stood, and Chase and Seward with their austere features at work, and Senators and Ambassadors and soldiers, all struggling with their tears—great hearts sorrowing with the President as a stricken man and a brother. That God may give him strength for all his burdens is, I am sure, the present, the prayer of a nation!

Willis in the Home Journal.

THE LITTLE TEACHER.

"Oh! Joseph!" exclaimed Alice, as he came into the room where she was, the next day, "Oh! just see how it rains, is it not too bad? for now we cannot go into the garden and hear what you were going to tell us," and the tears again coursed down her rosy cheeks.

"What! Alice, not crying I hope," said Joseph.

"Come, dry up your tears, run and find Mary, and I will tell you something about the rain. If we cannot go out doors, I think we can entertain ourselves quite as well in the house; there, let me kiss those two big tears from your face, before they fall—now run and bring your sister"

Alice hastened away, wondering what her brother could tell about "the disagreeable rain,"—"surely the rain never did any good," thought she, "only to make the ground soft and muddy, the grass and bushes, fruit-trees and garden-walks wet and unpleasant;" and once when she had forgotten her doll and cradle in the baby-house in the yard, she had found them all soaking wet, and heartily wished "it never would rain," thus spoiling her treasures.

Mary was soon found, and as they joined their brother in the sitting-room, he turned to them and abruptly said:

"Girls, can you tell me if the rain is of any use?"

"Yes, I can," said Alice, "it does no manner of good at all, only to annoy and vex one. I was to have a horse-back ride behind papa, to the post office this afternoon, but now I must stay at home; it is too bad it should rain to-day."

"Oh! Alice! I think you must be wrong, for I heard Bridget say we could have no more ice-cream, until it rained."

"Why, Mary! how strange you talk, it does not rain ice-cream, does it?" said Alice

"No, not exactly," said Mary, "but Bridget said the pasture had nearly all dried up, and the poor cows could scarcely get anything to eat, and that they had failed so much in giving milk, that they only gave enough to make the bread with, and some to make butter to eat on our bread, so you see if it had not rained we would have to do without a great many things."

"Yes, sister, many more things than you are aware of," said Joseph. "If it did not rain nothing would grow at all. Cows we would have no bread to eat, no water to drink, everything would die, and so would we."

"Oh! no, Joseph," said Mary, "I went into the granary yesterday with papa, and he said there were a hundred bushels of wheat in one bin, and I think there were four bins; let me see, four times one hundred would be four hundred, and then our great spring of water always comes bubbling up, and running over all the time, ever since I can mind, so you see there is not much danger of our bread or water coming to an end, even if it did not rain."

"But Mary," said Joseph, "do you know what makes the wheat grow, that we use for bread? or what makes the water come bubbling up out of our spring?"

"Why I suppose it is the Good Man in heaven, mother says he makes everything."

"Yes, Mary, there you are right, but at the same time He uses means, for instance; He gives light, heat, and rain to make the things grow. If it would never rain any more, in a short time everything would dry up, the moisture would dry out of everything, and nothing would have life. The beautiful flowers would wither, the grain would wilt on its stalk, the nice green leaves would dwindle away and fall to the ground, there would be no fruit on our trees, no grapes on our vines, no corn on the stocks, no potatoes in the ground, for nothing would grow, all, all would die, if it did not rain

"Now, girls, I will tell you how Aunt Lizzie said springs, rivers, and such things were formed, and then tell me if you think our spring would come 'bubbling up,' as you say, if it would cease to rain.

"In the first place, Aunt Lizzie said, when it rained some drops of water sank into the ground, and those drops trickled along meeting other little drops, and presently it became a very small stream under ground, but it ran along meeting other small streams formed in the same way, until it came to a bed of clay, yellow hard clay, then it stopped, for water cannot run through such clay And when the water has filled the basin made of the clay, and it cannot get any farther, then it bursts open the ground and comes bounding out, and we call it a spring. Then this little spring brook runs along and meets other brooks, and it becomes larger and larger until it becomes a large river."

"And what becomes of the river?" said Alice.

"It runs to the great Ocean," said Joseph, "and don't you see, girls, if it did not rain the springs would all go dry? and when there would be no spring brooks to make rivers, there would be no rivers."

"Yes," said Mary, "the rain does a great deal more good, I see, than I had any idea of."

"And I," chimed in Alice, "will never again say I do not want it to rain, but, brother Joseph, can you tell us how the rain gets up in the clouds? I have often thought about it, and wondered where it came from, or how it got there."

"Well," said he, "Aunt Lizzie told me a great deal about that, and I am sorry to say I cannot remember it all, but what I do I will tell you; she said when the sun shines on this earth of ours, it warms it, and causes little particles of water, (which is called vapor,) to rise up in the air, and form the clouds, which we see floating around, and when a great number of them are collected together they become heavy and fall down, and we call it rain. She illustrated it to me in this way; she put some water in the tea-kettle, and set it over the fire. As the fire warmed the water little particles arose from the water and congregated on the under side of the lid, and when Aunt Lizzie lifted the lid off, there were many large drops hanging to it, which at the most gentle touch would drop off, and she said it was just so with rain."

"Oh! beautiful! how beautiful!" exclaimed Alice, as she lightly tripped to the opposite side of the room and gazed eagerly on a bright colored rainbow, which was just becoming visible. Her brother and sister were soon at her side, enjoying the grand sight also.

"See what handsome colors are there. I wonder if any body ever found out how many there are?" said Mary.

"Yes, Aunt Lizzie knows," said Joseph, "and she said there are seven primary colors, namely, blue, green, indigo, violet, orange, yellow, and red. It takes a bright sunshine and a shower to cause a rainbow to be seen; we must always see a very dark cloud on the opposite side of it from us too. But girls do you know when it was that God placed this beautiful bow in the heavens?"

"I suppose he put it there when he made the world," said Mary

"No," said Joseph, "it was this way: many hundreds of years ago, and before our Saviour was born too, the people that lived on the earth became all very wicked, all except one family, an old father and mother, their three sons, and their sons' wives; they all loved God and worshipped him, but all the rest of the people were very wicked. This good man's name was Noah. God resolved to destroy these wicked people, but wished to preserve Noah and his family, so he told Noah to build a great ark three hundred cubits (that is 450 feet,) long, fifty cubits (75 feet,) wide, and thirty cubits (45 feet,) high, so Aunt Lizzie said. The ark had three stories, and a great many rooms in it, and it was so well pitched that no water could get in it any way. When the ark was finished God caused two of every living thing upon the face of the earth to come to the ark, there were beasts of every kind, birds and fowls of the air, and creeping things, two by two, male and female, came in the ark to Noah. He also took provision of every kind for himself and all that were with him in the ark; when they were all in God himself shut them in, then the fountains of the deep were broken up, the windows of Heaven were opened, (the Bible says,) and there was a general deluge, every person, every animal, and every thing that was left on the earth were drowned

"When the flood was over and the ark once more rested on land, and Noah and his family had come out of it, he immediately built an altar unto the Lord and offered sacrifice upon it. This pleased the Lord, he blessed Noah and his family, and set this beautiful bow in the heavens as a sign that he never would drown the world again, and when we see this beautiful emblem, we may rest assured that the rain will soon be over.

"Now, girls, I cannot tell you any more this time, but, to-morrow, I will tell you something else"

SYLVIA.

THE LITTLE BOASTER.

Walter Thorndike was a little boy who was never satisfied with telling a plain, straightforward story He was always obliged to invent a little to add to it, so that it might sound rather more wonderful. For instance, if he passed through a field in which there were one or two cows feeding, he would come home and say, "Oh! mother, I came through a whole herd of cattle this morning, and there did not one of them touch me!"

Thus you see he told a story which was almost entirely untrue, although he only meant to make his mother think that he was a very brave boy, and I dare say he would have been very much displeased if any one had told him that he had told a falsehood.

His parents tried in a great many ways to cure him of this bad habit, but they did not succeed very well. One day, however, his father had given his elder brother Johnny, some work to do, out in the barn. It was to sort over a large box of nails, laying the different kinds in separate piles. "I think, Johnny," said his father, "that you can get it done in an hour, if you keep on steadily."

"Oh! father," cried Walter, "I wish you had told me to do it instead. I could do it in ten minutes, I know."

"Very well," said Mr. Thorndike, "you shall do it; but if it is not all done in ten minutes, I shall not take you with me to your grandfather's, to spend the day, as I expected to."

Of course Walter could not finish the nails in so short a time, and so he lost his pleasant visit. For a long time after that, whenever he wished to exaggerate a little, he remembered his disappointment, and only said what was actually true.

MAN.

I would know what, here below the sun,
He is, and what his place, that being which seems
The end of all means, yet the means of suns.
Who searches and combines, aspires and dreams;
Seeking new hopes in ever the same thing;
A king without the powers of a king,
A beggar, with a kingdom in his scope.

Who only sees in what he hath attained,
The means whereby he may attain to more;
Who only finds in that which he hath gained
The want of what he did not want before.
Whom weakness strengthens; who is soothed by strife;
Who seeks new joys, to prize the absent most;
Still from illusion to illusion tost,
Himself the great illusion of his life.

In the preparation of this Valuable Manure, BONES ARE USED IN THEIR RAW STATE ONLY. They have never been boiled or steamed. They are taken as nature has made them, crushed with the virtue of the bone is retained, a fertilizer is produced, forbidding in a concentrated and soluble form, the two indispensable ingredients for the growth of Plants and enriching the soil, viz.: phosphoric acid and ammonia. These two ingredients, by the use of "BAUGH'S RAW BONE SUPER PHOSPHATE," are given to the soil in the [illegible] strength and purity. They assimilate at once with the soil, furnish all the essential aliments for their growth, giving it ample resistance, and leave the land permanently benefited, so that its presence can be traced for years afterwards.

Downingtown, Chester County, Pa., April 9th, 1860

Messrs. Baugh & Sons: Gentlemen,—I have been using your article of Super Phosphate on wheat and corn for several seasons and am well satisfied of its value as an active and "paying" fertilizer

I have applied it on wheat at the rate of 200 pounds per acre, alongside of a heavy coat of barn-yard manure, kept dry and on the same, and the result was, that by harvest the wheat where the Phosphate was put, was much the better looking, and heavier, while the grass was taken more strongly than on the other portion of the field. I have also used the Phosphate by the side of Peruvian Guano, which is the same quantity, and in regard to both grain and straw, the action of your preparation was much the more marked; in my experience in its use has been the' it pays well for the money laid out.

Yours respectfully, ISAACT LEWIS.

Newtown Square, Delaware Co., Pa., July 23d, 1860

Messrs. Baugh & Sons:—Being anxious last season to test some preparation manure offered for sale, I was induced by your agent to make a trial of three different kinds, which I did on a small piece by side in the same field. I purchased Peruvian Guano, and Super Phosphate of Lime, one of the most popular in use, together with your Raw Bone Super-Phosphate, and used them as above stated During the growing, as well as the gathering of the crop, the last result of [illegible] day in favor of the latter

But whether it is from the seed and care in preparing, or in the superior quality of the material used in your Raw Bone Super-Phosphate, I am unable to say; however I therefore intend to try the result of my trial during that there can be no interest in such experiments, and in my opinion, greatly to the agricultural interests of the whole country

Yours &c., JAMES DUNWODDY

Plymouth, Montgomery Co., Pa., August 16th 1860

Baugh & Sons, Gentlemen,—Having used your Super Phosphate, purchased of Mr. Wetherspoon at the Norristown Rail Road Depot, on wheat and corn, I can with pleasure recommend it. The wheat it produced was an excellent, that it greatly increased my confidence in the reliability of Fertilizers Where it was applied on the wheat, the soil was decidedly the poorest on the field, yet the yield was fully equal to the balance, which had a heavy coat of barn-yard manure Where it was applied on the corn, I am satisfied the yield was fully double

Very respectfully, DAVID MARPLE

THE POOL OF BETHESDA.

John v., 1—9.

A POEM, BY REV. JOEL SWARTZ.

Five porches hung around Bethesda's pool,
Where sick and wan a mass of suff'rers lay,
Upon the waveless fountain's bosom cool,
They fixed their haggard eyes from day to day
Naught broke the form of cloud or bending trees,
As mirrored on the pool they floating lay,
Save when by chance a soft and thirsty breeze
Would curling o'er its placid surface play
Months passed—and still a thousand bending heads
Saw imaged forth their hollow sunken eyes,
As down they gazed from overhanging beds,
To see, perchance, the troubled waters rise.
For once a year a pitying angel came,
As round the realm he bent his guardian flight,
And moved by crime of blind, and halt, and lame,
He wept a tear upon its bosom bright.
When lo! a sudden boiling quickly seized
The sleeping spirit of the conscious wave,
And gave the mystic pool a balm that eased
The first, who stepping in, their limbs should lave.
At once the crawling, halting, suff'ring tide
Of waiting wretches, for the waters strove;
Some, helpless, for their friends most piteous cried;
Some heedless threw themselves from beds above
The waters touched, and straight the healthful flow
Of life coursed through their withered limbs again;
The cold dull eye, the pallid cheek would glow,
And hearts oppressed with grief forgot their pain.
But whilst some joyful touched the healing tide,
And lost amid the waves their heavy chains,
Others, alas! forlorn, despending died,
And in the grave Bethesda healed their pains.
One sad, retired, and meekly suff'ring form.
Far back by cold, unfeeling hands was thrown,
Where year by year, mid heat, and cold, and storm,
He friendless, waited, wept, and prayed alone.
Thirty and eight long years infirm he lay,
Long sought Bethesda's often troubled tide,
And saw the mystic waters wash away
Some fell disease from suff'rers by his side.
But ere he, crawling to the fountain's shore,
Could drag infirm his languid length along,
Some other waiting feet would press before,
And leave him helpless mid the tangled throng.
The years passed slow along, and one by one,
His former friends forsook his loathsome cot,
Wearied of cost and care, left him alone,
And o'er at last his very name forgot.
His mother, in his childhood's helpless years,
Had brought and laid him by Bethesda's side,
And daily sitting, wiped away his tears.
And for her charge, her daily task she plied.
And when, at length, the longed for day appeared,
And angel hands Bethesda's waters moved,
Grasping her child, she quick the fountain neared,
But others first his healing virtues proved.
Again, and still again, from year to year,
The faithful spirit stirred the lucid wave,
And they who quickly touched the waters near,
Are healed of whatsoe'er disease they have.
But still a strangely sad, severe decree,
Debarred from health the mother's fated child;
He seemed alone a helpless wretch to be,
Whilst health restored, as others frequent smiled.
Yet God the mother's daily prayers had heard,
Though long the gracious answer seemed delayed;
Another Power, by Calvary's tortures stirred,
Was destined to afford the suff'rer aid.
Yet long before the world's Bethesda streamed
O'er Calvary's steep, a sacred, crimson tide,
And long before its healing flood had gleamed
Beside the sheepgate pool—the mother died
Earth's first, and last, and earth's most constant friend;
A mother, fond, untiring, now was gone,
And thus, the only stay that Heaven would lend,
Had fled, and he indeed was left alone.
The angel came, the waters moved again,
He published far and near the Saviour's fame.
Jesus, thou art the same forever more,
Thou art the same Bethesda still to-day.
Thou can'st the wounded heal our sight restore,
And drive the broken spirit's grief away
I too was sick, my head, my heart was faint,
My soul was foul with leprous spots of sin,
No troubled pool could ease my soul's complaint,
The dire disease lay deep my heart within
I too, for many years had helpless lain,
And sought, and vainly sought myself to cure,
The more I strove to heal my inward pain,
The less my heart its ails could endure
Till once, my Saviour, thou didst pass this way.
And saw'st me helpless, friendless and alone.
Thou saw'st my grief, as sad I weeping lay,
And heard'st my broken spirit's heavy moan.
When thou didst point me to thy wounded side,
Thy hands, thy feet with cruel piercings riven,
That beneathed flowed thy heart's pure crimson tide,
For me, for all mankind, how freely given.
I looked, and lo, my sin sick soul was healed,
My heart its rending anguish felt no more,
I (for my health) received the pardon sealed
And heaven all through my soul its gladness pour

When inclined to give an angry answer, lift up the heart in prayer.

THE FAITH OF PARENTS

We sometimes hear people ask, "How can parents believe for their children when they bring them to Baptism?" and yet the word of God has many examples where parents did believe for their children, not only for the good of the souls of their dear ones, but also for the healing of their bodies. We will only notice a few of these examples as they are recorded in the Bible.

1. In reference to those children whose bodies were afflicted with serious diseases and the Saviour healed them, when their parents exercised faith for them.

a. The little daughter of Jairus, a ruler of the synagogue, we are told in Mark 5: 36, "Jesus saith unto the ruler of the synagogue, Be not afraid, only believe."

b. The man whose son was possessed with a dumb spirit. "Jesus said unto him, (the father of the child) If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth. And straightway the father of the child cried out, and said with tears, Lord, I believe; help thou my unbelief." Mark 9: 23, 24

c. The nobleman's son, who was sick at the point of death in Capernaum. "Jesus saith unto him (the father of the child) Go thy way, thy son liveth. And the man believed the word that Jesus had spoken unto him." John 1: 50

Now the above mentioned children were all healed from their evil diseases by our blessed Lord because their fathers exercised faith in Him.

2 Households, or children who were received in the Christian Church by baptism because their parents believed.

a. The family of Lydia, Acts 16: 15. When the Lord opened the heart of Lydia, that is, when she believed, "she was baptized and her household"

b. The family of the jailer at Philippi, Acts 16: 31, 32 "And they said, (Paul and Silas) Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house. And he took them the same hour of the night, and washed their stripes, and was baptized, he and all his, straightway."

c. The family of Stephanas, 1 Cor. 1: 16. "I (says Paul) baptized also the house of Stephanas." In reference to all those baptisms, it is to be observed, that no one in either of the families professed faith, but the parents alone, therefore, the other members of those households must have been children, and were baptized on the faith of their believing parents.

Abraham believed God and was circumcised, and his children were circumcised because of the faith of their believing parents; thus all the male children of the whole Jewish church for nearly 2000 years, namely, from the days of Abraham to the days of Christ, were initiated into the Church of God when they were eight days old, because of their believing parents. Gen. 17: 23. Let us then, "also walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham, which he had being yet uncircumcised." Rom. 4: 12.

A WORD FROM THE PULPIT.

I know one minister (but would like to know hundreds of the same pattern) with whom it is quite a common thing to say: "Now I have a word here for my young friends," or something similar. Then comes a simplification of what has been addressed to the older hearers, or a new point suited to the little folks, or a practical appeal to them, graced and pointed with figures and narratives which commend them to the juvenile part of the congregation. Why should a habit of this kind be found in only one here and another there, with miles of manuscript and whole Sabbaths of speaking between, in which the world is falsely assumed to be peopled with adults and adults alone?

This forgetfulness or neglect of the young must come to a conclusive end. They are there, in the pews, with their lively intellects and warm hearts Let them be spoken to Let every minister, as he prays, as he studies the Bible, as he consults books, as he bends over his manuscript page, bethink himself of what he has for the little ones, and so get some food ready for them Nay more, as he skims the newspaper, walks the streets, visits among his people, goes among the rich, the poor, the strong, the sick, the rejoicing, the sorrowing, let him cull materials for the bairns So will his pulpit work be not less acceptable or profitable to the grown people; and he will reach a wider circle than he reached before. I know a little boy, six years old, who is frequently asked, when he returns from church: "Well, what did the minister say?" His answer on one occasion was: "He said: 'Let us pry.'" This was uttered after a pause full of careful reflection

THE SOUTHERN BRIBE

Incredible as it appeared at first, there now seems to be some foundation for the story, that the Commissioners from the Southern Confederacy have been, either directly or indirectly, holding to the ears of England and France, the promise, that, if they would recognise the Confederacy as a power, all the children afterwards born of slave mothers shall be free. What then will become of the "corner stone?" And how are they carrying out the doctrine of Dr. Palmer of New Orleans, that the mission of the South is to preserve and perpetuate Slavery? But, "you cannot catch old birds with chaff." The English people seem unwilling to trust them; perhaps because they believe with the Scriptures, that "great men are a lie." But, it is impossible to tell what the Literati of England may persuade their government to do, now, that the Westminster Review is said to have discovered that the "rice swamps" are in "Tennessee."

By the way, Dr. Palmer, in his fast-day sermon, beat "the drum ecclesiastic" like a hero. Grant what he takes for granted, but does not attempt to prove, because it is incapable of proof; that the South had just cause, and a good reason, for rising up in rebellion against the Government, all that he says is well calculated to fan the patriotism of his hearers into a flame, and bring them to a resolve to resist oppression to the "last man and the last dollar." It is thus that the artful orator may abuse the minds of his hearers. And it is just such harangues which have maddened and rendered desperate many simple-minded souls in the South who would otherwise be peaceable, law abiding citizens. And the men who have done all the mischief have now nothing before them but the utter wreck of all their ambitious hopes; for, if subdued, the cause of humanity requires that they should be treated as criminals. If not soon subdued, they must fight while there is a man left, to the utter destruction of all the interests which they profess to take up arms to defend. Should any of our old friends in the South happen to see what we now write, we entreat them to consider it without passion, and compare it with what we wrote before the rebellion was fully inaugurated. Did we not say that there was not a single statesman among their leaders, if we take the standard of statesmanship from such men as Washington and Franklin; and that, while they might bring much evil on the whole country, their mischievous doings would bring ruin on themselves?

An air of probability is cast on the story above referred to, by the correspondence between Earl Russell and the Southern Commissioners which has lately appeared in the Philadelphia Press. Messrs. Yancey & Co. court the favor of Great Britain, notwithstanding that the "Anti-Slavery sentiment is so universally prevalent in England" We commend this to the attention of those politicians, and editors, and divines in the North, who have been throwing the blame on the Anti Slavery men. Abolitionists, as they are called, and accusing them of having provoked the South to break out in rebellion Why dissolve the Union because an Anti-Slavery sentiment exists in the States, and took on the power in which the Anti Slavery sentiment "is universally prevalent?" Farther, they say: "It was from no fear that the slaves would be liberated that secession took place. The very party in power has proposed to guaranty Slavery forever in the States, if the South would but remain in the Union." This is going too far; it makes the "party in power" quite too good to the South What then is the real ground of quarrel? This leaks out: the object of the war, they tell Lord Russell, is, "to keep the slave in subjection to his owner, and to control his labor through the legislative channels which the Lincoln Government designs to force on his master." Here is the old complaint. To understand it, we must know what has long been a prevailing sentiment among the Southern oligarchy. The South is an agricultural region. The Union has been injurious to Southern interests. To aid the commercial, manufacturing, and shipping interests of the North, the South has always been oppressed by the Federal Government; or, if it has not been oppressed, it has been tormented with the constant dread of oppression, the material interests of the two sections are so opposite. When the Federal Constitution was adopted, a feeling of jealousy existed in both the extreme sections of the Union, arising from their supposed conflicting interests by the Calhoun school of politicians. It has been cherished in the South for more than thirty years; and while, as governors, and legislators, and judges, they have been all along binding themselves by solemn oaths to support the Constitution and laws of the United States, they have been longing for a favorable opportunity to destroy that which they solemnly bound themselves to uphold. An oath of office, what is it? Why; let us not close our eyes against the startling truth; it is administered with such frequency, and with such levity, and so often by men that have no fear of God before their eyes, that it has come to be regarded by thousands as nothing more than a legal qualification for office. Of all oaths, promissory oaths are more frequently violated, and the most insnaring. Their history shows, that, seldom indeed has any good resulted from administering them to masses or classes of men The doctrine of the oath needs to be re-examined.

SKETCHES FROM WASHINGTON.

March 26th, 1862.

Very lively has our city been for the last few days! Troops, troops; arriving, encamping, and departing; thousands on thousands! One cannot help rejoicing. The impression is that of conscious, accumulate, and irresistible power. Regiment after regiment has passed along, in the beautiful brightness of this brisk and blessed morning, the light band music leading off, and the heavy foot-music following, with occasional burrah for "Dixie," anticipating the long-desired march on "the sacred soil." Surely, if the Lord be on our side, every human preparation is now so complete, as to assure us of speedy victory.

My notions have changed very much, and very agreeably, in many respects, during the progress of the war. In particular, I see that the standard of humanity is higher, in our country, than I had supposed. Having been so much confined to city-life, it seemed to me at times that the race must be dwindling, both physically and morally. But what is a city, or a dozen cities, in comparison with our country? Lo! how the mountains and hills, the valee and plains, where the winds and waters are so pure and free, send forth from their shady forests and sunny fields their myriads on myriads of tall, stout, strong, active, enduring, honest, earnest, patriotic, and self-sacrificing natural noblemen—many of them spiritual noblemen, too—fit to be examples of sovereign freemen to the whole world! "Mud-sills," indeed! "Greasy mechanics," indeed! "Dollar-worshipping cowards," indeed! "Afraid of the smell of Southern gunpowder," indeed! "Running from the sight of Southern cold steel," indeed! Nay, rather:—

"Pride in their port, defiance in their eye,
I see the lords of human kind go by"

What ignorance and impudence had distinguished the aristrocratic slaveholders!—Amazing! And yet it is the tendency of slavery to produce and foster such distinctions. There can be no true Republicanism, no true Democracy, in such a state of society. The essential principles of the system is, the Divine right of the few to mastery over the many The only way to manage such a system is,—to destroy it. Still, therefore, let the hosts of the North and West extend and strengthen their south-looking line; and let the shout of their heroic commanders continue to be—"Forward, March!"

I cannot cease to wish that there may be, ere long, at least three millions of these pioneers of liberty, ever pressing toward the Gulf; retaking and repossessing the usurped state territories, distributing themselves in due proportions among all; forming alliances with the native loyalists and lovers of freedom and manly independence; and so preparing the way, by efficiently-determined legislative action, for the constitutional and peaceful accomplishment of all that is necessary to sectional and national justice, harmony, prosperity, change the balance of power by new populations!

27th. Did I not, from the commencement of the session, predict the slavery debate? True; this required no special inspiration. Still, there are so many people who have an abhorrence of this subject, that, if practicable, the discussion of it would be prevented. Petitions multiply, from various quarters, that it be let alone Surely, they come in vain.—all in vain! How can it be alone? The President alludes to it, in both his opening and special messages. He submits, what, perhaps, is new to the Presidency, a resolution, in form, for the consideration, and, if approved, the adoption of Congress. Emancipation becomes pressing, and colonization equally pressing. The old and bitter antagonists, strange to say, are reconciled by the war, and leagued together. The Tax Bill calls up slavery. The Confiscation Bill calls up slavery! The District of Columbia calls up slavery! And, in a word, the only way to get rid of the debate on slavery is,—to abolish slavery itself. In both Houses, the debate progresses with unflagging zeal and interest. And it is a little amusing, especially in the Senate, to find the preliminary business some phase of slavery, and then, when the special order succeeds, lo, another phase of slavery! Harmonize the contradictories as we the North and South. the North divided, the South united,—and the latter by help of Northern allies, always in a haughty majority. Now, the South is divided, the secessionists have withdrawn into Dumbdom, and the Border States, a meager minority, are left to contend, on this subject, with a nearly united North. Wonderful, indeed, is this reversal of majorities; but pro-slavery Border-State men now afford examples of heroism, that remind an old observer of the same quality as exhibited by the anti-slavery Northern men in the evil days, gone by, I trust, forever. I remember well when there was but one out-spoken abolitionist in the Senate; and it may be that the time is not far distant, when but one anti-abolitionist will stand, like a monument of meekness, within the same area of historic grandeur

My rejoicing is this:—the conviction, that, after all manner of human mismanagement, the All Wise Disposer of events has taken the matter into his own hands, and will accomplish His own will, not independently of human instrumentalities, indeed, but, by such arrangements and employments of them, as men neither have foreseen nor could have devised, but which will prove abundantly worthy the Divine administration, and promotive of our own true, best, and most enduring interests. Our main duty, in the crisis, it seems to me, is this—to wait on the Lord. "Be still, and know that I am God; I will be exalted among the heathen, I will be exalted in the earth. The Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge." And yet, I do not mean, by this application, let us be either dumb or idle; but, whatever we say, and whatever we do, let us remember our dependence in the Divine sovereignty, and expect all that is desirable, not from man, but from God.

Does it never enter into your hope, that the good Lord intends, by His overruling providence in connexion with this strange war, to do more for us than even the most merciful settlement of the slavery question involves? Are there no other evils in our state relations requiring corrections? Do our church relations, and social and secular relations, suggest no need of improvement? Let me whisper in your ear that one of your brethren, at least, delights himself in contemplation of many and great improvements. Shall I specify them? This were easily done. But it may be better, for the present, to mystify them,—or, at least, leave them to your own discernment and appreciation. I know that the denomination to which you belong have tried, pretty hard, to maintain an advance position in the grand highway of Christian progress; and I comfort myself with the thought, that, although you are not yet perfect, nor likely to become so very soon—except as individuals, translated to sainthip in heaven, you will, nevertheless, sympathize with the sentiment that our ever-blessed Lord and Master means something more than has yet appeared, in His continuous exhortation—"Follow me!" O, for the kingdom of Christ! All hail, every indication of its coming! Welcome! thrice welcome! a thousand times welcome any new fulfilment of His purposes! On a certain occasion, a distinguished preacher, a man of great piety, philosopher as well as orator, lifted his eyes and hands, and exclaimed, in the fulness of his heart,—O, how glad I am that God is happy!" How simple! How sublime! And how his hearers must have thrilled with joy! The happiness of God is the assurance of our own. And so, with the same kind, if not the same degree of pleasure, each one of us may say,—O, how glad I am, that, in the midst of all the afflictions of the present time, there is reason to believe that the Lord Jesus Christ is hastening, in every way, the completion of His arrangements, "according to the will of God and our Father," "to appear the second time, without sin, unto salvation!" A STAGE COACH INCIDENT.

BY ANNIE ELTON.

Some years since a pressing invitation from an old friend required me to visit a small town in the interior of Indiana. Not being located upon any of the lines of railroad, the last forty miles had to be performed in a stage coach—a mode of travelling in which I am not very partial, especially as Western roads are not particularly good.

When I entered the coach there were only three passengers inside, therefore I anticipated quite a comfortable ride. But I was doomed to disappointment, as one person after another dropped in, till the coach was quite full. We rode on for some time without interruption, until we were all startled by a loud, shrill voice, crying—'Driver, driver!'

All eyes were directed towards a small cottage by the roadside, out of which an immensely fat old lady, weighing not less than two hundred and fifty pounds, and loaded with carpet bags, bundles and bandboxes, was seen frantically rushing towards the coach, screaming to the driver all the while.

By this time, as I have said, the coach was uncomfortably crowded, and all looked at one another in consternation. The old lady reached the coach, puffing with her exertions

'Where in the world!' exclaimed she, as, standing upon the upper step, she gazed on the crowd within, 'where in the world am I goin' to set, driver?'

'Oh, you'll ride well enough, ma'am—plenty of room—take that seat in the corner.'

'In that corner—why, there isn't room enough there for one of my bundles'

'Don't trouble yourself about your bundles, ma'am,' said the driver, 'I'll take care of them. Let me take your bandbox.'

'Oh, no! I wouldn't have that out of my sight for anything. My best bunnit is in it, and it would be sure to roll off in the mud, and get jammed and dirty.'

The driver, without waiting to hear more and growing impatient at the long delay, closed the door and leaped upon his box. As the horses sprang forward, the old lady was precipitated, bundles and all, into the lap of a very nervous gentleman who sat just behind her.

'I think, madam,' said he, in a voice which sounded as if he was near suffocating, 'that I'll sit outside with the driver, if you will permit me to rise.'

'O, no, no,' said the old lady, who, finding her seat very comfortable, commenced disposing of her bundles around her. 'I set very well, now—I won't trouble you to move.' I sat in the corner much amused, while the old lady proceeded—

'Hain't got far to go, and I thought I'd have all my baggage where I could lay my hands on them, for I'm dreadful 'fraid of thieves, and have been ever since Lizy Ann—that's my darter—lost her handbag, 'cause she was too proud to take it into the stage with her. But Lizy Ann don't take after me—not a bit.'

As she said this, she looked around to set a large carpet bag, which thus far had hung on her arm. Seeing no room for it in the bottom of the coach, she suddenly turned towards me, saying,

'Here, young woman, let this lay in your lap, can't ye? 'Ta'n't very heavy.'

Seeing it held towards me, I involuntarily held out my hand to receive it. Not heavy, indeed!

Why my hand fell at once when she lowered her hold of the bag. However, I managed, by using both hands, to get it into my lap. For two years afterwards I was afflicted with lameness, which I have always thought was caused by holding the old lady's carpet bag so long And this wasn't all, as the sequel will show.

We rode on, not very comfortably, being so crowded, for several miles; the old lady was very communicative, informing us who she was, where she lived, and how she happened to get married She told us she was going to visit Lizy Ann, who married a city chap, and boarded at a tavern in L——, about twelve miles distant.

'Does she expect you?' asked the gentleman who sat in the same seat, and who as well as myself, was very much amused by the old lady's talk.

'Well, I reckon she don't. You see I calkerlated to surprise her, for Lizy Ann thinks I'm too old to travel, and if she'd known I was coming, she'd sent word for me not to come on any account. But I pin't but sixty-nine years old, and can do as much work as any lady in town.'

She sat in silence for a moment, perhaps thinking of her own accomplishments, and turning to me, she said:

'Young woman, can you milk?'

The reader will readily understand that, having been brought up in a city, I could not have seen many cows, much less understand the art of milking I accordingly answered in a dignified manner in the negative

'Can't milk!' exclaimed the old lady, astonished, why, Sally Jane—that's her darter milking before she was ten years old. She's my oldest darter, Sally Jane is, and a smart gal, too She takes after her mother!'—and a complacent smile rested on the old lady's countenance.—Then, turning to me again, she said, 'I reckon you're about Sally Jane's age—and you are about her size, too How old may you be—if I might be bold enough to ask?'

I can't say I liked the idea of being compared to the daughter of such a woman even in size and age, therefore I answered rather petulantly:

'Only twenty-four!' exclaimed the old lady, 'why Sally Jane is past thirty, and I'm sure she looks younger than you do. But then some people does show their age more than others.'

I was too indignant to reply to this, and, to hide my feelings, I pretended to move the carpet bag (which still lay in my lap) in order to take my handkerchief from my pocket. As ill luck would have it, the bag dropped from my grasp immediately on the nervous gentleman's feet. He sprang forward, exclaiming—'Oh! my corns, my corns!' and pitched the old lady, handbox and all, against the gentleman at my side. He was just on the point of looking out of the window when the accident happened, and reached forward just in season for the old lady's handbox to strike his head. The blow came so suddenly, and with such force, that his hat was knocked into my lap, and his head forced into the handbox, which was of thin pasteboard, thereby damaging the old lady's Sunday bonnet, which it contained. After much confusion, order was at length restored, though the old lady insisted that I 'knocked the bag down a purpose'

She was still talking about her 'bunnit' being spoiled, when the stage stopped, and the driver informed her that she had reached her place of destination. 'How much are you a going to charge me for my ride?' asked she, fumbling in her pocket for her purse.

'Seventy-five cents,' said the driver.

'But you hadn't ought to charge me more'n half price, seein' that I had to set in this man's lap all the way.'

'That's the regular price, and I can't say any less; besides,' added he, noticing her size, 'if you sat in his lap all the time, he had the worst of the bargain, no doubt.'

Just then the old lady discovered that her purse was missing She at length declared that all the passengers must be searched. 'Though for my part,' she said, pointing to me, 'I suspect that young woman in the corner has taken it.'

'What!' exclaimed I, indignantly, 'do you accuse me of stealing?'

'Well,' said she, 'perhaps I may be wrong, but I doubt it. You don't look very honest at any rate.'

To satisfy her we emptied our pockets, but the missing purse could not be found.

'What kind of a purse was it?' asked the driver.

'Why, it was a green silk one that Lizy Ann made for me, and only yesterday I marked the first two letters of my name on it—T. T., for 'Tildy Trott.'

After a protracted search, the purse was found at the feet of the old lady, where it had dropped, and I was relieved from the disagreeable suspicion of being a thief. But the only notice the old lady took of it was to say, when she got out—

'Lucky for you, young woman, that you didn't take it It might have carried you to the State Prison.'

The remainder of the ride passed without any incident worth mentioning, and I got out at my place of destination with not the most pleasant remembrances of 'Tildy Trott.

ELLEN DEVINE.

On a bright and beautiful day in June, 1855, a number of orphan children were brought to Chambersburg, Pa., by the Emigrant Association from the city of New York. They constituted a group of little outcast wanderers, seeking homes among strangers and in a strange land. Sad search for little ones! What must have been their feelings, as one after another they were taken by stranger hands and carried to stranger homes, until at length all were gone save one—a pale, quiet-looking little girl, about six or seven years old. Solitary and alone she was left. She was so tender, so fragile, and so timid-looking, that no one seemed willing to give her a home.

At length, in the providence of God, a gentleman accompanied by his wife, came into the room. They had learned that there were orphan children there, seeking homes, and concluded that they would take one. Upon entering, they found that this delicate little child was the only one that was left. The child looked up for a moment into the face of the lady, and then running to her, called her mother.

This was enough. The mother's heart was touched, and the little stranger found a home. The child was at once taken to her new home, and what little she could tell of her early history was gathered from her by her new friends. She could just remember her mother as being kind and gentle, but no more. She knew that this good mother had died; but she did not see the corpse, and knew not where it was buried. After the death of her mother, her father, a very intemperate and bad man, gave the child to an aunt. And here her first sad lessons in suffering and sorrow were learned

Her aunt's conduct towards her was cruel and heartless; the poor child was exposed to every kind of trial; tasks, far beyond her youthful strength, were imposed upon her, and accosted with threats and blows. So heartless was the treatment received from this aunt, that the father, besotted as he was, could not endure it, and she was taken away and put to the orphans' Refuge. Here the Emigrant Association found her, and from this place she was brought to Chambersburg. When she came to her new home, the cruel treatment she had received was painfully manifested; a foot-fall would startle her, and a shadow on the wall would make her tremble. Her aunt, having been in the habit of frightening her with ghost stories, ghosts were her especial dread. It required months of kind and gentle treatment to overcome these fears; but kindness soon triumphed, and she became the most kind and gentle of children, always obedient and eager to learn. Her new situation had become a home, indeed, and a father and mother were found. Nothing could exceed her affection for her new mother. "Dear mother" and "sweet mother," were expressions that often fell from her lips, especially during her long illness. Her taste for reading was very great, and never for anything else than religious books. For trifling stories she cared nothing, and would not read them

With a taste uncommon to children, she loved the most serious books, and after reading them, would talk about their contents, showing a memory of remarkable power. Above all things on earth, she loved the church and the Sunday-school, and she would often come home and repeat large portions of the sermon, or relate in her earnest way what she had heard in the Sunday-school. She loved her teacher, and spoke feelingly of her; and her dying message to the Sunday-school was, "Tell the children that I am going to heaven, and they must meet me there." Her sufferings were very protracted and severe; but no murmur escaped her lips The realizing sense of the presence of Jesus seemed to lift her above the influence of bodily suffering. Her friends spoke frequently of her uniform gentleness of manner, and kindness of speech; and her sensitive nature was frequently illustrated on her death-bed. On one occasion, when she seemed to be dying, she asked that the little boys of the family might be called from their beds, that she might ask their forgiveness for an impatient expression she had once used towards them. This was a touching scene! the dying child asking forgiveness for an utterance the boys had never noticed, or long since forgotten; but her heart was lightened, and she was peaceful. During all her sickness, she seemed to have a realizing sense of the presence and love of the Saviour; and on the Sabbath before she died she enjoyed the full assurance of faith, and a rich blessing from on high. Her sufferings at this time were very great; yet her face was radiant with smiles She said that she was dying, and going home to heaven, that Jesus was present with her, and was taking her home Her foster mother's heart, bleeding at the sight of her sufferings, she was about to leave the room, when the child said, "Mother, dear mother, do not leave me, I am not suffering very much; stay with me until I am gone."

She always spoke of death with calmness and composure; and when asked where she would like to be buried, she replied, "Any where, only bury me where other people are buried." Even in the grave, the gentle loving child did not want to be alone.

The last hours of her life were quiet and peaceful. Her pains had subsided, and beautiful visions of a sweet little child at her side, and lovely flowers around, seemed to fill her dying imagination. The last words she uttered were expressions of affection for her mother, and unshaken confidence in her Redeemer. In her parting admonitions there was much tenderness, and more than earthly wisdom, and none were forgotten, the smallest child of the household, a very babe in years, being recommended by her to the care of God, and admonished to grow up in his fear.

"And her last fond lingering look is given
To the love she leaves, and then to heaven,
As if she would bear that love away
To a purer world and a brighter day."

The little orphan sleeps in Jesus, and has found a home in heaven! M.

CHINESE PRINTING

We have lately heard how Prince Kung was fain to have copies of the treaty contracted with England posted upon the walls of Pekin, as well as published in the Imperial Gazette. We will suppose for a moment that his highness has the original document in his hand, duly signed in vermilion by his Celestial Majesty, with the impression of the Great Seal of England dependent therefrom, encased in a silver box. But yes mai yee, he must publish the obnoxious document; he therefore commands that they bring a cunning scribe, who takes an accurate copy of the original on very thin paper, this is placed in the hands of a person answering to our compositor. He selects a piece of hard wood, rather larger than the copy, and that being something like four feet square, his stock is severely taxed to afford one of the dimensions required. The copy is then glued upon the surface, with the face downward, so that the characters show, though reversed. He then cuts away all the plain paper and a film of the board with marvellous celerity, leaving the letters standing out in low bas-relief. The board then passes from the compositor, (or more properly the carver) to the printer. He fixes it in a frame, and dipping a large brush in very thin Indian ink, he passes it lightly over the surface in such a manner that a sufficient quantity is left for four or five impressions. From a pile of paper he selects a sheet, and deftly lays it upon the board, pressing it gently down by drawing a soft brush over it, increasing the pressure with each impression till the whole of the ink has been absorbed. So rapid is the process that it is confidently asserted that one man can print seven hundred sheets an hour; and, in this instance, we can well imagine that the command for expedition was urgent. In respect of the treaty it are remained nothing to be done, but to post it upon the walls of Pekin. But as regards book-work, the Chinese paper is so thin that only one side is printed; in order to avoid the unsightly blank appearances of every alternate page, the sheet is so folded that the doubled edge is in front, and the board having been so engraved as to contain two pages, the effect is the same as though the impress had been taken on both sides of the paper. The binder is careful to make the single edges form the back of the book, the folds being in front, which are never cut.—Chambers' Journal.

A LETTER FROM AN ARMY CHAPLAIN.

The following letter from the Rev. A. Axline, of the Second Iowa Regiment, which performed prodigies of bravery at the taking of Fort Donelson, will be read with a melancholy interest:—

Savannah, Tenn., March 17th, 1862.

Dear Brother Passavant:—Since my last from St. Louis, Mo., our regiment has passed through some exciting scenes, a brief account of which may be of some interest to the readers of your excellent paper. On Tuesday, the 11th of February, we left St. Louis early in the morning; and, after a pleasant and interesting passage down the Mississippi, and up the Ohio and Cumberland Rivers, we finally arrived at a point about four miles below Fort Donelson some time during the night of the 13th, where we remained on the boat until the following morning. At early dawn, the troops from our own boat and others, amounting in all to nearly ten thousand men, were speedily landed, and soon we were wending our way towards the field of strife. About noon we reached the place of our destination, on the right wing of the enemy and our left. The weather had become quite cold, and there was already a considerable snow on the ground, so that our men who had left their blankets at the boat found it very difficult to keep comfortable. They built up large fires, however, and stood and sat around them till morning, very few even attempting to sleep. Early on Saturday, the 15th, the Rebels made an attack on our right, evidently designing to cut their way through our lines and effect their escape; but a long and desperate struggle made it apparent that they could not possibly succeed, and they finally retired again into their intrenchments. About this time an order came that a charge should be made by our left upon the enemy's right, and soon everything was ready for the attack. The Second Iowa Regiment led the charge, and was supported by the 25th Indiana, the 7th Iowa, and 13th Iowa, these constituting Col. Lauman's Brigade. The ground over which our men were compelled to pass was strewn with logs and brush, and so steep that it would have been difficult of ascent, even of there had been no obstructions in the way, and yet our brave men charged up the hill at double quick, with fixed bayonets; and although many of them fell, killed and wounded, they never faltered nor fired a shot until they reached the enemy's entrenchments. Then they poured into the Rebel ranks a storm of leaden hail which scattered them in all directions, and they were compelled to take shelter behind their inner fortifications. Here the battle raged till almost dark, when our troops were drawn off to the outer works, prepared to renew the attack in the morning. When the morning came, however, the white flag was seen waving over the fort, and soon the news was spread throughout our camp that the Rebels had made an unconditional surrender of everything. It seemed difficult at first for our men to realize the truth of the report, but when it was made certain they sent up cheer after cheer that made the woods ring again In a short time our troops entered the fortifications, headed by our regiment, to which was assigned the post of honor, because it had been the first to carry the stars and stripes into the Rebel works on the previous day. It was a proud day for the Second Iowa, but it richly deserved all the honor which it received. Almost every officer and man in the regiment had contributed his full share towards the glorious success which had crowned the efforts of the preceding day, and no less than forty of their comrades lay dead upon the bloody field, and many more were suffering terrible agony in the hospital. I will not attempt to describe the scene of suffering which I witnessed on the field during the fight, and afterwards whilst the wounded were lying on the cold damp ground having their wounds dressed, and awaiting their turn to be taken to some place of shelter. It was two o'clock on Sunday morning before we were able to remove them all indeed two or three were not found until some time during the next day. Then it was a sad sight to look at those ghastly corpses as they lay scattered over the field in almost every position; some mangled with canister shot or cannon balls; some covered with dirt and blood, in consequence of the dreadful struggle with which they had terminated their untimely career on earth; while others seemed to be sweetly sleeping with a smile upon their countenance, as if they had welcomed death for their country with joy, and I felt like treading lightly less I might disturb their peaceful slumbers. Then I could not help thinking of the spirits which had so recently left those tenements of clay. Have they flown to a world of bliss where war is unknown? Were they prepared to dwell with God forever? Have they left kindred spirits on earth who will learn their loss with tears of sorrow? How many hearts have been bereaved! How many homes have been made desolate by the loss of those whose lifeless forms now lie before me! Such were the thoughts which would crowd upon my mind as I contemplated the scene of blood and carnage around me Talk not of "the pomp and circumstance of glorious war!" It is a hideous monster too frightful to contemplate A battle may not appear so terrible to those who sit comfortably by the fireside and read about it from their favorite daily, but let them see the reality upon the field; let them hear the shrieks of the wounded and the groans of the dying, and methinks they will say with many of our brave men who participated in the memorable fight of Fort Donelson: "I am satisfied; I never wish to see another battle."

On the 6th inst., we left Fort Donelson in the midst of a severe snow storm, and arrived the day following at a point about two miles above Fort Henry Here we pitched our tents and remained till the 12th inst., when we started up the Tennessee River to this place. On Sunday, the 9th inst., we held religious services, for the first time this Spring, in the open air, and the weather was so mild that we found it quite pleasant to worship the God of our fathers once more under the broad canopy of heaven. During the winter we were compelled to hold our services in the quarters of the soldiers, and hence were very much hampered for want of room, but now we have no difficulty of that kind. On last Lord's day we held our devotions in the cabin of the boat upon which we are lying. But we have just been ordered to go on up the river as far as Pittsburgh, Tenn., and hence I must close my letter in order to be able to send it off as soon as possible. If anything transpires worthy of note I will write again.

Yours, in Christ,

A. Axline,
Chaplain, 2d Iowa Reg. Infantry.

STATISTICS.

American Religious Statistics.—Zion's Herald gives an important summary of American religious statistics, as follows:

"The Baptist Church was organized in 1639, and had in 1850, 9980 churches, valued at $11,001,127, and accommodating 3,248,580 persons, and a membership of 986,807. At the present time it has 12,371 churches, 8952 ministers, and 1,020,442 members. This embraces the Baptists in all part of the United States.

"The Presbyterian Church was organized in 1706, and had, in 1850,

REVIVAL

Rev. Stephen Smith, of the Zion Mission, Philadelphia, is holding his protracted meetings. He reports to us that some 20 conversions have already taken place, and the altar is crowded every night with poor, penitent souls, inquiring for Jesus. God be praised for his gracious work.

REV. J. P. CAMPBELL.

We call special attention to Rev. J. P. Campbell's article in relation to a Bishops' Council; because we believe it to be the only correct and proper method to get at the case he alludes to. To tell the truth, it is the very reason why we have not said anything about the matter, because we, as the publishers of our beloved Discipline, &c., try to keep ourselves posted upon all subjects pertaining to the government of the Church, and the very points which Brother Campbell refers to in our Discipline, are the ones which we have already jotted down in our memorandum, to take with us when we visit the Conferences.

"ANGLO-AFRICAN"

We see that the editor and managers of the Anglo-African are following our plan for raising funds to assist in carrying forward their printing operations. It will be remembered that we argued, for several weeks, in the Recorder, the importance of the Sabbath Schools of our Church to give exhibitions for the benefit of the Christian Recorder, on the birth-day of the sainted Allen, and some few have responded, and others are looked for yet.

AID FOR THE CONTRABANDS.

The members of Bethel Church, in Sixth St., Philadelphia, are engaged in making up clothing for the contrabands. They are cutting and sewing day and night, up to nine and ten o'clock. We would recommend the different churches to pursue a similar course. It is really interesting to drop in at Bethel Church and see the activity of both males and females. Let all who want to give anything for this good cause, come forward immediately. We refer our readers to the advertisement of the Social and Statistical Association in aid of the same great enterprise, to which contributions may be sent.

☞ JOHN S ROCK, Esq., of Boston, a colored gentleman, and a member of the bar, who is now in our city, lectured at the Institute for Colored Youth. He speaks German and French quite fluently. May his name ever live. His lecture for Tuesday evening will be found among our advertisements.

APPOINTMENTS.

On Sunday, the 6th inst., the afternoon services in the A. M. E. Wesley Church, Hurst St., commencing at 3 o'clock, will be dedicated to Almighty God for the benefit of the Sabbath School connected with said church. A sermon will be delivered on the occasion by the Rev. E. Weaver, Editor and General Book Steward of the A. M. E. Connexion. In the evening, the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper will be administered. Sermon to be delivered by Rev. T. Cooper, of Camden, commencing at half-past 7 o'clock.

NOTICE.

To all whom it may concern:—

This is to certify that we took up a collection in Bethel Church, Philadelphia, for the benefit of the New Brunswick A. M. E. Church. We counted the money, and made it amount to $17.00. I paid it over to Brother P. Gardner, pastor of said church. The collection was taken up on Sabbath, the 10th of November, 1862, and on the next Tuesday, Brother Gardner came to me and said that he had carefully counted the money over, and could not make but $16 00, and gave the amount to me on a piece of paper. I thought perhaps we had made a mistake in the counting, and so let it pass as being all right, and hope that this will be satisfactory to all concerned.

JOSHUA WOODLIN, minister in charge.

BAD TREATMENT—OLD SATAN LOOSED FOR A SHORT SEASON.

Our Louisville (Ky.,) correspondent writes of a distressing time in that city. It would really appear that old Satan has broken loose for a very short season, since the Northern soldiers have left that city on their way South, to rout the secessionists and to bring them to an account for rebelling against good government. The man who is now acting as Provost Marshal, (who is a confirmed negro hater, and who has, probably, some fears as to how the Government will dispose of them at the close of the war,) knowing that his reign will be a very short one, seems to take advantage of the power vested in him, by imposing heavy burdens on the people, cutting short their privileges, and closing the sanctuaries of worship—not even allowing them to pray together. We would like to know if the Government sanctions such conduct in one of its officers? If these loyal colored men and women are found in open rebellion to the Government, let them be taken and treated as such. If they are caught in a conspiracy, in any way whatever, let them suffer the penalty of the law. But if they have passes from their masters in Louisville, to go and meet and worship with their brethren, and to be at home at seasonable hours, we would like to know whose right it is to interfere? We hope the Government will have an eye to this. We hold that if a colored man is guilty of an unlawful act, his punishment should be in proportion to that of a white man who is guilty of the same offence.

CONTRABANDS

There has been considerable doubts, at least, as to whether the contrabands would be confiscated or not. Many believing that the Government is so obligated to Slavery and its advocates that it was really afraid to do even what it knew to be right and just in the sight of Almighty God; and also that the executors of the law were not faithfully carrying out their pledge to sustain and keep in justice to all mankind, which reads as follows: "All mankind are created equal, and are endowed with certain inalienable rights, among which is life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." However, on one evening of last week, the scales of doubt were thrown from many a mind's eye, by the arrival in our city of ninety-nine contrabands, being one less than a hundred. Therefore, there are no doubts as to whether they are free or not. One of their number was a woman one hundred and four years old. The old lady, since she has gained her freedom, is full of joy to know that God has spared her life to see that day when she could say that she was not a thing but a human being, and could now claim her freedom. The old lady walks and moves around as though she was about 20 years old. Elder Woodlin was called upon to baptise some of the little children; and when he was about to perform that duty, we are told that the mother of one of these children ran out of doors, and some of the ladies tried to prevail on her to go back in the house. She did not know what they were going to do to her child, and partly forgetting that she was now free, the old fear and dread of that oppression came over her, and such a thing as dedicating children to God she had heard nothing of before, and hence she knew nothing about it having been kept in the dark as it relates to her duty to God, herself, and children. Lord who shall abide in thy tabernacles? Many, no doubt, who are enemies to our people, hope to have much to say in relation to those contrabands being a burden and a nuisance in our midst, but we are proud to inform them when the 99 arrived, and the news went abroad, the citizens threw open their doors, and they were all well provided for, and ladies and gentlemen were riding about in their carriages to employ the men and women. Good, but we are sorry that many of them had to go home without being able to find any but what was bespoke. On Monday night last, there was a meeting held at Brick Wesley Church in relation to the contrabands. Many of them were present, and made their statement as to their freedom, which they appreciate as far superior to that of slavery. Some made a statement that they had to support their masters and all their family, and then had to support themselves aside from that. They knew very well that they could take care of No. 1 with ease, because they well understand how to work and to economize. May the good Lord bless them in health, and enable them to prove to their enemies that they know much better how to make an honest living than those who may oppose their God-given rights.

TWO CENT MONEY.

We call the special attention of the brethren to page 219, New Discipline, in relation to the two-cent money, and especially to the 10th paragraph under the same page. We do hope that all of our brethren having charge of circuits and stations will obey the General Conference of our beloved Zion, and commence in time to collect their two-cent money; and if the brethren have so far obeyed the law by making a collection every month, or every two months, we are quite sure that there will be a change in matters pertaining to our financial department. Suppose that Bethel Church, of Philadelphia, with over twelve hundred members, (we will say twelve hundred, though there is said to be some fifteen hundred,) should comply with the request; twenty-five times twelve would be three hundred (dollars,)—and this, it will be remembered, is only twenty-five cents a head. At the very lowest estimate, this is what Bethel Church will owe us at our Annual Conference.

The Union Church, placing the membership at two hundred, at twenty-five cents each, will be fifty dollars. Baltimore (Md.) Bethel Church has about twelve hundred members; suppose that she is caused to do her duty—that the minister should feel it his duty to see that each member pays his or her twenty-five cents per year; there would be three hundred dollars due the Book Steward, to be appropriated as per Discipline. Ebenezer Church has at least two hundred members, and twenty-five times two hundred is fifty dollars.

Now here would be seven hundred dollars,—leaving out Washington, New York, Brooklyn, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Louisville, Indianapolis, Chicago, and St. Louis, and besides hundreds of churches on circuits, and other stations where brethren are. If brethren will only do what the regulations of the Church have demanded of them, all would be well. We believe that there is not a member in our Church but what would consider it a great insult to say that they were too poor to pay the small sum of twenty-five cents a year for the benefit of the Book Concern and of our brethren who have labored hard to carry the glad tidings of the gospel to the dying world.

We are glad to see that Rev. Bishop Nazrey has notified all of his Conferences and members to come prepared to give a good account of themselves. So you may look well to the eastern brethren, and govern yourselves accordingly; for if he enforces the law, which he is bound to, somebody's head may have to come off. We hope that the other Bishops will do the same.

REV. BROTHER WEAVER:—It seems as if the breaking up of the winter has awakened us up in this part of the country, and we hope to be able to keep our eyes open, so that we can see what is going on around us. We mean to be somewhere in keeping with the spirit of the times. We preached this afternoon and evening, after which we joined in holy matrimony, Mr. William Fields, of Lee, to Mrs. Martha Michlet, of Lenox; and I do assure you the church was crowded to its utmost capacity. Everything was conducted in the best manner possible, and seemed to give general satisfaction. They were so much pleased, that they remembered us with some of that bright stuff which we all like so well. The groomsman, also, pleased us very much by handing us a paper that had something hard inside. I can tell you it is just such things that make one feel good. We were favored with several pieces of sacred music by the Misses Brusters, ladies whose musical talents are much appreciated. May these only be dew-drops before a more plentiful shower.

THE GREAT PROSPECT.

The heart of the colored man almost swells to bursting as he views the wonderful change taking place in his civil relation to the American nation. One is forced to exclaim: "Thank God that thou rulest." In the present conflict we behold the onward march of ideas; ideas to which the Spirit of God and of nature has given birth. These are powers more terrible to workers of iniquity, who oppress the weak and rob immortality to pamper in luxurious ease and magnificence perishing mortality, than gleaming sabres or thundering cannon; powers which the votaries of wrong cannot render totally inactive, but only give increased momentum by opposition. A great American orator, whom I love to honor, says: "It is the maxim of natural philosophers, that the natural forces wear out in time all obstacles and take their place; and it is the maxim of history, that victory always falls at last where it ought to fall; or, there is a perpetual march and progress to ideas." It seems that they are destined to remove one obstacle after another until man shall have what, and be what, God intended. An entire revolution of the social and political institutions of the Southern States is an inevitable sequence of the causes now at work.

The close of this war will find upon Southern soil thousands of hardy yeomen, skilful mechanics, practical farmers, and professional men. They will love the South because they redeemed the South. Accustomed to gaze upon the sterile soil of New England, its rocks, its hills, and other natural barriers, over which their indomitable energy and perseverance alone enabled them to triumph, they will be apt to look with delight upon the rolling lands of the South, intersected with beautiful rivers, the mild winter, the early balmy spring, and the easy road to wealth.

The North has not one-tenth part of the physical advantages of the South; and is only superior in resources because she had no snake of slavery in her bosom to destroy her vital energies. Who cannot see that the colored population of the South are to be mightily advanced? What inviting fields are to be opened for usefulness? To say nothing of the other States of rebeldom, just look at Virginia! See the immense colored population of the cities of Roanoke, Norfolk, Richmond, Petersburgh, committees of colored people who are noted for industry and thrift, but who are ignorant. They are suffering for the Gospel and for education. They want a light to carry them through the world, and through "the dark valley and shadow of death." If there are colored men here and there whose intellect, piety, and energy place them head and shoulders above their brethren, now is the time for them to be up and doing. With a heart for any fate, the slaves who may be emancipated, or who may, of military necessity, (contrabands) become free, are destined to swell the colored population of the large cities and rural towns. They will want religious encouragement, direction, and education. Surely there is a mighty work before the colored churches, and we hope in God they will not exhaust their energies in contending about Bishops or anything else. Better give a bone of contention (even if it be a hundred bishops) a secure burial than have it breeding a train of evils which affect the interests of millions born and unborn. This is no time for trifling; no time for standing upon formalities, bringing up dead issues, and with no higher ambition than self-aggrandizement, war against individual collective co-workers. There are always a set of men who want to be thought great, yet do nothing and try to do nothing; they sit still and find fault. If you have a revival, they will say: "Oh, it is all nothing!" If you do anything to improve the people, they are ready to say: "It don't amount to much." May Elijah's God put in motion the whip and spur of our Saviour's gospel, and of progress, and whip out these drones. And may we all realize the great prospect of bringing to Christ and educating the millions of the South "who crave the bread which we can give." EACHS.

BISHOP NAZREY, OR THE TRUE STATE OF THE CASE.

In consequence of the occurrence of a typographical error in our last article, number 64, upon the subject with which this is headed, and the vital importance of the propositions therein contained, we will here republish these propositions with a few additional words, as they follow:—

First. All parties who are not immediately interested and concerned in his administration, let Bishop Nazrey alone in the full and peaceable enjoyment of all the rights and privileges conferred upon him by the General Conference of the A. M. E. Church, and, also, by the Episcopal arrangements of the Bishops, made at the General Conference for 1860.

We have no fears that Bishop Nazrey will ever be found engaged in an attempt to subvert, alter, change, overthrow and annihilate the doctrines and discipline, government and usages of the African Methodist Episcopal Church.

Secondly. Let the three Bishops, Quinn, Nazrey, and Payne, meet in a Bishops' council, as they really ought, and are in duty bound to do, and amicably settle it, if there be any difficulty found by them in the Episcopal relation of Rev. Willis Nazrey. This should be done before the meeting of the first one of our Annual Conferences to be held for 1862.

Thirdly. If the Bishops meet in council as they should do, on or before the meeting of the first Annual Conference for 1862, and they learn at that meeting that they cannot agree upon such terms as will give to them and all parties concerned mutual satisfaction, then, let them agree to recommend to the Several Annual Conferences meeting this year, the calling of a Special General Conference to meet at a given time and place, especially to settle this and other questions to be named in the call.

We call the prompt attention and the faithful action of the Bishops to, and upon the law governing the case.

Discipline, page 65. "At each and all of our Annual Conferences not less than two of the Bishops should be present." Discipline, page 57. "The General Superintendents or acting Bishops, with or by the advice of all the Annual Conferences, shall have power to call a General Conference, if they judge it necessary at any time."

Discipline, page 67. "In all classes of difficulty where the presence of a Bishop may be required, it shall be the duty of the Bishop to attend when notice is given by the officers of the Church."

We hope and pray, that our Bishops will not unjustly and contemptuously disregard our calling of their attention to these provisions of the Law. We are in duty bound cheerfully and willingly to love and respect our Bishops, just so long as they love and respect the laws by which we are, or at least ought to be governed.

A Bishops' Council held in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, and for his glory, under the guiding influences of the Holy Spirit, in the love of God, and with an eye single to his glory, will settle forever and at once, without further trouble or difficulty, whatever apparent cause there may now be for trouble or difficulty in the case under consideration.

We, the ministers and members of the Church, who are the true and faithful friends of our Beloved Zion, earnestly pray and beseech you, "Our affectionate Brethren and Pastors, who labor night and day, both in public and private, for our good," to attend to this matter without further delay, lest evil befall us through your neglect.

If the Bishops met annually in Council before the meeting of any one of the Annual Conferences to hold an annual meeting, there could never exist many of the evils, by which, as a Church and ministry we are now most severely afflicted; and must forever be while the Bishops' Annual Council is not held.

REV. J. M BROWN, AND THE EPISCOPAL CONTROVERSY.

Our old friend for whom we cannot afford to do otherwise than entertain the most generous and friendly feelings, seems extremely unwilling, ingenuously to acknowledge that we have given to the Church and the world the true state of the case relative to Bishop Nazrey's position.

In the Repository, Vol. 4, No. 3, he says: "We conceive that our good brother has made a splendid blunder in his two articles in the Christian Recorder, No. 3, Feb. 22d, 1862. This blunder, we cannot think intentional, but a Lapsus Calami,—is not this charitable." We answer that we shall certainly think it to be charitable when he succeeds in proving "a Lapsus Calami;" that is, when he shall have succeeded in proving that we have fallen, or slidden into a misfortune by which we have brought any great distress upon ourself or other individuals.

The Editor will certainly excuse our bold attempt to translate his learned Latin into unlearned English, when we have informed him that we have done it for the benefit of the readers of the Christian Recorder, many of whom are not acquainted at all with the learned-dead languages. They are not Hebrew, Greek and Latin scholars, and our duty is, to speak not to them in an unknown tongue, according to the Scriptures, but in one that they know and understand. We have purposed in heart a reply to our friend when we have heard what he has to say, first, if he proves what he has asserted, we will acknowledge the truth. Secondly, if he does not prove what he has asserted, we shall feel at liberty to show up his fallacious reasonings, contradictions, and absurdities.

We are sorry, that the Editor of the Repository has gone so far out of the good and right way, as to make an unjustifiable attack upon the Editor of the Christian Recorder. He says: "The Recorder is burdened with the Episcopal question: no less than four long articles appeared in the last number. We shall be prepared to vote by General Conference. Hope that we shall all consider it prayerfully." Does our brother think that to be a just and manly statement? God forbid that he should be so far lost to all sense or what constitutes a just cause of propriety. He is both a gentleman and a scholar.

Recently, the Editor of the Christian Recorder has done himself much credit in the management of the Episcopal discussion; he has acted wisely by giving all parties a hearing through the columns over which he presides. None have a just ground of complaint against him, and by the course he has pursued in this matter, he has lost no friends in number; and if he continues to pursue the same course that he has done during several weeks past we shall certainly know how to vote in the General Conference.

The sixth reason assigned by the Editors of the Repository, why it should be continued and patronized, reads as follows:

6. "Because we need an organ which will publish both sides of any question concerning our Ecclesiastical affairs, whether they harmonize with our views or be opposed to them. The Repository is such an organ, therefore it ought to be supported." That is a very liberal proposition, and most powerful reason why the Repository should be supported. But do the Editors of the Repository practise according to that rule? We think they do not.

We have seen a series of scandalous abuses trumped up against Bishop Nazrey, in four successive numbers of the Repository, and thus far we have not seen that any man has been allowed to say one word in his defence. It is well said by another, that "consistency is a jewel." You have not been consistent. But the Editor of the Recorder for some weeks past, at any rate, has been consistent, and if he goes a head steadily in that particular direction he will not lose his reward. "We shall consider the subject prayerfully."

MR. EDITOR:—With your permission the subscriber proposes, in this communication, to notice some of the charges, allegations, or complaints urged against one of the bishops of the A. M. E. Church. Let every man be nameless here, while we take cognizance only of position, fact, and principle. Others have firm dates, documents, and quotations sufficient, and we will not, therefore, burden this brief article with them.

The first thought that strikes us is this—Is the person in question one of the Bishops of said church? We affirm that he is duly and honestly elected to that high position, and is thereby entitled to the unqualified support and esteem of at least those who were instrumental in his elevation; provided, however, always that he has not forfeited such support by deviation from moral rectitude on the one hand, or an abandonment of well-defined legal rules on the other.

The former is not charged; but the latter is intimated by implication, and as innuendo, indeed, is attempted to be urged by what some might, out of charity, call argument. Now let us come to the case disrobed of all extraneous issues.

In what act or series of acts does the groundwork exist?

Let it be understood that we demand that the indictment shall be made plain, both with regard to time, circumstances, persons, and place. His standing was certainly legally and morally good at the time the General Conference requested him to resign a relationship, not that he himself had, but one that the Conference had created for him. Up to this hour then all was right, so far as he was concerned.

Resignations are mere individual announcements formally disconnecting one's self from official relation, so far as it can individually be done. The merest tyro in deliberative matters must know, that the individual who presents to a body a paper containing his resignation, has no power whatever to compel its acceptance. The case of the bishop would still be more difficult in this respect than an orderly case, for the reason of the B. M. E. Church not acknowledging him as a party to the agreement, and hence, duying his power to so disconnect himself. And, indeed, it appears plain, from our stand-post, that instead of the bishop being the sinner, so far in the case that the blame rests with the power that made the arrangement with the Canada Church for not accompanying or preceding the resignation with agentary powers, to absolve themselves from relations resulting from previous legislation. But we will not press this matter, not desiring to deal in recrimination, or to stand on mere punctilios.

Again, it is urged that since he offered his resignation, that he has avowed himself Bishop in Canada. Now, with what show of truth can this charge be sustained? Why simply by the quibling captiousness and play upon words, which we will endeavor to show, as follows:

A charges B with having said certain things which were not true. B rejoins that, according to what A says, I must have told a lie. Now, who but one desiring much to make it so, would see in the rejoinder an assertion or even admission of the charge? Who is able to see, in the reply of our Saviour to those who charged him with casting out devils, an admission of the truth of their charge, because he reasoned from their premises?

As one of the laity we are ashamed of these attacks on one of our bishops. Not that we are among those who would sit down in silence and awe, and allow authority to trample us beneath its feet. Nor would we play the sycophant; but our reputation as a people, as a church, and as Christians, seems alike to forbid such deportment as has distinguished some ministers of the gospel of peace. In this case, in spite of all the charity that we can summon to our aid, there does appear disgustingly conspicuous in these assaults, an acrimony and a bitterness backed by a determination to embarrass one whom you have elevated to a position rendered all the more vulnerable by its eminence. We hold that a high sense of honor, a determination never to take a mean advantage of another, a strict adherence to truth, delicacy and politeness towards those with whom we hold intercourse, are the essential characteristics of those who are entitled to the name of gentlemen. But when in addition to this Christian character, it is claimed with the superadded responsibilities of high clerical profession, it is not expecting too much, that these endowments shall extinguish those who lay claim to them in our midst. If these brethren desire us to respect them, when placed over us without our vote or choice, they must encourage us in doing so by respecting those placed over them by their vote and choice. Example in this case is worth much more than precept.

Many of the laity are confounded and amazed in the presence of the sorrowful fact, that one who occupies a similar official position in our connexion, should join in the hue and cry that has been raised against the bishop in our district. In the present writing we shall say no more than this—that we deem it an evidence of unjustifiable eagerness to condemn on his part a co-ordinate official, and thereby compromising his impartiality in the extent of the matter ever coming before the General Conference. Now, if I shall be brought to judgment for the above remark, or animadverting unfavorably on those high in authority, let him that is without sin in this respect cast the first stone.

A LETTER FROM KENTUCKY.

MR. EDITOR:—As it has been some time since I have corresponded with you, and my mind being pregnant with many thoughts concerning our condition and situation in Kentucky, I thought that it would not be amiss to give you a few items by way of information, and also the many readers of the RECORDER. Your correspondents from Washington, Baltimore, and other directions in the East, have thrown much "light, West," on the various topics of the day, especially as it regards our people, and we feel honored to reciprocate the favor.

We are truly glad to learn that the effects of the war has so far proved beneficial to our race in the vicinity of Washington, Alexandria, Baltimore, and elsewhere, our prayers are, that it may continue, for to enjoy the privileges of a free man, and then be kidnapped, and taken into bondage, is but little less than death, from which good Lord deliver me.

Louisville has been noted as being one of the best Southern cities for privileges toward our people, but it has undergone many changes for several years—for the worst. When the rebellion broke out we were worshipping every Sabbath and once through the week, in our churches, and when the legions of the North made Louisville their headquarters, it seemed that a new reign was instituted, and we worshipped in our splendid churches, almost ad libitum, and nothing said to the contrary, notwithstanding.

But lo! a sad change has taken place, the Northern army has proceeded southward, forcing its passage into the "Land of Dixie." Kentucky has been redeemed; "her white people are free" and her "free blacks are enslaved," and they have no more "rights that white men are bound to respect." Our condition so far is worse than before the war. Our churches are closed, and a free man cannot walk after dark though he has his free papers, with the great seal of the state and county, and owns thousands of dollars' worth of property, (which some do) and pay taxes, and support the war, and be also loyal to the government. All this has been brought about by a slaveholder and a negro hater, the Provost Marshal, whose name is Dent, he having control of the city since the removal of the headquarters of Gen Buell to Nashville, and instead of hunting rebels, as there are thousands in the city, he has made the colored people his subjects of oppression and inhuman treatment. He commenced his cruel operations by ordering his provost guards, the cavalry men, to flog all colored persons out after dark, free or slave; so we were then pounced upon with the cow hide and cat-o'nine tails in old "plantation style" without hinderance, for his order was supreme. He had many visitors the next day to inquire into his order: he replied, it was a "military" order and must be respected. All free negroes who had business out after dark, must have passes.

COPY OF PASS.

Headquarters, Provost Guard, Louisville, Mar '62.

By order of Lt. Col. Henry Dent, A. B., is permitted to pass from his shop on C street to his home on W street. This pass will be respected until 10½ o'clock, P. M.

SELLY HARVEY,
Major, Pro. Guard.

Before one of these passes could be obtained you would be compelled to take some responsible white citizen with you, and then undergo the most severe and rigid investigation, as though the blacks were conspiring to overthrow the government; at first he refused to respect passes given by masters to their slaves, but after receiving some severe cursing, he concluded to respect white men. Mr. Editor, these are some of the ordeals we are passing through in the "neutral state of Kentucky," and we have yet to see the first remonstrance raised against it by the press; our daily editors are dumb; they open not their mouths; from their silence I judge it is approved by them. I think that if the government has any loyal people in her midst, it is the colored people, and they have done good service even in this city towards detecting smugglers and traitors, and the Marshal has at times been suspected of secession proclivities; I judge that he is now being revenged on the colored people for their faithfulness to the Union cause, as his guards have dispensed with fire arms and formed into "patrols" and instituted the cow hide and cat-o'nine tails, which seem to please them well, for they are very nimble and dexterous in chasing the blacks after dark, through the streets, on the pavements, down lanes and alleys, as though they were riding down wild bulls, and when caught their cries and screams are heart-rending, but no one dare interfere for the patrol are dressed in "Uncle Sam's livery." Some have been whipped unmercifully.

Our churches has suffered much since this barbarous treatment. He has told them to open on Sunday, but some have had the flogging meted out to them after benediction, so many have concluded to stay at home, (since old Satan has been loosed) but we trust "only for a little season." Now you see the effect of the war in this direction. This is considerable worse than the old status, and if it is to continue, I think of all men we will be the most miserable. And as it regards the subject of emigration, such treatment as we have been receiving for two weeks, if not discontinued, we will be willing to go any where rather than suffer such degradation, and it is now the theme of many, Where shall we go? And where can we go?

About three weeks ago, our esteemed and worthy brother, Rev. M. M. Clark visited us, and he preached and lectured in both of our churches and in two of the churches under the M. E. church, on the subject of Liberia, his tour while in that country, &c., &c. His lecture was highly interesting to our community from the fact that the information was general and satisfactory to nearly all who heard him, and he had crowded houses on each occasion. He was tendered the hospitality of the city by the mayor, and the police forbidden to disturb him; he has proceeded to the capital of the state and other surrounding towns, where no doubt he will be treated kindly, but we venture to say, that on no other subject could he get permission to lecture in this state, hence the cause of so much mistrust among our people on the subject of Liberia and colonization.

The sympathy and prayers of our people have been for the ultimate triumph of the Union cause, but if these are the fruits we fear that we have not prayed aright, but we shall continue to pray, and also begin to work some with our hands, and feet and legs. Perhaps our faith hath been without works, and if so, pray for us, that we may have strong faith, living faith, and great works also. AN OBSERVER.

Louisville, Ky., March, 1862.

For the Christian Recorder.

MR. EDITOR:—A short time since, I was in company with several of the ministers and officers of one of our churches, when a brother inquired if a certain doctrine was taught as being essential to the admission of persons into the "Church of Christ" as members? Several of the brethren made replies to the interrogatory, but nothing definite was arrived at while I was present. My mind was forcibly impressed with the importance of the subject, and I was led to consider if there might not be some means by which the doctrines, faith, and tenets, of our Church might not only be given to the ministers and adult persons, as is by the "Discipline," but also to that class upon which the hopes of our Church in the future, are placed—that is, our young people, particularly those of the Sabbath School. In a word, I would ask, Mr. Editor, Has the A. M. E. Church a Catechism containing its doctrines, tenets, and faith—a Catechism, from which a correct exposition of its principles may be learned and taught in our schools, as have other denominations of Christians? If there is none, (and I fear there is not,) and if there are no persons appointed to compile and arrange a series of questions and answers, showing forth the principles of our beloved Zion, will not some good father or brother in the ministry use his efforts and energy that so great and important a want may be supplied to our youth, that they, having learned our system of faith, may be good and intelligent members of the Church of Christ. Respectfully yours.

Coates St., April 2, 1862.

LONG ARTICLES.

We give notice to the author of this article, and to other brethren, that, unless the subjects treated of by them, are in the proper position for discussion, we shall suppress all articles that occupy over one sheet of paper, except those coming from the Bishops. But as the following one has been on hand for two weeks, we insert it with that understanding.

For the Christian Recorder.

MR. EDITOR:—I have given my answer to the 4th Question in my last. I go on now to answer the balance of Elder Campbell's interrogations.

Question 5th. "When a law, rule or covenant is enacted, made, or agreed to, and the said covenant is ratified between two or more parties, can the said law, rule, or covenant, be abrogated, set aside, made null and void, by any one of the parties at will, without the consent of all parties concerned?"

I answer this negatively. This is a mixed-up, unjointed question; but I answer in the negative.

Mr. Editor, Elder Campbell has made the fifth Question a heterogeneous piece of work. We are informed by logicians, that a proposition is a verbal representation of some act, affection, or perception of the mind, which consists of a subject, a predicate, and a copula. The subject of a proposition is that of which something (not things,) is either commanded, asserted, or inquired. Then, according to this, we find a number of questions asked in Elder Campbell's 5th Question, which 6th Question of his I will divide into a number of plain, simple questions, for the sake of convenience. The first of these is—"Is not a minister of Jesus Christ commanded to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature?" I do not suppose, Mr. Editor, that anybody ever would answer this question only in the affirmative, more than this question is certainly irrelevant to the subject in hand. The second one is—"If, in obedience to that command, the Church sends him into the province referred to above, can it be truthfully said that he is exercising double jurisdiction?" A wonderful question, indeed! If, in obedience to that command, the Church sends him into the province referred to above, was Bishop Nazrey sent to Canada to officiate as Bishop over the Canada Church, merely in obedience to the command, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature?" What a futile subterfuge! I would say, though, in order to answer the question squarely, that I do not think it could be said, in truth, that a Bishop was exercising double jurisdiction if he were sent to the province of Canada merely in obedience to our Saviour's command, as stated above? If he had passed right on to some other point, in obedience to that command, and had not stopped four years to officiate as Bishop, there would not have been the least sign of double jurisdiction. The third question is—"And can it be said, in truth, that Bishop Nazrey exercised, also, double functions, because he may be exercising double jurisdiction?" I answer, if it were true in one case—that he did, it would be true in the other. You see, Mr. Editor, that I have made three full questions, or propositions, of Elder Campbell's 6th Question, and yet there are quite a number of words in it which are neither subject, predicate, nor copula, but a mere waste of paper, time, and ink, as well as of words.

Now, Mr. Editor, I can but conclude that the whole of this 6th Question of Elder Campbell's (of which I have made three, and had a surplus of words over,) is not only irrelevant, but it is also a kind of ignoratio elenchi.

When I consider, Mr. Editor, the nature of Elder Campbell's 7th Question, I think (to use his own language,) that he has lost sight of the major proposition; or, at least, we will examine, briefly, the nature of the subject that he has under consideration, namely, the office of a minister sent to a foreign Court. I do this because he asks, in Question 7th, "Can it be said of a minister of State, sent to a foreign Court, that he is exercising double functions when performing those duties assigned him?" His duties, then, diplomatically speaking, are to negotiate, or treat, before the Court of the nation to which he is sent, so as to keep up friendly, commercial, and other relations, between that nation and his own. But what was Bishop Nazrey's business as officiating Bishop in Canada? To preside in all their Conferences, to make out the appointments of the travelling preachers, to appoint the principals and teachers for their seminaries and colleges, to change and suspend their preachers, as necessity might require, to decide questions of law, and to see to the spiritual and temporal concerns of the entire Church in Canada. Has a minister of State, as he calls him, anything of this sort to do? A wonderful comparison, indeed! This 7th Question amounts to a non causa pro causa, as the logician would say. So I leave it for every one who may read it, to judge of it.

Elder Campbell says: "If the unreasonable ground assumed by those who have asserted and attempted to prove (but, happily for the Church, have failed to do so,) that Bishop Nazrey is not a member of the A. M. E. Church, be admitted, where are we? And what must be admitted to agree with this state of things?"

In answer to this, I would say, that Elder Campbell seems to have set himself up here for a judge. He seems to be trying to avoid an evil that is behind him. It looks to me like men who would act the more wisely to try to avoid evils to come, rather than evils past. I do suppose that that is one of the reasons why this Bishop's case is so hard to settle. The very men who made the blunders by which these troubles came, are not willing to acknowledge their wrongs; and so long as they do not, they will have trouble themselves, and, of course, they will give trouble. But there is one thing they must not forget, and it is a matter of great moment, too, that no human being ever did, or ever can have his sins forgiven, until he confesses them. It would be infinitely better for men to confess their sins, and their ignorance, too, than to die unforgiven.

Elder Campbell, in another place, says: "Having shown that Bishop Nazrey, during the four years referred to, did exercise legal authority in both places."

In answer to this bold and groundless assertion, I would say, that I expect there is not another man in the connexion who entertains the same views upon this subject as those of Elder Campbell,—at least, I hope there is not; for, if I thought there was, I would become uneasy for the connexion in the future. I think this is merely injudiciously petitio principii.

The more I think about the Clark resolution and the doings of those committees, referred to by Elder Campbell, the more erroneous and absurd it seems,—"The empowering of all our Bishops with three Elders selected by them, to say which of our Bishops should serve in Canada, in accordance with the wishes of the Canadian Church." Who ever heard of such a thing in all the wide range of ecclesiastical operations? I know of no precedent for such conduct, throughout the wide world. But let me see what I am saying. A committee appointed to say, or rather to determine which one of the three Bishops belonging to the A. M. E. Church in the States, should go to serve in another Church—one perfectly different from the one to which they belong—the case is a clear one; but who ever heard of such a case? If our Bishops were machines, which only act as they are acted upon, then such a procedure might have been expected; but as they are rational, intelligent, and free moral agents, a different course from that pursued by said committee, would have been more proper. Let us see what it would really run into, logically speaking, to take said committee on their own grounds. They contend, as the others, that it was perfectly legal for them to decree that one of our Bishops should go and serve the Canadian Church. The Canadian Church is distinct from the A. M. E. Church; the Wesleyan Methodist Church is distinct from the A. M. E. Church: then it would be legal for one of our Bishops to serve the Wesleyan Methodist Church, if the Wesleyan Church only knew it, and would but petition our General Conference for one of them. Then, if it be right for us to dispose of our Bishops in this way, we might soon lose the whole number of them.

Elder Campbell, in his winding-up remarks, says: "We are now as we were in the General Conference of '60, opposed to the thing in itself." Then, according to his own showing, he not only was opposed to Bishop Nazrey doing right in said Conference of '60, but he says, in so many words, that he is still opposed to Bishop Nazrey doing right; at least, Mr. Editor, his language bears this interpretation; for he certainly has taken a great deal of pains to show that Bishop Nazrey's position is right. If that is consistency, then I have always taken the opposite for that thing. I think that Elder Campbell's communication is headed wrong. Instead of "The true state of the case," as he has it, it should have been headed "The wrong state of the case." T STROTHER.

Port Royal Contrabands.—At a meeting held on Wednesday evening, at the Philadelphia Institute, by the Executive Committee of the Statistical Association of Colored People, of this city, the following resolutions were passed, which were read at the close of a concert by the Hutchinson Family last evening, given in aid of the escaped slaves at Port Royal.

Resolved, That the claims of the "Contrabands" in the vicinity of Port Royal and elsewhere call loudly upon the friends of humanity for material aid and sympathy.

Resolved, That while there is reason to regret that the Government has not more fully defined the status of these poor creatures, nevertheless it is clearly the duty of the Social, Civil and Statistical Association of the Colored People of Pennsylvania, not only to render aid as an organization, but also to commend these sufferers to the consideration of the various colored churches and societies of this city and State, that they may co-operate in the noble work of helping the Freemen's Association or other proper enterprises, which have undertaken to furnish food, clothing, and teachers, moral and religious, so much needed to relieve immediate distress and to inspire them with hopes of final deliverance.

Resolved, That we cannot lose sight of the Act of Congress, passed at its extra session, or of those proclamations emanating from the several Generals and Commanders of the Army, in which freedom has been declared to the slaves of all parties aiding directly or indirectly the rebellion.

Resolved, That in view of these acts, the slaves cannot (in our judgment) be considered other than FREEMEN.

A Bible Society in India.—The Madrid Auxiliary Bible Society has published versions of the Scriptures which meet the wants of 335,315 square miles of territory, embracing a population of 42,956,506 souls.

The Bible in Russia.—The London Christian World has received a letter from a Russian lady of the highest rank, confirming the statement that the Emperor had been induced to encourage the translation of the Scriptures into the Modern Russ, the vernacular of the millions of Russians who belong to the National Church, and of the two or three millions of Dissenters, such as the Molokai and others. The translation of the entire New Testament has been finished, the publications of all the gospels and of the Acts of the Apostle, has been made, and many thousands have already been put into circulation. The publication of the Epistles and the Book of Revelation will soon follow. A few months ago we could scarcely hope to hear such good news from that great empire. The Lord be praised for it, for, after all, it is a part of "his doings," who is King in Zion, and in whose hand is the government of the earth, with its many rulers and its nations.

President Theodore D. Woolsey, of Yale College, has been appointed to fill the vacancy made in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institute by the death of President Felton, of Harvard University.

Fraser A. Stearns, Adjutant of the 21st Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers, and son of Rev. Dr. Stearns, President of Amherst College, fell in the battle near Newbern, pierced with a bullet in his right breast, and, falling instantly, died in his place.

Horace Holden, Esq., a well-known member of the bar in the city of New York, a Manager of the American Bible Society, and Ruling Elder in the Brick Presbyterian Church, (Rev. Dr. Spring's,) died on Tuesday, the 25th ultimo, in the 70th year of his age. He will be widely lamented.

Hon. Horatio Ballard, Secretary of State for New York, stated, in his recent report to the Legislature, that the whole number of poor persons relieved during the year 1861 in that State was three hundred and fourteen thousand seven hundred and ninety seven, or over ninety thousand more than were thus helped in 1860. The actual amount of money, however, thus expended, was fifty-four thousand dollars less than during the preceding year, showing thus that it must have been but a pittance, indeed, that many received.

Domestic Items.

Operations of Gen. Sherman.—Union Manifestations in Eastern Florida.—Another State has been wrested from the sham Confederacy. Pensacola has been evacuated, together with Forts Barrancas and McRae, and the whole area of Florida has been abandoned to our armies. General Sherman has issued a proclamation to the Floridians, in which he assures them that his mission is one of peace rather than conquest. All loyal citizens are assured that they shall be protected in the pursuance of their occupations, and the enjoyment of their constitutional rights. The General recommends them to assemble in their cities and towns to swear allegiance to the Constitution of the United States, and to elect their officers in the "good old way," presiding as a result the return of prosperous and peaceful times.

At a meeting of the loyal citizens of Jacksonville, on the 20th, a declaration of rights, protest, and resolutions were unanimously adopted, to the following effect

That no State has a constitutional right to separate from the United States; that the act of Secession adopted by the State convention is void, being in conflict with the Constitution, is never having been submitted to the people for ratification. That Florida is an integral part of the United States, subject to its constitutional jurisdiction, and we believe that thousands of her citizens will hail with joy the restoration of the Government, bringing deliverance from the terrors of unrestrained military despotism.

They protest against all the acts and ordinances of the Convention depriving them of their rights as citizens of the United States; against the despotism which denied the freedom of speech and of the press; against the contributions in money, property, and labor, and military enlistments forced upon them; against the tyranny which demands the abandonment of homes and property, and the exposure of their wives and children to sickness, destitution, famine, and untold miseries; against the barbarous policy which sends a brutal soldiery to pillage, burn property, and destroy life, as a punishment for remaining in their homes; against the Government who threatened to hang them because they would not tamely submit to such indignities.

Having been released from such dangers and indignities, and restored to the Government of the United States, and the reign of terror having passed, it now becomes them as loyal citizens to raise up a State Government, and we recommend that a convention of all loyal citizens be called forthwith to organize a State Government of the State of Florida. Also, that the chief of the military department of the United States be requested to retain sufficient forces to maintain order and to protect the people in their persons and property.

Complimentary.—Secretary Welles, on behalf of the President, has sent a letter to Lieutenant Worden, the commander of the Monitor during her engagement with the Merrimac, complimenting him and his crew for their heroism on that occasion, and expressing the deepest sympathy with the gallant Lieutenant in his affliction. The officers and crew of the Cumberland also received a letter from Secretary Welles, complimenting them on their gallant behaviour in the same battle. [It will be remembered the Cumberland went down with her flag flying.]

New Bill for the Abolition of Slavery.—Mr. Wright introduced a bill in the Senate, (making the third one pending,) abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia. It differs, in many respects, from the pending bills. The first section provides that no person not now within the District of Columbia, nor now owned by any person resident here, nor hereafter born within it, shall ever be held in slavery in its limits, or without it, if born in the District. Provided, that no officers of the Government, being citizens of slaveholding States, coming into this District on public business, and remaining only as long as may be reasonable, may be attended into and out of said District, and while here, by the necessary servants of themselves and their families, without their right to hold said servants in service thereby being impaired.

The following section provides that all children born of slave mothers within this District shall be free after the first day of ——, 1862, but shall be educated by their parents, and serve as apprentices in return therefor till the age of 21, when they shall be entirely free. The corporations of Washington and Georgetown are empowered to carry into effect this provision.

The fourth section enacts that all persons held as slaves in this District, or owned by persons resident within it, shall remain such at the will of their respective owners; provided, that any such owner (or legal representative) may at any time receive from the Treasury the full value of his or her slave, upon which such slave shall forthwith be free. The President and Secretaries of State and War shall be a Board for determining the value of such slaves as their owners may thus desire to emancipate, and hold sessions on the first Monday in each month.

The fifth section empowers the corporations of Washington and Georgetown with efficient powers to arrest and deliver up all fugitive slaves escaping into this District.

The sixth section submits this bill to a vote of all white male persons (as April 1) above 21 years of age, and of twelve months' residence here—and if adopted, the President is to announce the fact by proclamation.

The corporate limits of Washington and Georgetown are extended by this bill to the District for the purpose of enforcing this act.

New Treasury Notes.—Nearly a million of the new legal-tender notes reached the Treasury, and will be paid out immediately. The signatures are printed on them, but the precautions against counterfeiting are even more effective than with the present notes. By the middle of April the Department hope to have at least half of the one hundred and fifty millions for issue.

The Railroad to Manassas.—The cars are now running to Manassas, and the road is open four miles beyond.

The War in Tennessee.—On Monday last a reconnaissance, in force, was made at Pea Ridge, on the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, where the rebels were said to be fortifying, but no enemy was found.

Our forces are continually augmenting by the arrival of fresh troops.

The latest advices from the rebel camps at Corinth, Mississippi, give the strength of the forces there at 70,000.

On Sabbath last a force of United States troops was sent to Nicholas Landing, sixty miles south of Savannah, which seized fifteen thousand pounds of fresh pork, and forty-five thousand pounds of cured hams and shoulders. For a long time this has been the mart for the pork business of the Confederate States army. Within the last two weeks, large quantities have been sent southward by teams.

On Monday an engagement occurred between the gunboats Tyler, Lexington, and a masked battery, in the vicinity of Eastport. The gunboats fired fifty shots. The Tyler's smoke-stack was struck once. The effect on the enemy's works was not ascertained.

Fearful Explosion in Philadelphia.—Gun-Cartridge Factory Blown Up.—Terrible Scenes and Incidents.—Shocking Loss of Life.—Investigation by the Coroner and Fire Marshal.—Since the year 1850, when the great fire occurred at Race street wharf, which occasioned such terrible destruction of property and loss of life, the city of Philadelphia has not been thrown into such an intense state of excitement as was created on Saturday by the rumor that a terrible explosion had occurred in the lower section of the city. These rumors took on tangible shape till nearly 12 o'clock, at which time it was generally believed that some thirty persons had been instantly killed by the explosion of a powder magazine and gun-cartridge manufactory. Those of our citizens, who while taking their morning meal, heard a slight noise such as might be caused by the firing of a gun at the navy yard or at the refreshment saloons, were far from suspecting the real cause of the concussion.

It seems that Professor Samuel Jackson, the well-known manufacturer of pyrotechnics, had a manufactory for the getting up of his explosive commodities at Tenth and Reed streets, immediately north of the Debtors' Apartment of the Moyamensing Prison. The factory was located immediately at the point where the cars on the Tenth street railway turn off to go westward.

THE EXPLOSION.

The legitimate business of Professor Jackson was destroyed by the war, but he was extensively engaged in the manufacture of Minie ball cartridges for the United States Government. He had girls, men, and boys engaged in making cartridges—the girls cementing the bullet to the powder, and covering the joint with pieces of silk. Even with his large force of work people, the pressure upon the establishment was great, and on Friday fifty additional hands were advertised for. About seventy-five thousand cartridges were turned out daily, and at one time within a week there were a million on hand at one time.

About half-past 8 o'clock, on Saturday morning, when the hands were all busily engaged, an explosion took place, which was followed a moment after by a second and more violent explosion, which shattered the building to pieces, and sent the fragments flying through the air, mingled with portions of human bodies. The work remaining upon the ground immediately took fire, and the horrified spectators who were first upon the ground saw men, boys and girls creeping from the ruins, with their persons burned and blackened, and in some cases with their clothing on fire, writhing in agony upon the ground.

The head and part of the trunk of a man were blown into Passyunk road, more than a square distant from the factory. A portion of the thigh struck against the rear wall of the tavern of Mr. Daugherty, No. 1324 Passyunk road, leaving its bloody mark upon the brick work, and then falling into the yard. The head, which appeared to belong to the same body, was thrown over the building and fell down in Passyunk road. The skull was dashed completely to pieces, its fragments being held together by the scalp, and the brains were dashed out. The hair, sprinkled with gray, and a short whisker, which had been scorched and singed, were all that were left to lead to the identification of the remains.

The fragments of mutilated humanity which had been gathered up were all removed to the First-ward station-house. The wounded had their immediate wants supplied at the drug stores, dwellings, &c., in the neighborhood; they were then removed to their own homes, or to the Pennsylvania Hospital, the great majority being taken to the last-named institution. The men and boys had suffered the most severe injuries, some of them being shockingly burned. The females were less seriously hurt. Fortunately for this portion of the operatives, the rules of the factory required them to divest themselves of their hoop skirts upon going to work. This circumstance probably prevented many from being burned to death, as their clothing was much less combustible in the absence of the distending hoops.

The noise of the explosion was heard to a great distance, and hundreds of people hurried to the spot under the impulse of curiosity. Among the throng were the half distracted parents and friends of those who had been employed in the devastated building, uncertain as to their safety, and searching frantically about for them in the crowd and in the neighboring houses, while fearing the worst, searching shudderingly among the fragments of clothing which still clung to the almost quivering remains of the mutilated dead. There were many painfully affecting scenes at the spot, and in the places where the dead and wounded were carried.

The intelligence of the disaster was telegraphed to the Central Station, and Mayor Henry, the Chief of Police, and several of the lieutenants, with squads of policemen, hurried to the ground, and did all that was in their power to gather together the scattered remains of the dead, to relieve the injured, to take charge of endangered property, and to keep the crowd from overrunning the ruins.

The police, and also the people residing in the neighborhood, did everything in their power to alleviate the sufferings of the unfortunate ones. Several ladies furnished blankets, settees, &c., for the wounded while being conveyed to the hospital. Several milk and farm wagons, passing at the time, were voluntarily relieved of their contents and used as means of conveyance. Certainly, there was never more sympathy expressed for suffering humanity

It seems that the first explosion took place in the moulding-room, in the south-west portion of the premises, where eight men and four boys were employed.

The cartridges upon which the persons in the factory were employed are known as "Dr. Barlow's [illegible] cartridges." They are made without the use of paper, the powder being made into pasteboard-like cases, and the ball forced by means of mallets and iron plunges into brass moulds, where they take the proper form and [illegible].

Mr Jackson had a large order for making these cartridges, of various sizes, for the use of the army of the Potomac, and for the last three weeks he had been engaged in filling a contract for 1,500,000 cartridges for cavalry pistols. They were to be completed within twenty days more, and they were being turned out at the rate of about 75,000 a day.

Most of the persons in the moulding-room are as badly hurt as to be unable to give any account of the origin of the disaster. One of them, named Charles Griffith, informed the Fire Marshal that he saw the first flash from a mould at which one of the men was at work, and the general explosion at once followed.

Foreign Summary.

A terrific FLOOD has prevailed in Austria and Hungary. For four days the rain poured down in incessant torrents. In Vienna alone, it is said, the houses of eighty thousand persons have been submerged, and this vast number of people have been suddenly thrown on the charities of the public. The entire valley of the Danube has been laid waste, and whole villages are said to have been swept away, while large cities, like Pesth, Ratisbon and other places, have been completely inundated.

The reports about the arrest of NENA SAHIB are premature and incorrect. He is still at large, and there is a certain restive uneasiness in much of the native mind in various districts of India.

A strong indisposition is reported among the CHRISTIAN subjects of the Sultan of Turkey to be quiet under his rule. Real or imaginary insults are keenly noted, and there are threatening signs of trouble in different places. At Van, in Armenia, the Turkish garrison was attacked and beaten, and the citadel taken possession of by the Armenians, who supposed some indignity had been offered to one of their symbols of Christianity.

The French Government is gradually committing itself to a strong opposition to all that disposition which the Romish Church has to intermeddle with the affairs of the State. It has recently dissolved the Catholic Association of St. Francois de Sales, at Niames, and is more and more coming into direct antagonism with the politic priestly power of Popery.

An effort has lately been made to relieve the persons imprisoned in Spain for reading and circulating the Holy Scriptures. Major General Alexander, having been requested by the British Committee of the Evangelical Alliance, which met in Geneva last fall, to visit Madrid, did so, but has accomplished nothing. He was courteously treated by the Prime Minister, and was assured that Spain is far "less intolerant than was generally supposed." But still the poor sufferers were compelled to be left in their prison for "the word of GOD."

A firm in Scotland celebrated for the manufacture of steel has recently contracted to furnish the French government with muskets so constructed that they will discharge seriatim, through one barrel, sixteen cartridges, by means of a slide containing sixteen chambers. When the contents of the slide are fired off, another loaded slide can be inserted by the soldier in a few seconds, by which thirty-two shots can be discharged in one minute. By drawing the trigger, the chambers containing the charge adjust themselves to the barrel in succession. The model is furnished by the French government.

Married.

On the 16th of January, inst., by Rev J. D. S. Hall, Rev. R. H. CAIN, of Indiana, to Mrs. LAURA HAZZARD, of Baltimore.

On the 6th of March, 1862, by Rev. R. H. Cain, MICHAEL PETERSON to Miss ISABELLA SHARS, both of Brooklyn, New York.

Died.

Departed this life, Tuesday morning, March 18th, 1862, in the 80th year of her age, DIANA VORRES, widow of the late Thomas Vorees, of Trenton, New Jersey.

She died in full triumph of the Christian faith. Mother Vorees was born a slave in the family of a Mr. Van Buren, at Millstone, Somerset County, in the State of New York, about the year 1782. She was reared in Greggetown, where she became the wife of Thomas Vorees. By this union she was the mother of three children—two boys and one girl.

The boys have both gone before their mother to another world. The daughter, our Sister in Christ, Jeanette Staats, has lived to survive the death of her mother, and also ours in the Lord. All of her children were born while she lived a slave. Subsequent to that time her husband purchased her freedom. She was a resident of Trenton forty years, where she embraced religion and joined the A. M. E. Church, when they worshipped in a cooper shop in South Trenton.

She continued a member in good standing, without intermission, until the day of her death. She had a long and lingering illness, covering a period, more or less severe, of 17 years.

During all this time, in patience she possessed her soul

Mother Vorees was a woman of unblemished character, deep vital piety, and pure godliness—a Christian woman of the very first order. She was blessed with an originally clear and bright intellect, to which she added, by individual exertions, a good degree of mental culture in the common branches of an English education.

She was familiarly acquainted with the Holy Scriptures, in which she meditated day and night, from a knowledge of which she possessed a vast fund of useful information. She was both a useful and active member of the Church, in which direction, it is universally admitted, she had no superior in her day. But she has gone from labor to reward. May her body rest in the grave, and her soul in heaven.

TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT.

This valuable and popular medicine has universally received the commendation of the Medical Profession and the Public as the most efficient and agreeable remedy for the following diseases, viz: Headache, Sour Stomach, Loss of Appetite, Indigestion, Acidity of the Stomach, Torpidity of the Liver, Heart, Rheumatic Affections, Gravel Pains, and all complaints where a gentle and cooling aperient is required.

It is particularly adapted to the wants of Travellers by Sea and Land, Residents in Tropical Climates, Seamen, Invalid Officers of the army and navy, Captains of Vessels and Families, who find it a valuable addition to their medicine chests.

It is in the form of a powder, carefully put up in bottles, to keep in any climate, and is always ready for use, producing when dissolved a delightful effervescent beverage.

Numerous testimonials from professional and other gentlemen, of the highest standing throughout the country, and its steadily increasing popularity (where it is known), evince its great efficacy and valuable character, and commend it to the favorable notice of an intelligent public.

TARRANT'S CORDIAL ELIXIR OF TURKEY RHUBARB.

This beautiful preparation from the true Turkey Rhubarb, has the approval and sanction of many of our best physicians as a valuable and favorite Family Medicine, and is preferable to any other combination which they have hitherto prescribed. For Infants or Children, it being in a manner combined to make it at once palatable to the taste and efficient in its operations.

TARRANT'S IMPROVED INDELIBLE INK,

For marking Linen, Muslin, Silk, etc., has been proved, by many years experience, to be the best and most permanent and reliable preparation ever offered to the public.

The superiority of this article is acknowledged by all, and purchasers and dealers will find it to their interest to give it a preference over all similar preparations.

PERRY & FITZGERALD'S

PROCESS FOR MAKING LIGHT, NUTRITIOUS, AND UNADULTERATED BREAD, WITHOUT FERMENTATION.

The new process of breadmaking, patented by Perry & Fitzgerald, consists of the obstacles which have hitherto rendered it impossible to manufacture perfectly pure, sweet, and nutritious bread. The entire process is performed by mechanical means, and is [illegible]

The process consists in mixing the flour in a closed vessel, and the application of pure carbonic gas, under pressure, by which the dough used is made thoroughly light and ready to be discharged into pans, for baking, in the brief space of fifteen or twenty minutes. The "change" is nearly the same as that which effects a revolution in the operation, in all its details, from the putting in of the flour to the discharging of the dough, in from twenty five to forty minutes. The "change" in the quality of Perry & Fitzgerald's effects a revolution in the preparation of bread, by establishing a system of wholesome manufacture not subject to the vicissitudes and evils of fermentation; but a sure and certain [illegible] Success, by the substitution of mechanical for manual labor, and to the superior value of the article produced, it promises large profits upon the capital employed [illegible] as well as to the public, as the [illegible] will add to the patent rights and public security &c. a competition. But whilst preventing undue competition it produces some of the evils of a monopoly, because it leaves the consumer at all times in possession of his former means of supply, to be resorted to, should the monopoly become prejudicial.

The application of pure carbonic acid gas, under pressure, to a mechanically kneaded dough mass, as in the invention of Perry & Fitzgerald, did not occur to Dr Ure, though he seems to have had a clear knowledge of the importance of the application of [illegible] gas, since he states, by the [illegible], that "if water highly impregnated with carbonic acid gas, be used for kneading the dough the resulting bread will be remarkably spongy. Could a light article," he continues, "be produced in this way, that is, if the sugar would remain undecomposed, the bread would be as much the sweeter and more nutritious."

What, in Dr. Ure, was evidently a clearly comprehended chemical truth has been practically [illegible] by the ingenious inventors of Perry & Fitzgerald. Posterity will hold their names in grateful remembrance, as among the most eminent benefactors of mankind.

ITS SUPERIORITY. The superiority of unfermented bread is by no means new. Dr. Cullen, who wrote more than seventy years ago, says:

"In Scotland, nine tenths of the lower class of people, and that is the greater part of the whole, live upon unfermented bread, and unfermented farinaceous in other forms, and there are not a more healthy people anywhere to be found. In the course of fifty years, that I have practiced among them, I have had occasion to know this, and have hardly met with a disease, of any consequence, that I could impute to the use of unfermented farinacea."

At a later period, Professor Thompson, of Glasgow, in his work on the "Food of Animals," after alluding to the facts referred to above by Dr. Cullen, and other kindred facts, observes:—

"Such, then, being sufficient evidence in favor of the wholesomeness of unfermented bread, it becomes important to discover in what respects it differs from fermented bread. The result gained by this process (fermentation) may be considered to be merely the expansion of the particles of which the flour is composed [illegible] the mass more readily divisible by the peculiarly active process of digestion. But, as this object is gained at a sacrifice of the nutriments of the flour, it becomes a matter of interest to ascertain the amount of the loss sustained in the process."

The result of these [illegible] experiments was a full confirmation in favor of unfermented bread of nearly seven per cent. more than made by the ordinary process. In other words, there was a loss of nearly one-tenth of the nutritive properties of the flour, which, by the process of fermentation, was driven into the air and lost.

We come now to a more particular consideration of the superiority of the bread made without fermentation, or the use of chemical agents, over the bread made by those processes. Although, from what has already been said, this superiority appears in most vivid contrast, yet the public will no doubt be better satisfied to have the points stated specifically for it only needs that the advantages secured by this method be clearly understood in order to its universal introduction in the manufacture of bread.

I. ITS CLEANLINESS.—Instead of the dough being mixed by the naked hands or feet of the bread, from the putting of the flour to the completion of the baking, is not, as it usually is, "a work," to use the language of Dr. Willard Parker, "in its entire cleanliness." Says Dr Winchester "The process is not only purely scientific, but preeminently cleanly."

II. ITS PRESERVATION OF ALL THE NUTRIENT PRINCIPLES OF THE FLOUR.—As the raising of the dough is by the mechanical introduction of pure carbonic acid gas, under pressure, in a closed vessel or receiver, it takes a perfect vesicular or spongy texture. All the constituents of the flour remain wholly unchanged, while the process of raising [illegible] is [illegible] as fibrine is one of them as has been already shown.

III. ITS UNIFORM CHARACTER.—Bread made by the Soo Process is uniformly light, sweet, and wholesome. The conditions being simple, and not liable to variation, or failure can occur to always producing bread of the same quality. It retains its moisture much longer than fermented bread, and may be eaten warm with impunity. The [illegible] a part [illegible] in all nights, even in the most sensitive [illegible].

"The objectionable consequences of fermentation being avoided, the constituents of the flour are left in the unchanged and unexhausted, the resulting loaf being absolutely pure."

IV. ITS WHOLESOMENESS.—Being free from the deleterious substances which in the process of fermentation [illegible] to [illegible] it is [illegible] to digestion, and agrees with the most delicate stomach [illegible] dyspeptics," says Dr Doe, [illegible] the N. Y. Medical College, "it will be invaluable, as they will be able to use it when the fermented manufactured bread has been found to have signally failed as an article of diet." Says the London Medical Times and Gazette:—

"Since the introduction of the new unfermented bread, there have already been received from members of the medical profession, who have recommended it in their practice, as well as from non-professional sources, accounts of the really astonishing results that have followed its use in cases of deranged digestion and assimilation. Many persons have regained their capacity to [illegible] after years of suffering and misery, by the simple use of the bread as a diet. Many cases have also been reported by medical men of position, in which certain distressing forms of [illegible] which had resisted every [illegible] as if by magic, almost immediately after adopting the use of the unfermented bread.

"The beneficial effects of the new bread are attributable to two causes. The one is the absence of the prejudicial matters imparted to ordinary bread by the process of fermentation; and the other is the presence in the bread unfermented of those elements which are the essential agents of digestion and assimilation."

The most eminent members of the medical profession, both in Great Britain and in the United States, not only speak in the highest terms of the ease with which it is digested, and of its rich, nutritious qualities, but especially of its peculiar [illegible] as a remedy in cases of dyspepsia. The effect of it in cases of other strong forces, which, in a greater or less degree, are characteristic of fermented bread, renders the new bread peculiarly [illegible] to invalids.

V. ITS ECONOMY AND ECONOMY.—By the use of mechanical means, instead of manual labor, a barrel of flour is converted into baked loaves in forty-five minutes, whereas by the ordinary process four or five hours are required in the [illegible] of the sponge, and a further time in kneading, raising, and baking the dough.

"The absolute economy of the consumption of bread," says a correspondent of the Journal of the Society of Arts, "results in an article peculiarly suitable to be prepared and supplied by a public company. And since the new process removes all the objections of [illegible] and [illegible] of domestic economy, the supply of bread is placed at once in the same category with gas, water, or other articles of prime necessity."

A STORY FOR THE LITTLE FOLKS.

WHEN VACATION COMES!

MARCUS FURMAN was attending school in the lovely town of Bingen on the bank of the Rhine. He was only eleven years old, and his parents lived ten miles in the country. He was boarding with a widow lady who took very good care of him But every Friday afternoon the stage stopped before the school-house door to take him out to his country home, and the next Monday morning he returned to school again.

"What are you looking for, Marcus?" asked his mother one Friday evening, about a half-hour after they had all got up from the supper table

"For the Almanac, mother, I can't find it anywhere."

"You will find it in my work-basket. But I can tell you the day of the month without that trouble. It is the eighth of June."

"Oh! I know the day of the month. That is not what I wish to find; but on what day of the week the eighteenth of July comes, and then how many days our vacation will last. Let me see now —thirty-six days! That is plenty long enough for what I want."

"What do you want to do in vacation, Marcus?" his mother asked.

"I will tell you. I want you and pa to let sister Flora and me make a visit to Uncle Thomas. What a splendid castle he has down the Rhine. What vineyards, and flocks, and parks, and gardens! And just think, mother, that we have not seen Uncle Thomas for a whole year."

"But where will you get money from, to pay your travelling expenses? Your father may not have it to spare. Besides, you will need some very handsome clothes if you spend your vacation with your Uncle Thomas. And whom will you get to go with you? I would not trust you and little Flora alone so long a distance."

"I think that can all be fixed," answered Marcus, whose eyes sparkled like two great diamonds, in hope of the vacation journey. "Flora and I have already twenty-five dollars in our money-chest, and if we can add ten more to it, I am sure we shall have enough for all our wants. I will work every Saturday in Mr. Wallen's vineyard, and I think there will be no doubt about raising the whole sum. We would want Aunt Julia to go with us. She would take good care of us, and walk out with us every day while we are making our visit to Uncle Thomas."

Just then Aunt Julia entered the room. Marcus told her all his plans, and she agreed to accompany them if their parents would give their consent to the journey. So next day it was fully decided that Aunt Julia, and Marcus, and Flora, should pay a long visit to Uncle Thomas.

Marcus put the Almanac into his pocket, so that he could often refer to it, and count the days and hours that must pass before vacation. Many a time did he speak about it on Saturday and Monday, and say to his mother: "What a good time we will have when vacation comes!" She invariably told him that he must not depend too much on his plans. "It is never safe to trust to the future," she would add; "for I have many a time been disappointed when I least expected to be."

"But, mother," he answered, "what could happen in so short a time to prevent our visit to Uncle Thomas? We are all well, Aunt Julia is going with us, we will have money enough, and I can't think how anything could hinder us from our journey down the Rhine. What a good time we'll have when vacation comes!"

Again, his mother told him not to depend on the future. "Even if you were intending to go to-morrow," she said, "something might break up all your plans. Suppose some of us were to be very sick; I am sure you would not want to go and leave us."

"I don't see how that can be. None of us have been sick, pa said the other day, for two years. So it is not likely that any one in our family will get sick between the eighth of June and the eighteenth of July. And that is when vacation comes!"

Marcus was unconvinced, but still his mother told him that "man proposes but God disposes." He and Flora went out to take a little walk, and they talked about nothing else. What flowers they would pluck, what nuts they would have on the Rhine, what presents they would get from Uncle Thomas. All these, and a hundred more things they talked about, expecting to enjoy them when vacation comes.

When Marcus went to school next week he told his playmates what he was going to do and where he was going in vacation. And when he returned to his parents on Friday evening, he did nothing but talk about his splendid journey. His first expression was: "Another week less before vacation comes!" He counted the hours, and every time he came home he used to say: "How long the days are! Time never went so slow before." Finally, the last week came. And as Marcus went out to get into the stage he said:

"When I come home again, vacation will be here. Now, Aunt Julia, have everything ready, so that we can start next morning. Good-by, won't we have a pleasant time when vacation comes!"

"Halt! halt!" shouted Marcus' father to the stage-driver as he was driving off. "I have a parcel for my son." And out came Mr. Furman with a good-sized package.

"Marcus, take these pamphlets to the bookbinder in Elm street, and tell him to have them bound for you in time to bring them out with you on Friday evening."

"I will attend to it, pa. There will be no mistake, and when you get the books, vacation will be here."

When soon came that day, Marcus took the books to the bookbinder. He lived in the third story of an old house, and whoever went to see him had to be very careful that he did not fall down the narrow, dark stairs. But Marcus was not afraid, and soon he was in the presence of the old bald-headed bookbinder. He told him what he wanted, and that the books must be done by next Friday.

"I have never disappointed anybody when I could prevent it," said the old man. "You may depend upon me. If I am well, these books shall be bound."

"Vacation comes next Friday;" said Marcus to the old bookbinder. "I suppose you hardly know what vacation is, do you?"

"Oh! yes. Schoolboys' vacations are like a great many other things that cannot be trusted. My son Andrew was looking forward to his vacation a year ago with a great deal of pleasure. But just before it came, he was taken sick with a severe rheumatism, and he has never been able to help me bind books since. Hannah, his little sister, spends all her time in nursing him. He is now lying in the back-room on his bed, and would be glad to have you chat with him awhile."

"I haven't got the time now," said Marcus, "but may be I shall have when I come after the books next Friday."

"Before you leave, however," said the old man, "let me tell you not to depend too much on your vacation. You may be sick a-bed. A great many people are sick in Bingen. The doctors say it is the cholera; and you know when that disease gets hold of anybody, he cannot live long. You may get sick, too. You must be very careful of your food. But mind, don't trust too much to your vacation. If you don't get the cholera, something else may happen to prevent your pleasure."

"You'll see, bookbinder, that I won't get disappointed. I am as well now as I ever was, and only think, it is but five days before vacation comes."

"Ah! my son, when you get as old as I am, you will see how foolish it is to trust to the future. I'll try and have your father's books ready. Call again on Friday at twelve o'clock. Come in time to have a little talk with Andrew. He is only fifteen years old, and you would be good company for him."

Marcus was soon off to school again. Every few hours he went to look at the barometer, for he wanted to know if he would have good weather "When vacation comes," he said to himself, "what a delightful time I shall have! Little Flora and I will be as happy as a king and queen"

At last Friday came. The sun was bright, and the barometer said, "good weather." Marcus was a diligent student, and passed a good examination At noon he went around to Elm street to get his father's books

I hope you have time," said the old bookbinder, "to talk a little with Andrew. He is so lonely All his old friends seem to have forgotten him

"I am very sorry, but I have just finished my examination, and this afternoon I must bid my school mates good-by, and get my new clothes from the tailor's, and my new boots from the shoe maker's. You see I haven't got the cholera, but am as well to-day as I can be. To-morrow I am going down the Rhine to spend vacation with Uncle Thomas. How happy one feels when vacation comes!"

"The books are ready for you. Here they are; and a pretty good package they make, too"

Marcus settled the bill, and started down stairs But the books were very heavy, and he was not careful enough in going down the dark, steep stairs. All at once he fell, and rolled down to the next floor. He lay there senseless, and when the bookbinder came to pick him up, he found a large cut on his forehead. The blood streamed down his face and over his clothes. He was taken up stairs and laid upon a little cot in the same room where sick Andrew was The doctor was sent for immediately, but by the time he came, Marcus was returning to his senses again. The wound was severe, but the doctor said it would be at least a week before he could be taken home again.

I might make my account of Marcus and his great disappointment a very long one, but I will not do so. The news of his accident was sent out that day to his father, and he came the same night to see him. The next day his mother, and Aunt Julia, and sister Flora came by the stage, and when they saw how great a sufferer Marcus was, they all wept very bitterly. Little Flora said, when she came up and kissed him: "I'm so sorry we can't go down to the Rhine to visit Uncle Thomas." Marcus wept as she spoke these words, but he answered: "Never mind, dear sister; it may be all for the best. I will bear it as well as I can. Here is poor Andrew, who has been sick a year with the rheumatism. His father says he never complains, and I won't complain either."

"How good he must be," said Flora. "I wish we could help him."

"May be we can," replied Marcus. "The doctor says if he could be taken to the mineral spring at Warmbrunn, he would be cured in two or three weeks' time. You see we can't visit Uncle Thomas; so let us give our money to poor Andrew, and his father will take him to be cured."

Every day Marcus grew better, and was then taken home. He still kept to his purpose of giving his money to poor Andrew, to get cured by the mineral water. His father, and mother, and indeed everybody in the house, agreed to it. The box was opened. There were thirty-six dollars in it. Then Mr. Furman took the stage for Bingen, and called first of all to see the old bookbinder He said:—

"You would not receive anything for your kindness to my son. Here are thirty-six dollars to all ver which he and his sister Flora make a present to your son Andrew. They have been saving it for many months, but as they are disappointed in their vacation-journey, they have no use for it Accept it with my thanks for all your trouble."

The old man could hardly believe his own eyes when he saw the bright silver dollars. The tears stole down his cheeks, and all he could say was:

"The Lord be praised! The Lord be praised! May the good Lord bless you and yours in time and eternity!"

The next week Andrew started for Warmbrunn. The great present that he received did him much good, even before he left Bingen. It was not necessary for his father to go with him, but his little sister Hannah accompanied him. She was a very sweet girl, and was eleven years old. When they reached the place, the first thing she did was to write a letter for Andrew back to Marcus; and she continued to write every few days. Each letter found Marcus a great deal better, and he would always say: "How happy I feel when I think that poor Andrew is getting better I wish I had a thousand dollars for him!" I must tell you a part of one of little Hannah's letters. She had never written one before she went to Warmbrunn; so you must not laugh at it. The address was:

"To that good young gentleman, Marcus Furman, who gave brother Andrew thirty six dollars to come here and get cured. The postmaster at Bingen will please send it out to him by the first stage."

Now that was enough to make anybody smile But little Hannah didn't know any better. The letter read thus:—

"DEAR, GOOD, YOUNG MR MARCUS:

"The weather here in the mountains is quite cool. Andrew can walk about very easily with a cane. It is the same one your father gave him when he handed him the money. It rains here almost every day. At five o'clock in the morning all the sick people get out of bed. Then they drink the mineral water. Andrew has a great appetite, and can eat nearly all the time. Every day the good Lord performs wonders. People who come here leaning on crutches, soon get well enough to walk without them. I plait straw every day for hats. In this way I can pay my own board. So all the money goes to Andrew. I was afraid you might think that some of it had to pay my expenses. We both pray every day for you and little Flora. When I see so many sick people, I often think of this verse in the Bible:—'For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.'

"The doctor here comes every day to see Andrew, and gives him as much attention as if he was the Prince of Prussia Good by!

"Your true friend, the bookbinder's daughter,

"LITTLE HANNAH."

In due time Andrew got well and came home. Marcus was able to commence school again the next term. During that year his Uncle died, and when his will was opened these words were found:—

"To my nephew, Marcus Furman, I bequeath my castle on the Rhine, and all my lands and flocks, and furniture and books. If it should ever be asked why I do this, let it be said Marcus was kind to the poor. May he be patient, and never trust too much to the future. I die with the fervent prayer that his severe accident in the old bookbinder's house may teach him always to put his confidence in God, and never to forget to say, when he makes his plans, as St. James did—'IF THE LORD WILL, WE SHALL LIVE, AND DO THIS OR THAT.'"

MARY LEE.

From the Youth's Evangelist.

THE FATAL TEMPTATION.

I have a short story to relate to the young readers of the EVANGELIST. It is only one instance, among many happening every day, shown the awful effects of intemperance. The incidents I am about to relate may be termed one as true in the details.

It was a cold, wintry night. The driving storm, and the whistling wind, made us gather closer around the fire, and feel how comfortable we were, and pity any who were compelled to be abroad in such weather.

Our attention was suddenly arrested by a faint sound, which seemed to come from a distance. At first we paid but little notice to it, but on the sound being repeated, we hastened to the door the source whence they proceeded. Procuring a light we searched the out-buildings. The sounds we heard at first were very faint; soon, however, they were repeated, and with more distinctness appearing to proceed from some person in distress. Following the direction, we quickened our steps and soon came up to the object of our search Here we were presented with a sight which, I trust, we may never be called to witness again, and the remembrance of which, though it happened years ago, yet makes the blood run cold in the veins.

A sled, with two horses attached, was standing at the side of the road, or rather had slided into ravine at the side of the road It had been loaded with barrels, but the sudden lurch had made them roll out. We found a man lying prostrate on his face, in the snow, utterly helpless in more respects than one. He was still uttering the feeble noise which had attracted us to the place. We proceeded quickly to release him from his uncomfortable situation, glad with the thought that we were made the instruments of saving the life of a fellow-being. But judge of our horror on being addressed thus, "My poor brother is covered up somewhere near me, and I think he must be dead, because I have not heard him move or make any noise for a good while!" The sad truth was soon made evident. His brother was indeed dead. O, how sad were our feelings then! We regretted bitterly that we had not reached the spot a little sooner, when by removing the barrels which had crushed and smothered him in the snow, we might have succeeded in saving his life. But, if we felt thus, how much sadder were the feelings of that brother's heart. By a slight exertion he might have released himself, or started the horses, and thus pulled the sled off them both. A good-sized but empty jug, that was found lying on the road, near at hand, seemed to speak a history from its mouth. The whole sad story could be summed up thus, "It was whisky that did this."

They had been to the neighboring town, and were returning home. Unfortunately they had partaken too freely of strong drink, both before starting and along the road. And hence, when meeting with the slight accident, they were unable to help themselves. Along with others, I was struck with a beautiful if not remarkable instance of sagacity. On reaching the bottom of the hill, on our way to the sled, we were met by the faithful dog, who howled piteously, and running back and forth, seemed to say to us as plainly as he could, that help was needed; and he stationed himself near at hand while we were releasing his unfortunate master.

A minister was sent forward to carry the sad tidings to the bereaved family. O, what a sad scene was there witnessed, and how shocking to that family, and especially to the poor wife! The husband of her youth, who had left her that morning in smiling health, is brought back to her a lifeless corpse! It was a sad but loud warning to the many friends and neighbors, who were called together so unexpectedly to perform the last sad offices of respect for the dead. The awful scenes of that night made an impression on my mind which nothing can efface.

How many hearts, to-night, are made sad—how many homes made desolate, by this cruel vice of intemperance! A mighty army of drunkards are marching to the grave—all ages, ranks and conditions, compose the mournful company! How sad such an end! And then the awful thought, Lost, forever lost! "No drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God!" Who, then, would fill a drunkard's grave? Summon the courage to resist the temptation Determine this—By the grace of God, I will never be a drunkard. Come, pledge you, each one,—here is the safe, the Bible rule, "Touch not, taste not, handle not."

HOWARD.

THE MISSIONARY.

A missionary is one sent forth to preach Christ. He has to endure many hardships. In the West especially, where he must travel a whole day across broad prairies without seeing a house—without any food but a few cakes in his pocket, he experiences much self-denial. Two years ago, one of our young ministers started on a tour in western Iowa. He was poor, and had no horse to ride. One morning he started from his lodgings on foot. He threaded his way through the prairie, without seeing a human being. In the afternoon a dreadful storm arose. The wind blew, and the rain poured. There he was, without food or shelter. He could not move forward or backward, for the fury of the storm. At last he sat down, and in pensive tones sang that song, "Do they miss me at home."

This is but a single instance, and I mention it that you may be led to think of, and pray for the missionary in this and heathen lands. How glad he would feel, if he knew that the little boys and girls of the Sabbath Sch ol remembered him We cannot get along without sympathy in this world, and none need it more than the preacher of the gospel.

Missionaries have generally been good men. Christ was one, and he never sinned. All the apostles were pious men. No doubt your own minister is a good man. He loves you, and you ought to love him.

But did you ever think that you might be a missionary, though you are but a child yet? Can you not take a paper or tract, which tells of Jesus, to some boy whose parents never bring him to church? Can you not ask John, or William to come with you to Sabbath School? Can you not tell boys who swear, that God is angry at such conduct, and ask them to quit it? Yes, you can do all these things; and in doing so, you will be missionaries quite as much as Miss Dales, in Egypt. O, children, do all the good you can! Christ notices all you do. He will richly reward you for doing right. JOHN.

RAINY SABBATHS

The Sabbath is a holy day. It was given to man that he might rest from his labors, and give himself up to meditation and prayer. All, whether young or old, should spend the whole of it in the service of Christ. When you can, you should go to church. When you cannot go, you should read the Bible or some good book If you get tired of these duties Then will be good for both soul and body It will keep you from weariness or disorder.

But the Sabbath is sometimes wet Then the Devil suggests many reasons why you should absent yourself from the Sabbath School, and from church. You should not try to feel sick for the occasion; but you should attend as though the sun shone out in all his beauty. To go may be unpleasant. You may get your clothes soiled a little You may feel somewhat uncomfortable as you walk along in the wind and rain; but remember, if you ever get to heaven, it must be by the path of self-denial. Christ endured anguish and death for you; will you not suffer a little for him?

If you are not kept away by rain, your Sabbath School teacher, your pastor, and above all, your Saviour will love you. The heart of your minister will be sad, if he finds that you never come, on a wet day, to the house of God." Would you not rather make his heart glad than give him one pang of grief? I am sure you would. Then come regularly to his preaching: be so punctual, that when he finds your seat vacant, he may certainly know that you are absent from home or sick

Dr Baker lived about thirty years ago. He was appointed to preach in a village eight miles distant. When the day came, the sky was covered with blackness, and it was very wet and windy. But the good man started out, his heart being warm with love for souls. By the time he reached the church, he was quite as wet as if he had taken a plunge into the river. But worse than all, he found the church closed, and not one to welcome him to shelter. This was discouraging, and would well fill with shame those who lived within a few rods of the church. Afterward, some one asked him how he felt? His Christian, noble reply was "Never more happy or contented in my life I felt that if all the world that day had neglected their duty, I had not neglected mine."

JOHN.

HOW TO LIVE LONG

We have no doubt that all our little readers would like to live a long time Dear children, we think not one of you would like to die now God has promised long life to you on certain conditions Who can repeat the fifth commandment? There you have the conditions. We recollect of reading a story about a little boy, who lived long, because he honored his father, by obeying a command his father gave him. One of those large and beautiful sycamore which run around the Lake was standing the side of a steep mountain nearly above Sabbath Day, and I [illegible] Willard's long way from where the boat took fire. The scene was described as appalling We would not attempt to describe the despair pictured on the countenances of fathers and mothers sisters and brothers, and friends. This little boy got out of the boat and was holding on to the rudder, by which the vessel is kept on her course. Here he was discovered by his father, who was on a floating bench. His father said, "Hold on, my boy, hold on," and was seen no more. The flames often licked his hands, and his arms were terribly burnt, and wave after wave would almost suffocate him; but still the brave boy remembered his father's words and held on, and was saved, and lived many years.

A few years ago, while a large number of children were assembled in one of our public schools, in Philadelphia, the cry of fire was raised. A scene of confusion ensued, and in the struggle to get to the door many of the children were severely injured. But one little girl never moved from her seat. When asked why she did not rush for the door like the other children, her reply was, "My father, who is a fireman, told me, when the cry of fire was raised, not to move from my place, and he knows best." This little girl honored her father by obeying his commands, and perhaps saved herself from injury. We might, if we had space, tell you a great many more such incidents, but these two are enough.

Children, "Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long on the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee," and you will be happy, and if God does call on you to die, he will only take you home to himself where you will be happy for ever.

INFLUENCE.

BY GEORGE W. BUSHAT.

Deep follows deep and swells
With rain the sweeping river,
Word follows word, as I tells
Truth that lives forever.

Flake follows flake, like sprites
Whose wings the winds discover;
Thought follows thought, and lights
The realm of mind forever.

Beam follows beam to cheer
The cloud the bolt would shiver;
Throb follows throb, and fear
Gives place to joy forever

The drop, the flake, the beam,
Teach us a lesson ever:
The word, the thought, the deed
Impress the soul forever

LITTLE CHARLIE'S TRUST

BY W. J. S. CRAWFORD.

I knew a little boy who died
Some seven years ago,
Who in his dying moments tried
To soothe his mother's woe:
Though he could scarcely breathe the words,
He whispered, "Mother dear,
Jesus will protect me now,
So that I need not fear"

That little boy was very young,
But not too young to die,
Nor yet too young to know on whom
In death he must rely:
He knew that Jesus died to save,
To Him his heart was given,
And so, to him, the gloomy grave,
Was but the gate to heaven

May every little child who reads
What lying Charlie said,
Give up its tender heart to Him
Who through death's solemn shade
Led Charlie to the blessed land
Where there is no more night;
Where now before the throne he stands,
An angel pure and bright

THE SAVIOUR'S LOVE TO CHILDREN.

BY M J E CRAWFORD

Children! have you heard how Jesus,
When he dwelt with men on earth,
Kindly spoke to little children,
Checking not their harmless mirth
In his arms he gently took them,
Clasped them to his loving breast,
And in accents mild and tender,
Each dear child he sweetly blessed

Stern-browed men rebuked the mothers,
Who had brought their children near,
But the tender hearted Saviour
Bade them come and not to fear.
"Suffer ye the little children."
Thus he spake, "to come to me,
For of such is Heaven's kingdom.
Such my Father's face do see."

"Oh! what happy little children,"
You will say, "who heard his voice;
If we, too, could see and hear him,
We should love him and rejoice!"
Yet these precious words of blessing,
Were not breathed for those alone,
Who within his arms were folded
Jesus on his heavenly throne

O'er the little ones is watching,
Guarding them by night and day,
Kinder than the kindest mother,
And when little children pray,
Jesus hears them, and rejoices
As the holy scriptures says,
He rejoiced, when in the temple,
Little children sang his praise

Children! love this blessed Saviour,
He deserves your warmest love,
For he died that he might bring you
To his glorious home above.

DEAR CHILDREN, let not the stream of your life always be a murmuring stream We do not like to hear little ones all the time uttering complaints Let your life be as joyous and smiling as possible, and you will thus make all around you smile, and be in continual sunshine yourselves

BAUGH'S
RAW BONE SUPER-PHOSPHATE OF
MANUFACTURED FROM UNBURNED BONES
BY BAUGH & SONS,
Wholesale office and Store, 20 S. Wharves, between Market and Chestnut Streets, Philadelphia

CASH PRICE $45 PER TON OF POUNDS (2½ CTS PER POUND)

In the preparation of this Valuable Manure, BONES ARE USED IN THEIR RAW STATE ONLY. They have never been boiled or calcined. They are taken as nature has made them, crushed with powerful machinery, and subjected to a process, by which, while all the virtues of the bone is retained, a Fertilizer is prepared, furnishing in a concentrated and soluble form, the two indispensable ingredients for the growth of Plants and enriching the soil, viz.: phosphoric acid and ammonia. These two ingredients, by the use of BAUGH'S RAW BONE SUPER-PHOSPHATE, are given to the soil in all their original strength and purity. They assimilate at once with the soil, furnish all the needful ammonia for the growing crop, giving it a vigorous appearance, and leave the land permanently benefited, so that its presence can be traced for years afterwards.

Downingtown, Chester County, Pa., April 9th, 1860

Messrs. Baugh & Sons: Gentlemen,—I have been using your article of Super Phosphate on wheat and corn for several seasons, and am well satisfied of its value as an active and 'paying' fertilizer

I have applied it on wheat at the rate of 300 pounds per acre, alongside of a heavy coat of barn-yard manure, kept dry and under cover, and the result was, that by harvest the wheat where the Phosphate was put, was much the better headed and heavier, while the grain was taken more strongly than on the other portion of the field. I have also used the Phosphate by the side of Peruvian Guano, each in the same quantity, and in regard to both grain and grass, the action of your preparation was much the more satisfactory On corn, my experience in its use has been the' it pays well for the money laid out.

Yours respectfully, ISAACT LEWIS

Newtown Square, Delaware Co., Pa., July 23d, 1860

Messrs. Baugh & Sons:—Being anxious last season to test some prepared manures offered for sale, I was induced by your agent to make a trial of three different kinds, which I did on wheat, side by side in the same field I purchased Bone-dust from [illegible] and your Phosphate of Lime (sent the most popular kind) put together with, as your Bone Super Phosphate, a small [illegible] Guano stated. Leaving the grazing, as well as the gathering of the crop the last season of most [illegible] in favor of the latter

But whether it be from the seeds and care in preparing, or in the superior quality of the material used in your Raw Bone Super-phosphate, I am unable to say; however, I observed all round you the result of my trials, thinking that others may be induced to make similar experiments, and in my opinion, greatly to the agricultural interests of the whole country

Yours, &c., JAMES DURBOROW

Plymouth, Montgomery Co., Pa., August 10th 1860

Baugh & Sons Gentlemen, Having used your Super-Phosphate bought of John W Christman, at the Montgomery Co. Agricultural [illegible] on wheat and corn [illegible] the effect it produced was a most satisfactory one, and I consequently purchased in the spring of your Factory. Without reserve, I can say that the crop was decidedly the best on the farm. The yield was fully equal to the former, which had been a heavy coat of barnyard manure. Where it was applied on the corn I am satisfied there was fully double

Very respectfully, DAVID MARPLE

EUTHANASIA.

Thou, God, before whose sleepless eye not even in vain the sparrows fall,
Receive, entrain me, sundry my soul. Thou knowest, thou lovest all.
Too weak to walk alone, I see Thy hand, I falter back to Thee!

Saved from the curse of time which throws its blessings on us day by day;
In wretched joys and worthless woes, till all the heart is worn away
Thee near! I hold my breath by the half-open door of death!

[illegible] been one search for thee 'mid thorns [illegible] thy dear blood;
In [illegible] Gethsemane I seemed to stand where thou hadst stood,
And scorned, in this world's judgment-place, at times, through tears, to catch thy face.

Thou suffered'st here, and didst not fail: Thy bleeding feet these paths have trod:
But then wert strong, and I am frail; and I am man, and thou wert God.
Be near me; keep me in thy sight, or lay my soul asleep in light!

Oh! [illegible] where the meanest mind is more than [illegible] Shakspeare! where can look [illegible] more than here of wise can find, though [illegible] slow from books to book!
[illegible] is knowledge, love is sure, and hope's [illegible] promise made secure!

[illegible] lies of human praise! the crude ambitions [illegible] with!
[illegible] immortal lays! great pauses of perennial [illegible]!
A [illegible] wert! [illegible]ier aim! . . . And what are [illegible] truths and fame!

THE BURDEN OF LIFE.

BY [illegible] C. RAINEY.

[illegible] hills and its troubles,
[illegible] low at thy throne,
[illegible] imploring!
[illegible] fardless, lone.

[illegible]—oh! the cross of its trials
[illegible] and long on my shoulders has lain:
When shall my Father, shall heaven reward me?
When end this wearisome journey of pain?

Weary of life—oh! the burden is so heavy;
Dark is my way thro' this valley of tears;
Day after day brings its own night of sorrow;
Slow to the flight of the circling years.

Weary of life—put kiss the hand that chastens,
Grieving my evil behaviour and deed,
Kneeling each cloud and its slight ray of gladness,
[illegible]hen my desert—more than my need.

[illegible]y of life—oh! Thou who reigns forever,
[illegible] my end journey lead to perfect day.
[illegible] me to bear the burdens of its crosses,
[illegible]owing that rest shall end the weary way.

[illegible] life—oh! Father, in high heaven,
[illegible] dark valley, be a lamp of light;
[illegible] oh Saviour, when the shades of even [illegible] round me darkly in the last sad night.

Selections.

EXTRACTS FROM COUNT DE GASPARIN.

If you wish to know what the Presidency of Mr. Lincoln will be in the end, see in what manner and under what auspices it was inaugurated; listen to the words that fell from the lips of the new President as he quitted his native town: [illegible] which have devolved on any other man [illegible] of Washington. I hope that you, [illegible] all pray that I may receive that [illegible] on high, without which I cannot [illegible] with which success is certain." "Yes, [illegible]; we will pray for you!" Such was the response of the inhabitants of Springfield, who, [illegible], and with uncovered heads, witnessed the [illegible] of their fellow-citizen. What a début [illegible]ercmens! Have there been many inau[illegible] here below of such thrilling solemnity? [illegible]orms and plumes, the roar of cannon, tri[illegible]arabes, and vague appeals to Providence, [illegible] simple words: "Pray for me!" "We [illegible] you!" Ah! courage, Lincoln! the [illegible]nion and of America are with you [illegible]rage! you hold in your hands the destinies of [illegible] great people and a great people. Courage! You have to resist your friends and to face your foes; [illegible] the fate of all who seek to do good on earth. Courage! You will have need of it to-morrow, in a year, to the end: you will have need of it in peace and in war; you will have need of it to avert the compromise in peace or war of that noble program which it is your charge to accomplish, more than in conquests of slavery. Courage! your role, as you have said, may be inferior to no other, not even to that of Washington: to take up the United States will not be less glorious than to have founded them. * * *

Let England beware! it were better for her to lose Malta, Corfu, and Gibraltar, than the glorious position which her struggle against slavery and the slave trade has secured her in the esteem of nations. Even in our age of armed frigates and rifled cannon, the chief of all powers, thank God! is moral power. Woe to the nation that disregards it, and consents to inundate its principles to its interests! From the beginning of the present conflict, the enemies of England, and they are numerous, have predicted that the cause of cotton will weigh heavier in her scales than the cause of justice and liberty. They are preparing to judge her by her conduct in the American crisis. Once more, let her beware! * * *

The freedom of the South: The South has no feared to write in set terms, in its fundamental law, what none before it ever dared to write, the constitutional guarantee of slavery. Slavery, in accordance with the constitution of the South, can neither be suppressed nor assailed. Slavery will be the holy ark to be regarded with respect from afar off, the corner-stone which all are forbidden to touch. By the side of this, the South ostentatiously proclaims freedom of speech, of the press, of discussion in every form. Men shall be free to speak, but on condition of not touching, nearly or remotely, on any subject connected with slavery, (and every thing is connected with it in the South.) They shall be free to print, but on condition of giving no writing whatever to the public from which may be inferred the unity of mankind, the sanctity of family ties, the great principles, in fact, which the "patriarchal system" throws overboard. They shall be free to discuss, but on condition of not disturbing this institution, impatient by nature, and still more so in future, now that it feels itself honored in and threatened on all sides. It will be by itself alone the whole Constitution of the South; this one article will devour the rest; in default of legislatures and courts, the Southern populace know how to give force to the guarantee of slavery, and to restrain freedom of speech, of the press, and of discussion.

THE CHANGEABLENESS OF WORDS.

It is quite common to confound names with things. Many forget that there is a constant tendency to change in the meaning of words. In order to understand a passage, we must learn the signification of the words, not as they are used now, but as they were employed by the author or translator. The more ancient the document, the greater should be our care in this particular. No one can understand correctly many English books two or three hundred years old, if he proceeds on the supposition that every word now signifies precisely what it did then. Dean Trench says: "Words that have changed their meaning have often a deceivableness about them; a reader not once doubts but that he knows their intention, has no misgiving but that they possess for him the same force which they possessed for their writer, and conveyed to his contemporaries, when, indeed, it is otherwise altogether." The reader will be interested in some of the illustrations of this distinguished writer:

A reader of our day lights upon such a passage as the following (it is in the Preface to Howell's Lexicon, 1660:) "Though the root of the English language be Dutch, yet it may be said to have been inoculated afterward on a French stock." He may know that the Dutch is a sister language or dialect to our own; but this, that it is the mother or root of it, will certainly perplex him, and he will hardly know what to make of the assertion; perhaps he ascribes it to an error in his author, who is thereby unduly lowered in his esteem. But presently in the course of his reading he meets with the following statement, this time in Fuller's Holy War, being a history of the Crusades: "The French, Dutch, Italian and English, were the four elemental nations whereof this army [of the Crusaders] was compounded." If the student has sufficient historical knowledge to know that in the time of the Crusades there were no Dutch in our use of the word, this statement would merely startle him; and probably before he had finished the chapter, having his attention once roused, he would perceive that Fuller, with the writers of his time, used "Dutch" for German; even as it was constantly so used up to the end of the seventeenth century; what we call now a Dutchman being then a Hollander. But a young student might very possibly want that amount of previous knowledge, which should cause him to receive this announcement with misgiving and surprise; and thus he might carry away altogether a wrong impression, and rise from a perusal of the book, persuaded that the Dutch, as we call them, played an important part in the Crusades, while the Germans took little or no part in them at all.

And as it is here with an historic fact, so still more often will it happen with the subtler changes which words have undergone, conveying now much more blame and condemnation, or conveying now much less than formerly; or of a different kind; and a reader not aware of the changes which have taken place, may be in continual danger of misreading his author, of misunderstanding his intention, while he has no doubt whatever that he is perfectly apprehending and taking it in. Thus, when Shakspeare, in 1 Henry VI., makes the gallant York address Joan of Arc as a "miscreant," how coarse a piece of invective this sounds! how unlike what the chivalrous soldier would have uttered; or what one might have supposed Shakspeare, even with his unworthy estimate of the holy warrior-maid, would have put into his mouth! But a "miscreant" in Shakspeare's time had nothing of the meaning which now it has. It was simply, in agreement with its etymology, a misbeliever, one who did not believe rightly the articles of the catholic faith. And I need not tell you that this was the constant charge which the English brought against Joan, and on which in the end they burnt her—namely, that she was a dealer in hidden magical arts, a witch, and as such had fallen from the faith. It is this which York means when he calls her a "miscreant," and not what we should intend by the name.

In reading of poetry, above all, what forces through this ignorance are often lost, what emphasis passes unobserved! how often the poet may be wronged in our estimation—that seeming to us now flat and pointless, which at once would lose this character did we know how to read into some word the power and peculiar force which it once had, but which now has departed from it! For example, Milton ascribes in Comus the "tinsel-slippered feet" to Thetis, the goddess of the sea. How comparatively poor an epithet this "tinsel-slippered" sounds for those who know of "tinsel" only in its modern acceptation of mean and tawdry finery, affecting a splendor which it does not really possess! But learn its earlier use by learning its derivation; bring it back to the French "étincelle," and the Latin "scintillula;" see in it, as Milton and the writers of his time saw, "the sparkling," and how exquisitely beautiful a title does this become, applied to a goddess of the sea! how vividly does it call up before our mind's eye the quick glitter and sparkle of the waves under the light of the sun or moon. It is Homer's "silver-footed" (argyropezis,) not servilely transferred, but reproduced and made his own by the English poet, dealing as one great poet will do with another—who will disdain to borrow, but to what he borrows will often add a farther grace of his own.

The principle illustrated by the above statements is of the very highest practical importance to all, especially to those who undertake the exposition of the sacred Scriptures. A two-fold process of inquiry must be observed in the critical interpretation of any given passage in the authorized version of the English Bible; first, what is the sense in which the word was used when the translation was made? and secondly, does the word in that sense correctly exhibit the meaning of the original?

Take a few examples. Mark says: "And it came to pass, that he went through the cornfields on the Sabbath-day; and his disciples began, as they went, to pluck the ears of corn." Suppose a boy of twelve years of age, reared on the prairies of Illinois, should read this passage, what would be his inference? Certainly, unless specially instructed, he would conclude that the Master and his disciples plucked "roasting ears," ears of Indian corn or maize. But this product, though with the exception of rice, now the most widely cultivated grain in the world, was unknown till modern times. The term corn, two hundred and fifty years ago, meant all kinds of cereal grain used for bread, and in England such is its meaning till this day. In this country, however, it is generally confined to maize, and in Scotland to oats. In the Scriptures it includes wheat, barley and other small grains. The seven eared stalks of corn in Egypt were, no doubt, a species of wheat. The phenomenon may still be seen in that land.

When our Saviour says, "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God," most little girls would think of a sewing needle, and never dream of the small side gate through which foot-passengers were accustomed to pass.

"We took up our carriages and went up to Jerusalem," says Luke. Wheeled vehicles would be generally understood here. But the idea is not that which carries, but the thing carried. We took up our baggage, is Luke's meaning; an old translation reads, "We trussed up our farriels."

We might continue these illustrations to a very great length. These, however, are enough to show the very great practical importance of attending to the changes that are continually occurring in the usage of every living language, and the liability wholly to mistake the meaning of many important terms and phrases in the Bible. Any one can see the inconclusive arguments employed by many in endeavoring to decide questions of great moment. The word "slave" is of modern origin, and is used only in two instances in our English version. In neither case could anything be inferred in regard to the lawfulness of modern slavery. Must we, therefore, hold that the Bible has given no deliverance of any kind on this great subject? Certainly not. But, on the other hand, it would be equally incorrect to hold that slavery is sanctioned in the Scriptures, by showing that mention is often made of "servants," and that masters often call their slaves by this name. The question is not whether the word servant occurs, for that cannot be denied, but in what sense is it employed? Does it denote a person held as chattel-property? The Hebrew word for "servant" is one of the most general in the language, being applied to a surety, hostage, hired man, laborer, farmer, soldier, officer, believer, minister, magistrate, Messiah; and hence, unless we ascertain what is the precise sense in any given passage, we may make as great a mistake as the Illinoisian lad who interprets the Saviour's walk in the corn-field from the scenes around him. We are not here arguing for or against the institution of slavery. We are only pointing out erroneous methods adopted sometimes both by friends and foes of the system.

The above remarks account for the apparent want of dignity and delicacy occasionally discovered in the Old and New Testaments. We forget the changes that have been wrought in our language, and charge upon the inspired writers what is really due to the vicissitudes of every living tongue. An old English poet sung solemnly:

Oh! Israel, oh! household of the Lord,
Oh! Abraham's brats, oh! brood of blessed seed!

The poem is in the most solemn strain, and in the author's day must have been considered in excellent taste. To modern ears, "brat" is a word of contempt, and, accordingly, the above couplet seems as if intended to ridicule sacred themes by base words.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR.

"Don't you think I've got a good husband, Charlotte? He's the best man in the world!"

The lady who made this interrogation and answered it in the same breath, in so inflated a style that her relations with the subject of her remark only excused it, was a warm-hearted, highly impulsive little woman, a wife of half a dozen years.

She was sitting in the pleasant and tasteful, but by no means elegant parlor of her friend, Mrs Charlotte Dexter, and she had run in for a friendly call two days after Christmas.

The ladies had been schoolmates, and the warm friendship of their girlhood had been continued and solidified after their marriage.

Mrs. Ripley and Mrs. Dexter had crossed a little beyond their thirtieth birthdays. Both were intelligent and agreeable women. Both had married men of worth and integrity, who by economy and strict business habits were making their way in the world, for neither had a fortune to commence with.

Now, it happened that Mrs. Dexter's parlor communicated with her sitting-room, that the door between them was ajar, and that just as Mrs. Ripley made the remark which opens our story, Mr. Dexter hung his coat on the hat rack and walked into the sitting-room, and spread his hands over the pleasant grate fire, for they were blue with the cold. A smile, with a mixture of amusement and contempt, went over his face, which was, on the whole, as agreeable one, as he heard the remark of his wife's friend, which exalted one man at the expense of all the rest of his sex.

"That sounds just like a woman," he muttered to himself. "It's amusing to hear 'em talk. They deal in such tremendous adjectives!" But his cogitations on this feminine infirmity were cut short by the bright, earnest voice,

"Now, you will think just as I do," it continued, "when I show you what he brought me home last Christmas."

"I shan't be brought to admit that he's better than Edward. You must make up your mind to that, Julia," subjoined a voice that somehow sounded, just then, particularly sweet in the listening ear of Edward Dexter.

"Ah, well, I'll make no exception in his favor, as it happens to be his wife to whom I am speaking;" and this was followed by a moment's silence, during which Mrs. Ripley had thrown aside the folds of her cloak, drawn a gold watch from her waist-belt, and slipped it into Mrs. Dexter's hand.

"What, a gold watch?—why Julia!" was the astonished exclamation which followed, as Mrs Dexter lifted up the pretty time-piece and gazed at it admiringly.

"Yes; isn't it a perfect beauty? I always liked that rich, plain chasing so much; and there's a gold cap inside, also," displaying the inside of her watch with that childlike sort of pleasure which always counts on sympathetic admiration and delight in the beholder. "You can't think, Charlotte, how perfectly taken back with amazement I was, when I found it in my stocking, which Willard had hung on the mantle Christmas morning. I rubbed my eyes several times to be certain that I was awake."

"Well, you have got a kind husband, Julia, that is certain," cordially responded Mrs Dexter, but somehow these words did not give quite as much pleasure to her husband as her former remark had done.

"Isn't he? I thought that such a gift these hard times was terribly extravagant, and told Willard so. But he said no; that the watch was a useful article, and that if we were ever reduced to selling it, it would probably bring nearly the money back which he gave for it, and he wanted me to have one present from him which I could look at and remember with peculiar pleasure, for his sake, all the days of my life, and, moreover, he said that I'd earned the watch, by the six years of nice, fast economy which I'd practised in my household."

"Well, I congratulate you, Julia, both on Willard and on the watch," responded Mrs Dexter; and her husband felt a shade of sadness in her voice. He knew that it did not spring from any envy on her friend's good fortune. His wife was above such a petty feeling, and would be genuinely glad in any thing which brought pleasure to Mrs Ripley.

"And now, did you have a pleasant Christmas, Charlotte?"

"O, yes, but a quiet one." The tones were very "quiet," in which ran along the words and the husband felt that there were no warm, bright memories to give them color and animation. "I gave the day quite up to the children. Indeed, I was busy sitting up so late the night before to dress Mary's doll, and I was out in the early part of the evening hunting up some toys for my boy and girl. You know how children's hearts are set on these things, and providing them always falls on me, because Edward is so hurried with business at this season of the year."

"It's just so with Willard. But I always coax him into giving me an hour or two for selecting the children's Christmas toys; and I believe he enjoys it as much as I do."

"I know it; but somehow I can't drag Edward away from the store; so that I have that part of the enjoyment to myself."

Probably Mrs. Dexter was not aware how much regret, which touched on pain, there was in her words, for she was too true and loving a wife to insinuate by look or tone anything which could reflect in the slightest degree on her husband, or give one the slightest reason to infer that he was not above reproach in all domestic relations and obligations; but Mrs. Ripley must have felt in the tones somewhat that her friend would never have acknowledged to her, for she said, quickly, and in a half-commiserating way,

"O, well, you know, Charlotte, that men never think of these things as we do. Willard is quite a marvel for the interest he takes in such matters. But I've had to draw him into it and take most of the credit to myself."

And then Mrs. Ripley looked at her watch, and saw that it was an hour later than she suspected, and rose at once to leave.

Her friend did not detain her. She had no Christmas gift to show!

Mrs. Dexter returned to the parlor, and busied herself in arranging the vases and books on the table, and her husband still stood with his hands spread before the grate fire, and an unusually thoughtful expression on his countenance.

The truth is, he was annoyed and disturbed, for it was somewhat humiliating to feel that he has been brought into comparison with the husband of his wife's friend, and that the result had been unflattering to himself.

The man moved uneasily, and rubbed his hands briskly as this unwelcome thought intruded itself. Edward Dexter had a very comfortable degree of self-esteem. He held his own opinions with tenacity, and was not easily convinced that he could be mistaken or enlightened in any matter respecting which he had thoroughly made up his mind. Moreover, he was naturally of a somewhat practical tendency, and the mercantile life in which he was engrossed had certainly been little calculated to develop that tender and healthful sentiment which gathers its sweet blossoms about one's home, and fills it with beauty and fragrance.

Edward Dexter meant to be a good husband, a loving and watchful father. He supplied the wants of his wife and family cheerfully, and for its sake, as he believed, devoted himself assiduously to his business; and he would have been amazed and indignant if any one had insinuated that he was not above reproach in both of these relations.

But the dew and the sunshine of tender and loving words did not fall softly, day by day, on the roots of that vine under whose shadow he sat. Its green and goodly tendrils were not full of the golden blossoms and fruits of all sweet and gracious ministrations, and the heart of his wife often ached with a dumb, sad, yearning pain for something of the lost sweetness of her youth. And there broke dimly into the mind of the husband and father, for the first time in all the years of his married life, a conception of this truth.

He remembered when Charlotte had suggested some Christmas presents for their boy and girl, that he had answered, hastily, "Nonsense, Charlotte; I've got business of more importance to attend to than hunting up baby-toys; besides, it's a foolish waste of money, any way, and I don't approve of indulging the children in such follies. You can do as you like about it, however." And remembering this speech, Edward Dexter recalled the pained look on his wife's face, and the words sounded cold and unsympathetic to him as they did not at the time.

"Poor Charlotte!" he said to himself. And then his thoughts strayed back down the long avenue which wound through the past years of his married life.

He saw Charlotte Dexter no more as the mistress of his home, the mother of his children—but he saw her in the joy and bloom of her maidenhood, when the shy roses first began to widen in her cheeks as she felt his glances on her face. He saw the brightness in her eyes, the smiles on her lips, and her breaks of light laughter went down in his heart like the ripple of pleasant waters. He saw her as she stood one morning in her youthful loveliness by his side, and once more the solemn voice of the minister, as he bound their lives into one with those holy words, "husband" and "wife" came back to him.

And then he remembered what a true and loyal wife Charlotte Dexter had been to him through all these years, what a fond and devoted mother; and as his gaze swept over the years, he felt that all the right and holy claims of her womanhood had not been recognised—that there must have been many hours when her woman's heart had ached for sympathies and appreciation which she had never received. There must have been something chilling and barren in her life, for which his own rose up and rebuked him. And it was not enough that he could say to himself, "I have been a careful provider, a kind husband to my wife, a good father to my children."

"Why, Edward, how long have you been home?"

These words were the first which startled the husband from his reverie.

He turned from the fire, and saw his wife standing near him, the first surprise on finding him there not quite gone out of her face. He looked at her with a new tenderness and interest. Maternity had paled the roses in her cheeks, and the soft hazel eyes had lost something of their lustre. They had a chastened expression, and the lips, though they were sweet ones still, had not the old smile drifting about and breaking over them, as though her heart was like a fountain which ran over with sweet-leaping waters.

The face of Charlotte Dexter was not unhappy, but there was some brightness gone out of it, for which, in that moment of revelation, Edward Dexter held himself responsible.

"I came in a little while ago. Aren't you feeling well, Charlotte?"

"O, yes; quite as usual. What makes you ask me, Edward?"

He had detected a little shadow on her face when he first saw her, and he guessed rightly that she was thinking of the Christmas gift of her friend.

"Because you are not looking quite so bright as I like to see you, my dear little wife."

The tones and the words were not like those which Charlotte Dexter was accustomed to. She looked up in surprise, and as she met the smile and tenderness in her husband's eye, a change came over her face. There was a quick leap of brightness, like that which he remembered in her girlhood, and then it melted suddenly in a gush of tender feelings, and the tears stood bright in her hazel eyes.

The sight moved Edward Dexter strangely. He put his arms around his wife's waist, and drew her to him and kissed her as he used to in the old days before she had belonged to him.

Charlotte Dexter drew a long breath much like a tired, grieved child who has been watching long for its mother, and sees her at last. She laid her head down on his shoulder, and the sobs came thick and fast, and every one which shook to and fro her slender frame went to the heart of her husband, as he held her tightly and tried to comfort her.

"God forgive me!" said the man to himself, in his sudden, self-abasement, "he has given me a great and precious gift which I have not half-appreciated nor understood."

At last the lady looked up, and a smile trembled out through her tears. "You took me so by surprise, Edward, that I was overcome completely."

"Well, darling, if kind words affect you like this, it is unmistakable proof that I am very remiss on my part. But dry up those tears, now, for they are a reproach to me."

"O, Edward, it does my heart good to have you speak to me in that way!" and she clung to him.

"Charlotte," said her husband, with a gush of feeling which fairly choked his voice, "you have been the best and truest wife that ever a man had, and I haven't half deserved you."

Just at that moment the dinner-bell rang, and the "boy and girl" burst into the room, hungry and vociferous. But something in their parents' tones subdued the children. And Edward Dexter thought it had been long since the face of his wife had worn such a radiant brightness as it did that day at dinner!

"Charlotte shall have a New Year's present. It will be the first one that I ever gave her—poor child!" murmured Edward Dexter to himself, on his way to the store the morning before New Year's. "I don't know what in the world to get her, hungh," mused the man; "she don't want a watch, for her brother gave her that pretty one on his return from California, after our marriage. And a brooch? No, she has got that pearl one. What shall it be?" Suddenly a conversation, which he had partially heard in an abstracted mood, between Charlotte and her dressmaker, the week before, recurred to him.

"You'll have hard work to get the waist and sleeves out of this Mrs Dexter," said the dressmaker after a thorough inspection of the green silk which the lady had given her.

"I know I shall, Miss Gray. But I can't afford to get a new silk, and I must turn the old one, and make it do. We must set our wits to work and get it out in some fashion. You know they wear tight sleeves now, and I can afford half a breadth from the skirt."

"She shall have a new silk dress, and a handsome one!" was the audible conclusion of Edward Dexter's cogitations, as he struck the heel of his boot down hard on the pavement.

"A happy New Year to you, Charlotte!" and the young husband dropped something done up in brown wrappers, into his wife's lap.

It was a beautiful morning, and like a flash of golden-winged birds, came the sunbeams of the newly-born year, with joy and blessing into the home of Edward Dexter.

"Is this for me, Edward?" asked his wife, her face full of surprised pleasure.

"For you, dear."

Her rapid fingers broke the small cord in a moment, and then the dress rolled out.

It was a rich, dark-brown silk, overshot with lustrous green leaves and buds, a most graceful design.

"Do you like it, Charlotte?"

"O! Edward, I never in all my life saw such a beauty. Is it really for me?"

"'Really' for you, my dear wife."

She tried to thank him, but the tears overmastered her voice.

"Mamma! mamma! let us see!" and the two bright-haired children bounded into the room.

Her face was radiant through her tears as she lifted up the fabric. "It's mamma's New Year's present, my children."

"What makes you cry, then?"

"Don't trouble mamma now, my little girl and boy," said the father, slipping his arm around his wife. There was a new light in his face.

"Papa, you look happy, if mamma does cry," said his little boy, sidling up to him.

"I am, my child. It shall be, please God, a happy New Year to all of us."

And it was!

O, husband and father, see to it that you make for you and yours, also, a happy New Year!

HOW TO SAY, "NO."

There are a thousand methods of saying "Yes," all from the good tempered affirmative of the indulgent "governor," to the almost inaudible response of the lady in orange-blossoms—all excellent. There are a thousand methods also of saying "No;" but among these thousand there is but one good one: the art consisting in being able to catch this one without being caught yourself.

The martyrs in the good old times (?) when required by their religious principles to say "No," said simply "No." Now, this was all very reasonable, but still more stupid than reasonable. To say "No" when you must say "No," is, as I have before remarked, an art, too, by no means easy of attainment. It is the post nascendum of social life, a famous bridge, and which would be a bridge of gold were a toll of but one half-penny levied on each passenger.

The celebrated Cardinal Richelieu was a hero in this description of warfare, as well as in many others; he granted nothing, it is true, but the applicant inveriably left his cabinet delighted, he refused with so much grace, he was so affable when saying "No;" so charmed was the petitioner with his refusal that it appeared as though it would have been almost a disappointment had he obtained his request.

One day the poet Desmarets, who was then very young, succeeded in obtaining an audience of the Cardinal. When the poet was ushered into the presence of the minister, and when the latter, with his usual courtesy, had inquired to what cause he owed the pleasure of this visit—

"Monseigneur, 'said the poet, 'I have come to solicit from your Eminence the appointment of Comptroller General."

Astonished at the boldness as well as at the magnitude of this request the Cardinal frowned and fixing his eyes sternly on the young petitioner, said

"And what had you to hope for, young man, in making such an audacious request?"

"I had hoped, replied the poet modestly "for the favor that your Eminence will perhaps grant me."

"I deign to grant me! I had hoped for the favor of a refusal. They say your Eminence refuses so well."

"I am accused to it!" observed Richelieu flattered by the compliment, a compliment by no means unpleasant, as we suppose, proved, for from that day the Cardinal took Desmarets into favor, and later, gave him a pension in the very appointment which the poet had come to request. Newspaper Magazine.

BIG WORDS.

A CLERGYMAN, while composing a sermon, made use of the words "continuous head." Throwing down his pen, he went to study himself before he proceeded, so as whether a great portion of his congregation might not perhaps find the meaning of these words, and he adopted the following method of proof. Repairing the hall his footman appeared, and he was thus addressed by his master:—"What do you consider to be implied by an attentive man?" "An attentive man, sir," said Thomas. "Why, no I should say a perfect gentlemen." "Very good," observed the other, "send Ellis, (the coachman) here." "Ellis," said the vicar, "what do you imagine an attentive man to be?" "An attentive man, sir," replied Ellis, "why, I should say an attentive man means what we calls a civil spoken person—a very jolly fellow." It is needless necessary to add that the vicar substituted a less ambitious word.

YOUNG MAN,

Have you ever had a desire to connect yourself with a Secret Society? If so, I want to say a word to you. Your friend, who writes these lines, has been in regular membership in seven different Secret Societies. I will in this communication refer to the Masonic Society, which is the foundation of all others; and now permit me to ask you a question. Do you expect to find the Saviour in the Masonic Lodge? The Jews are largely represented in this order; and if there is one Jew in the Lodge, CHRIST must stay out! I have very frequently heard the name of JESUS used in the Lodge Room, and once, I remember well, I was forcibly struck with the beauty of a Scripture quotation—"Behold the LION of the tribe of Judah, the root of David," &c.

It is a well-known, established fact that all Societies of this kind do bind their applicants to obey a certain code of unknown laws—at least to a very great extent unknown. Now, if you please, go with me to Matthew xiv. 7 and 9, and let us read:—"Whereupon he promised with an oath to give her whatsoever she would ask. And she, being before instructed of her mother, said, Give me here John Baptist's head in a charger. And the king was sorry: nevertheless for the oath's sake, and them which sat with him at meat, he commanded it to be given her." On festive occasions like this, it was customary for the king to express his special approbation. Herod on this occasion had made an oath to give her whatsoever she would ask. When her request was made known, Herod was sorry. But for his oath's sake, &c., the command went forth to behead him. This promise was very wicked in the sight of GOD; more wicked to keep it than to break it. He was here very inconsistent in making the oath, and then regretting it, notwithstanding his conscience smote him. He was afraid—he wanted to preserve his false honor. And now, young man, beware of these Societies, for they are but "vanity and vexation of spirit;" and if you persist in entering the secret chamber, when you have entered the "preparation room," stop one moment and think of the sorrows of Herod—think of his rash act; and if you proceed, you, too, may sorrow for your sin as Herod did. Be admonished "to have no fellowship with their unfruitful works of darkness," &c. "In vain do ye worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men."

Young man, stop out!

ANTI SECRET SOCIETY.

THE CRITICISM OF HYMNS.

We live in an age when servants are above their masters, and when, in more senses than the Scriptural one, the last has come to be first, and the first last. Prominent among the forced marches which characterize our generation, is that of a calling peculiar to a time of free thought and untrammelled license of speech—Criticism. We think that in this, not only vicious practices but false theories prevail. Criticism is a high art, but not the highest of the arts. The disciple is not above his master, and the critic is surely not more than the author, on whose foundation he raises his superstructure. Literature must exist before literary criticism can; genius or great talent in the writer of prose or poetry must usually precede the exhibition of the lesser talent of his reviewer. Authors do not exist for the critics, but critics for the authors; the being of the one class, is essential, of the other, secondary and derivative.

That these fundamental facts have been too often forgotten, is a melancholy truth. Hence the arrogance, the injustice, the inconsistency, the insane originalities of Criticism. Men set themselves up for judges of their betters, without questioning their fitness for the task, their knowledge of the subject, their ability to comprehend and appreciate its parts, its bearings, and its issues. Intoxicated with the dignity of his position, the would-be critic frequently forgets that there is any one in the world but himself, or regards authors as dumb and helpless targets for the shafts of his severe eloquence, and renders as a submissive and mindless crowd, who will accept with open mouthed, unquestioning admiration, the oracles which fall from his lips. His views, his theories, his verdicts, are the only just ones; no matter how wild, fantastic and unexpected—of this he is the judge: if precedents are opposed to them, precedents must fall; if they contradict the common conclusion of mankind, mankind was in the wrong. Shakespeare is not as much as people think; besides, it is probable Lord Bacon was Shakspeare: Scott did not write the Waverley Novels: some worthy printer has a style 'superior to Addison:' Coleridge is 'sickly and useless:' Tennyson lacks the qualities of a poet. But the world think differently? the world was mistaken, for surely we are the people, and wisdom shall die with us.

Men of intelligence and ability sometimes class themselves with these miserable pretenders, by allowing one or two ideas to run away with them. A single prejudice may so pervert the mind, as to make an otherwise sensible man say very foolish things. Notions, lightly accepted but absolutely held, often amount, for practical purposes, to monomania. A man who gets his views rather from sensation than reason; who takes things for granted, without weighing the merits of the case, and analysing the pro and contra; who jumps at conclusions, who believes because he does not understand, and who starts with the position that his instincts are infallible, is not fit for a critic.

Very different from all this is the spirit of true Criticism. It is modest, liberal, reverent. It approaches its subject as the less to the greater; not making its own eyesight the measure of light, nor thinking the well of truth so shallow as to be sounded by its understanding. It can allow for the hidden meaning of an author, and for his superior judgment. If it see what seem gross faults, it will look again, perhaps the error is in its own eye, perhaps it will disappear or diminish on inspection. Its desire is, if to 'nothing extenuate,' at least to 'set down naught in malice.' It seeks not self, but truth; it is a philosopher, not a sophist; a lover of wisdom, rather than a professed wise man. It goes to work with no preconceived, set notions, which may bar out the object of its search: it is ready to find good everywhere, and prepared to meet the omnipresent evil: its aim is to discover and brand error, and to point out, develope, illustrate, and pay homage to the loveliness of truth. The true critic has strong likes and strong dislikes, but he does not let them till he is sure of losing right. He has his own views, as every man with a head and a heart must have, but he remembers that the object of writing is not to publish his private thoughts and personal feelings, and that others, if he will be the first to believe them and the last to obtrude, so he takes the pains to convince by reason. He is ever ready to own a mistake, but he is more careful to avoid it. Candor, modesty, and profound knowledge of the subject, and of Christian sympathy and godly consideration for men and opinions, these are the essential attributes of the true critic.

These principles are true in general applied to that section of the art which deals with the songs of Zion. We know that in our day there is much dislike to Hymns and Criticism, which to old men is two names for one thing almost as good as known. But leaving at the most these two names correct, in theory and in practice, a comparison of our sacred literature is more important than the end must be long seriously neglected. The hymns of the church are our greatest earthly treasure. Not all the unexpired books of doctrine and devotion have been so precious or so essential as those holy lyrics which made the cause of peace and prayer. He who deals with them, whether in selecting and arranging or in merely commencing on the selection and arrangement of others, needs to be well furnished for his work. The composition of a hymn is a work of more delicate and difficult nature than [illegible] witness the poverty of nearly all existing manuals compared with the wealth of the materials from which they are made up: and even the competent criticism of separate hymns or of collections, requires a knowledge, a judgment, and a moderation, which few people possess. Two rules, hinted at above, must govern him who aspires to the title, and undertakes the labors of a Hymnologist. He must have respect both to the origin and the end of hymns; to the author, and to those for whom, as much as for himself, the hymns were written, and who, like himself, are entitled to form judgments, and do form them.

He must start with a respect for the author. The hyme-writers are among the greatest benefactors of the Church. Some of them were men rarely gifted, intellectually and spiritually; most of them were pure in doctrine, earnest in devotion, holy in life. Their character and deeds deserve a better return than the contemptuous indifference, the positive abuse, which some critics shower upon them. The despisers of "doggerel," from John Wesley, down, have too often rendered ungracious thanks to the humble Christians, who, with their one talent, tried faithfully to serve their Master and their brethren. There is certainly a monstrous mass of poor hymns in the language. The great majority of Watts' are of low poetical character: the same is true of Doddridge, Newton, and most others: while many minor writers, like Stennett, Fawcett, Gibbons, only succeeded in working out a good hymn now and then, as it were by accident, amid a mountain of very long or very common metre. Now a proper respect and gratitude to those good men need not induce us to use their unsuccessful attempts at lyric poetry, or to pretend to admire their faults; the Church has done that too long already, to her own damage: no, let us keep the trash out of our hymn books, or, if any of it gets in, let us (since an evil must be exposed, to be remedied) point out its defects, 'mildly but firmly;' let us abstain from 'railing accusation' and gratuitous insult. But a worse offence is committed when the critic supplies not only the blame but its cause; when the fault ascribed to the poetry exists in his own mind alone. Too often men are severe because they are blessed by nature with a cracked temper, or because they are unable to appreciate the piece criticised. This meddling of one's own sins upon another is surely out of order. A captious, fault-finding spirit, will discover flaws in the most perfect work of art; such a critic, in the words of Professor Park, "corrupts the minds of men who would have thought no evil, if he had not suggested it."

Again, regard is due to the judgments of others. A hymn book concerns everybody; it is prepared for the use of 'the great congregation;' and the peculiarities of individuals ought to be stamped upon it no further than as those peculiarities are virtues which ought to be common to all. A compiler or a critic must not suffer his personal taste solely to govern him; he must regard the varying tastes of others, and by help of these, study to approximate towards a standard of perfect purity and correctness. A hymn should not be admitted or commended simply because it is popular, if it be not deservedly so; still less should a hymn be accepted or refused by the isolated judgment of a single critic. This is the use of revising committees, and the danger of hymn books compiled by one unassisted individual: two heads are better than one, and in the multitude of coun

MASONIC NOTICE

Newark, N. J., Ap. 3, A. D. 1862, A. L. 5862

To all whom it may concern

The grand officers of the Right Worshipful (Union) Grand Lodge of free and accepted ancient York Masons for the State of New Jersey, held in the city of Burlington and State aforesaid, and in union with the most Right Worshipful National Grand Lodge of free and accepted ancient York Masons of these United States of America, did, on the 3d instant, in the city of Newark, in the State of New Jersey, organize a new Masonic Lodge of free and accepted Ancient York Masons, namely Prudence Lodge, No. 15, and the following brethren were duly installed to their respective offices:

Brother Peter D. Hedges, Worshipful Master.
" John M. Lowery, Senior Warden.
" James P. Lowery, Junior Warden.
" Robert Williams, Treasurer.
" Martin Berry, Secretary.

Past Grand Masters—Bros. Freeman Gould, Obadiah L. Parre, of the Grand Lodge of New Jersey; and Bro. James W B Smith, from New York, was present on the occasion. We shall not soon forget Sister Williams. Her hospitality made us think she was a true heroine.

REVIVALS.

The work of Almighty God seems to be spreading in many directions among our people. The Rev. William W. Grimes, of New Bedford, Massachusetts, writes us that the good Lord has most powerfully blessed his labors. For the last five weeks he has been conducting a revival for the Lord, and during that time some thirty souls have been hopefully converted to God and the Lamb; and, at the time of his writing, the altar was crowded with mourners seeking for JESUS. But lo! 'tis a sad piece of intelligence he concludes his letter with; and it is as follows. Some scamp attempted to burn the church down by kindling a fire before daylight in the library of the church, burning up the library, and doing considerable damage generally. We are glad to learn that an insurance covers the entire loss. He further states that they will not be able to get in for some time. The Zion Mission Church, Rev. Stephens, Pastor, was still in progress, up to the time of writing, and, according to the report, somewhere about thirty persons claim to have been converted to God—and thus, in the Philadelphia district, there has been a general revival in the churches.

OHIO ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

This Conference meets on the 15th instant in the city of Zanesville, Ohio. Bishop Quinn will preside. We hope that the brethren will come up prepared to make good reports of their two-cent money; for that district is a long ways behind.

The good Lord willing, we shall be with you this time, and shall lay claims to all that is due the Book Concern of our beloved Zion. We hope to have a good time with the brethren.

NOTICE

To all the members of the General Conference Book Committee:

You are hereby notified to meet in Philadelphia Bethel Church, minister's studio, May the 8th, at 9 o'clock, A. M., either in person or by proxy We would also say, in answer to a brother, in relation to him deputizing any brother to act in his place, that we know of no law to guaranty any thing of the kind in our Church this side of the General Conference, except the General Committee; they have power to fill any vacancy they may choose.

ELISHA WEAVER,
General Book Steward and Editor.

NOTICE.

The District Grand Lodge of No. 2 of the Samaritans and Daughters of Samaria will hold a called meeting on the 15th inst., at Masonic Hall, South and Eleventh Streets, Philadelphia. Punctual attendance of the members is requested. To commence at 7 o'clock, P. M.

QUARTERLY MEETING

In the A. M. E. Union Church, on Center St Philadelphia, on the 19th and 20th insts.

Love Feast on the evening of the 21st inst.

Rev. HENRY DAVIS, Elder.

April 2, 1862.

MR. EDITOR:—We have just closed a four weeks' anxious meeting, held in the A. M. E. Union Church, in Philadelphia, which resulted in some twelve converts to the Christian religion, and a number still mourning and seeking deliverance from their sins.

Rev. HENRY DAVIS, Elder.

April 2, 1862.

JOHN S ROCK, ESQ.

A colored member of the Boston bar, delivered a splendid lecture on Tuesday evening, in the lecture-room of St. Thomas' Church, in Fifth Street Subject—A plea for my people. It was handled in a masterly manner, and elicited much credit on the speaker. At the request of many friends, who heard it, he was prevailed upon to stay and repeat his lecture in Sansom St. Hall, which will take place on Monday evening, the 14th inst. Admission, 25 cents.

CONTRABANDS AT FORT ROYAL.

Services for the 4th and last Quarterly Meeting in the Wesley A M E Church, Rev. [illegible] for this Conference year, will take place as [illegible] Sunday, the 13th, preaching at 10½ A M by the Rev. I J Hill. At 3 P M, by the Pastor. At 7½ P M, by the Rev. J Watson, Minister of Bethel Church

Love feast will be held on Wednesday evening, the 16th. Doors open at 7 o'clock; close at 8 o'clock.

SNOW.

On last Tuesday there was a wonderful snow storm here in Philadelphia, which continued till the following morning. The 8th and 9th of April will long be remembered on account of their winter-like appearance.

TWO CENT MONEY.

We call the special attention of the brethren to page 219, New Discipline, in relation to the two-cent money, and especially to the 16th paragraph under the same page We do hope that all of our brethren having charge of circuits and stations will obey the General Conference of our beloved Zion, and commence in time to collect their two-cent money; and if the brethren have so far obeyed the law by making a collection every month, or every two months, we are quite sure that there will be a change in matters pertaining to our financial department. Suppose that Bethel Church, of Philadelphia, with over twelve hundred members, (we will say twelve hundred, though there is said to be some fifteen hundred,) should comply with the request; twenty-five times twelve would be three hundred dollars,)—and this, it will be remembered, is only twenty-five cents a head. At the very lowest estimate, this is what Bethel Church will owe us at our Annual Conference.

The Union Church placing the membership at two hundred, at twenty-five cents each, will be fifty dollars. Ebenezer (Md.) Bethel Church has about twelve hundred members, suppose that she is caused to do her duty—that the minister should feel it his duty to see that each member pays his or her twenty-five cents per year; there would be three hundred dollars due the Book Steward, to be appropriated as per Discipline. Ebenezer Church has at least two hundred members, and twenty-five times two hundred is fifty dollars.

Now here would be seven hundred dollars,—leaving out Washington, New York, Brooklyn, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Louisville, Indianapolis, Chicago, and St. Louis, and besides hundreds of churches on circuits, and other stations where brethren are. If brethren will only do what the regulations of the Church have demanded of them, all would be well. We believe that there is not a member in our Church but what would consider it a great insult to say that they were too poor to pay the small sum of twenty-five cents a year for the benefit of the Book Concern and of our brethren who have labored hard to carry the glad tidings of the gospel to the dying world.

THE IMPROVEMENT OF TIME.

How important it that we should improve our time to the best advantage that we possibly can, in some way. We do steadfastly and firmly believe that every one of us feels anxious to do something for ourselves and for the benefit of others. Although we often hear persons exclaim, "Oh! dear; how I wish that I had nothing to do;" and when those have nothing to do, they are always uneasy and feel unhappy all the time until their hands are employed in the busy tolls of the day Therefore, we say that it would be wrong for active and intelligent beings not to have anything to do. And why? Because God has commanded us to do whatsoever our hands should find to do. This he speaks of in a spiritual sense, but some will say, "So long as I improve my time, I can do anything;" but we feel that it is our duty to contradict this, because some might waste their time by reading novels and other books which are not appropriate for them to read, and especially young ladies. Again, our time might be spent by attending the ball room, and by occupying the gambler's chair and playing cards, and by various amusements. Therefore, I think that our time should not be wasted. In like manner, God has appointed the time of man to be three score and ten years, and who is there that has lived those many long years, and say that they have been too faithful in improving their time. I answer, no one, no, not one. God has made us active beings; has placed the mark of intelligence on our foreheads; he has given us intellects to improve, and if we do not improve those talents it will be read of us as of the servant that hid his Lord's talent in the earth; therefore when he comes, if he finds that we have not added to our talent, he will take away that which we have, and give to him that has improved his time.

We are also commanded to improve our time in these words, "Work while the day lasts, for the night cometh when no man shall work." Therefore we are not only commanded to do our temporal work, but we are commanded to do a spiritual work with fear and trembling; because he told his disciples that he would come in an hour that they knew not. He told them also to watch and pray continually, lest they should enter into temptation, and these commands have been handed down to us and to every age of the world until the present time and by the Holy Scriptures we are compelled to obey them. Now, you see my fellow-travellers to eternity, that we have no time to spend in [illegible] but we must [illegible] have any enjoyment!" O yes; but we as Christians should think that the greatest enjoyment that we have is when we are engaged in saving souls. And oh, sinner, your enjoyment is but for a season, they are all vanity an [illegible] of spirit at the end of time. Therefore, I beseech you, leave off your sinful ways and improve your time by seeking favor of God and enjoying his presence for ever We should remember that—

'Tis easy work, if we begin
To seek the Lord betimes,
But sinners that grow old in sin,
Are hardened in their crimes."

TO CORRESPONDENTS

A responsible name should accompany all communications designed for insertion in the RECORDER. The writer may not [illegible] himself; but we must have the name and address of the BISHOP PAYNE'S REJOINDER TO BISHOP NAZREY.

RT. REV AND DEAR BROTHER:—Yours in the Recorder of March 15th is before me. I have neither time nor disposition for controversy. My precious moments are more nobly employed in feeding the sheep of the fold with strong meat, and the tender lambs thereof with the sincere milk of the word. But inasmuch as we believe that the cause of truth and good government are at stake, we will devote a few moments to reply to his [illegible] Bishop Nazrey

Your letter may be divided into three parts 1st. Five Assertions, 2d. The Denials, 3d. The sinister [illegible] Contempt and Partiality. These I shall review as concisely as possible First, The Invective. This is contained in the first four paragraphs, to which, I reply by saying, We will not curse but bless you, for placing us in the glorious company of the [illegible] where the Chief Priests and Pharisees said "That Deceiver," also of the Apostles who were regarded "as deceivers and yet [illegible]" Second, The Denials of the patent facts of history These denials embrace seven distinct paragraphs.

In the first you "Positively deny" that you ever "asked the members of the General Conference of 1860 to give some plan concerning" your "Bishopric." To this my answer is, if you deny your own letter published in the Recorder of January the 11th addressed to said persons, then, you will never believe any thing which we might advance in proof of our assertion; then, also, is that letter a solemn enigma. In relation to the "Clark resolution" to which you refer, we say, That resolution only contemplates a single episcopate. You are exercising a double one, therefore we oppose it. Your third denial declares that you never "exercised a double episcopal authority." To this we give three replies. 1st This denial contradicts the deliberate judgment of the decree of the General Conference of 1860. If you deny what that authoritative and venerable body affirm, no one can expect you to believe us. 2d. You deny what all candid men assert, both in Canada and in the United States,—in the A. M. E. Church and outside of it. 3d You also deny your own statements in your defence before the "Informal meeting of the members of the [illegible] Conference."

Moreover, the parallel which you attempt to draw between the authority of Bishops Brown, Quinn and D. A Payne, and your double episcopate is a complete failure. Because while they presided over the churches in Canada, these churches were nothing more nor less than so many missionary branches shooting out from the great mother tree in the U. S.—mere ramifications of the A. M. E. Church, having one political faith, one discipline, and acknowledging but one authority—then, they were not in union, but a unit with the A. M. E. Church. But your authority ever since 1856, has been over the British M. E. Church, having a different political faith, a different discipline, acknowledging a different authority both in civil and ecclesiastical, foreign to ours, antagonistic to ours. Moreover, our authority was only temporary, yours for life,—ours was only permissive, yours is legal and rightful. He who cannot see the difference must be blind in one eye, and unable to see out of the other, that is, wilfully blind. Bishop Nazrey, let me humbly tell you, instead of being parallel, the two cases constitute divergent lines.

Your fourth denial declares that you have not failed to fulfil the pledge made to the General Conference, that you would resign from the B. M. E. Church. The only reply which I will now give to this denial is that, I wonder you do not deny your own existence. 5th. You deny that the General Conference made any such decree as we affirm in our letter, and then with an air of triumph ask us if we "Know not that a request is not a decree!" Our answer is, yes, most sapient Bishop, we are not so ignorant as not to know that a request is not a decree. But be kind enough now to let me put to you a question. Knowest thou not that this request under consideration is the legitimate result of the decree touching your bishopric? If the fruit is like the tree, then is this request like the decree from which it sprang—resulting from a decree, it must partake of the nature of a decree. But why this request? Because the General Conference having previously decided, that you, and you alone, were the Bishop of the B. M. E. Church, had no power to command you; therefore, they respectfully request you to resign: for they also know that if you attempted to exercise a double episcopate after May, 1860, as you had done previously to that time, the result would be perpetual strife, schism, and probably a split in the A M E Church

You see a conflict between the decree of 1856 and that of 1860. We see none. We maintain that they are perfectly harmonious. That of 1856, provided that whenever the Canadians might ask for one of our Bishops, one should be given them. They asked for you, and you were given, not against your will, but with your free consent. In view of this fact, the decree of 1860 confirmed you in your life time Bishopric; then afterwards we respectfully requested you to resign it, and return to your former status in the A. M. E. Church. This you gave a written promise to do, and declared it should take effect on and at the rise of the General Conference of the B. M. E Church; but this is the very thing which you have failed to do: hence, all the trouble on both sides of the lakes. Now to consent that you shall exercise episcopal authority while this pledge remains unfulfilled is what we never can, and never will consent to do in the face of the [illegible] decrees of the last General Conference.

Our reply to your seventh is this. We have never ordered you to leave the A. M. E. Church. On the contrary, I, D. A. Payne, [illegible] years ago, had to entreat you not to leave [illegible] also, we never ordered you to leave the United States. In 1852 or '3, you left it of your own free will, went to Canada, and bought yourself a farm of your own free will, built on it a comfortable house of your own free will, gave up yourself to the Canadian Church to be their life-time Bishop, of your own free will, and yet you intimate that we have made an "impudent" attempt to "order" you out of the A. M. E Church, yea, even to "mob" you out! An honorable man regards his word more than his life. You gave your word to resign from the B. M. E. Church, and because we urge you to make your word good, you tell us we are making an impudent attempt to order you away. Moreover, a religious man "sweareth to his own hurt and changeth not." You also boast of obtaining "the great blessing of religion in the A. M. E. Church." This is what Bishop Allen could not do, because he, like some of us, unfortunately obtained it in the Methodist Episcopal Church. To be born in A[illegible] land is accidental to mankind: in [illegible] His Church is accidental to the Bishopric. Wise men never boast of accidentals

You challenge us to prove that you "have been exercising episcopal jurisdiction in Canada by proxy" To this we say, the proofs are ample and strong enough to convince any man, except one who is determined to deny the plainest facts of history, even his own deliberate pledge.

But for the benefit of others I will now furnish two proofs which Bishop Nazrey himself has unconsciously given; the one is found in your defence before the "Informal meeting of the Philadelphia Annual Conference," in which you declare, that at the very General Conference of the B M E Church which refused to accept your resignation, "they created an Assistant Superintendent" Now, to whom is he an assistant? To the Archbishop of Canterbury? That is impossible. To the Lord Bishop of Toronto? Certainly not. To the Bishops Smith and Richardson of the M E Church in Canada? 'Tis foolish to say so. Whom then? Why he is an assistant to the Rt. Rev. Willis Nazrey. Now an assistant to a Bishop is the agent of that Bishop, and if an agent is not a proxy, what is he? But an agent or assistant is a proxy, and, therefore, the assistant superintendent of Canada is the proxy of Bishop Nazrey

The second proof is the fact, that you are now, by one or more of your proxies, using Bishop Green for Episcopal Jurisdiction in the B. M. E. Church.

And, now, my Reverend Colleague, let me respectfully ask, why do you treat the thirty brethren who signed the "plan" with such silent contempt? Are they so small that they cannot be seen? Or, are they not members of the last General Conference? Why do you single out so small a man as myself for a target? The thirty ministers who signed the "plan" represent five Annual Conferences. Are they not worthy of your notice? Moreover, why are you partial? You called upon the members of the Conference to present a "plan" for promoting the peace of the two connexions. Since then, Rev. J. P. Campbell presented "a plan," so did Rev. E. Weaver. You never assailed them with an unkind word. But as soon as D. A. Payne, with thirty one respectable Elders, representing five Annual Conferences, offered you "a plan," for setting at rest, a question fraught with so much mischief," you single out and assail one of their number as "A Deceiver."

Again, you also suggested that the "plan" should be offered through the columns of the Recorder, and for complying with this your own request, you tell us that we "have departed from a plain Scriptural and disciplinary duty, either from an erroneous judgment," "or with an intention to deceive and lead astray the judgment of others." Verily, verily, my Reverend brother is a miracle of self-contradiction!

We have indeed fallen upon evil times when the judgment of two elders representing one Conference is regarded as respectful, if not infallible, while that of thirty-one elders representing five Conferences is to be scouted, criticised, and reviled!

We shall not advise you, as you have done us, to "Crack your whip," and drive your team through two foreign lands, and two foreign churches, conquering and to conquer, but in the courteous language of the General Conference, We respectfully request you to resign from the Canadian Church and come back to us. If you will not take this advice then we offer you another, go to Canada and exercise your episcopate there, as one of the Bishops of the B. M. E. Church.

Were you to call a council of a thousand Bishops they could not give any other advice, unless they could first destroy your present relations to the B. M. E. Church, or trample the decrees of the last General Conference under their feet.

The idea of calling a special General Conference to make you do, what you promised the last to do, or to make them decide against their own convictions, and annul their own decree, is absurd and wicked.

As for me, I wish all concerned to know what ground I occupy on this and every other question involving a duty, an obligation, or a moral principle, and they can know when I tell them, that as I would sacrifice my friend to my country, and my country to my God, so also, I would sacrifice my friend to the Church, and all ecclesiastical relations, honors, and emoluments to Christ, the truth, and the right.

Signed in behalf of thirty-one members of the General Conference of 1860

D. A. PAYNE.

REFLECTIONS.

BY SACER

"Honor and worth from no condition rise.
Act well your part, there all true honor lies."

'Tis a strange world which we live in, but 'twill mend just as fast as we operate upon it, and just as we operate upon it. Life—the longest—is but short: its fleeting moments are precious, because so few. Yet, how small are the number that realize its shortness, and that it is swiftly passing away. If a squad of infantry attack a battery and have but fifty rounds of ammunition, the great question would be, How best to use it? To use to the best advantage that which if once lost cannot be again obtained, is the aim of every reflecting individual. The most important of all questions then, is How can I use my life to the best advantage? For what purpose do I live? How shall we answer this question? Where shall we find the answer? If we turn to the world, the answer will be, we live for ourselves. "Every man for himself, and the captain of the dark regions takes the hindmost." I mean by the answer from the world, the general example set by the world The world will tell us to seek the gratification of our hearts' desires, be they good or bad—minister to the demands of passion, and thus satiate ourselves with the things of time. The world says to you, If, in the main, you love freedom from care and responsibility, then enjoy ease and comfort, and the ostentatious display of attire—live to eat—to laugh and grow fat. If you desire wealth, it says get it, no matter how. Hold on to the gold with grasp that cannot be broken—deprive yourself—those dependent upon you of the necessities of life—commit any dishonesty that will not send you to the state prison—make the promise to the ear, and break it to the hope—steel the heart to the wants and miseries of mankind—oppress the poor—regard not the helplessness of the orphan—the bereavement, sad and distressing, of the widow: get your wealth. It says if you, in the main, desire fame, get it, no matter how: get it, whether it be by intrigue or by merit. We might extend the world's answer to this question a great deal farther, but time will not permit. It is enough to say that the world's answer is false, because the world is false Wickedness, indeed, hath made it a vast, moral desert, and the good that is in it, is but as the oases here and there, that cheer the traveller on the sandy waste. Thank God! the oases are increasing, widening, and growing more beautiful.

But turn to nature—turn to nature. Oh, nature! thou mighty oracle! thou clearest of all types of thy Maker's will, how precious is thy testimony! to thee do we appeal for an answer! She gives it in the shining gems which deck the brow of night. She gives it in the limpid stream, that winds a silver thread around the rugged mount. Yes; as her objects are ten thousand times ten thousand, so she ten thousand times ten thousand answers gives—and each answer speaks thus: "We should live not for ourselves, but for our God and our fellows." The sun, while he darts his shining rays into the darkest corners, and while there is no place where his light is not, seems to address the world. Did it not occur to us, that the sun speaks in language as potent as its radiant beams are resplendent? The earth is wrapped in the dark mantle of night, and the sun in the morning seems to awake to lift this covering How, as he breaks from the confines of the Eastern horizon, does he seem to struggle—the hills seem to interpose obstacles—the clouds seem to obstruct: to a stranger upon terra firma the issue would seem doubtful—yet slowly and steadily does he progress—his rays growing stronger and stronger—his velocity unabating! Oh, what an emblem of patience, strength, and charity are here; for he gilds with a golden tinge the darkest obstructions that obtrude upon his course! As the sun comes forth into the world, every true man comes forth on the world's stage to play a part.

Every man should be a sun to light a world; that world is his particular sphere of life. He comes forward, then, under difficulties; his little world is all dark; but realizing that it is his duty to light it up, he shines, let what may come. Difficulties may arise, and say, "Stay behind me, horizon, in obscurity," he heeds them not, but rises in his sublimity higher and higher in altitude, dispensing with more and more power the blessings which form his existence Clouds may drift across his pathway; obscure him from sight: he still shines. Yes, shines till he sets behind the hills that overlook Jordan's stormy banks; and then, in mellowed splendour, hurls his expiring rays to give their golden tint to every obstruction.

John Brown, of Harper's Ferry renown, was a sun: his sphere was an effort to free the unfortunate descendants of Africans. Under what difficulties did his light break forth, and what or who could keep it from shining? Though captured, wounded, brutally treated, Incarcerated, and murdered, still his holy principle which made him a sun burned on; and all the clouds of infamy, which arose from the corrupt moral atmosphere of America, heated with the breath of torment, could not put out the light of his sun, though they might obscure it. He, one of the mortal few, whose light must shine in the world until the death-knell of time is tolled, and the light of all these suns are swallowed up in the light and glory of God. The true man and true woman, whose life is rendered luminous by the burning of moral principle within, has, indeed, attained height, when, like the sun, they need really fear nothing. It does not seem that perfection is necessary to this great moral effulgence, for on the sun's disk there are spots. Nor does it depend on circumstances; for circumstances seem oftentimes to combine with power and say, "Oh, sun, thou shalt not shine!"

Oh! that we could learn of nature, and then we would know how to "act well our own part." The blushing rosebud, wet with dew, as though it had been weeping for the absence of the sun in early morn, lifts its head to greet his rising The sun smiles upon it. The dismal swamp, that seems to rejoice in the blackness of night, for then it is that the birds that dwell in it sing, seems to frown and turn away from the rising sun. Yet he smiles upon it, and carries off its miasma. The birds leave their carolling, fold their little wings to rest, as the earth puts on the habiliments of nocturnal darkness, but break forth in church anthems when the king of day comes forth: the sun smiles upon them. How excellent is he, that regardless of the condition or disposition of his fellow, can add to his comfort, his improvement, or his happiness.

Too many men follow the tide: women do so, too. We often have to row against wind and tide (though men are not very free to admit that women should ever row against the tide of their will.) The "what will people think" has too much to do with our actions. It paralyzes exertion, stifles noble promptings, destroys manhood, and makes one the tool of the next dexterous hand stretched out after them. Let us, then, not be aimless; let us fix our stakes; let us choose our parts; and then cry out—"Sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish," I will struggle to obtain a certain object in life, and then let action be continued, and unceasing. I have always found, that the more a man complains about the circumstances which surround him, the difficulties and trials that beset his pathway, the more evidence does he give of his inadequacy to the great battle of life; and that he is not "up and doing with a heart for any fate"

Why there is nothing that can transpire in our lives, that we may not turn to our own account. If, indeed, we are impressed by the magical power of the word onward, and have started in the right direction, as God's three great finger boards point out, any one might as well try to stop us, as to stop the onward roll of the rainbow-crowned Niagara, or put out the fires of burning Vesuvius.

TROUBLES OF LIFE

Man is born to trouble, as the sparks are to fly upwards The course of life is a two sided subject. It has a bright side and a dark side. If we look at the dark side we see nothing but a loom of trouble, disappointments, injustice, sorrows, and heart-rending sorrows. What is the cause of all this sorrow The pages of sacred writ tell us that sin is the cause of all this trouble. But, says one, What is trouble? I answer it is that part of man's life which is mixed with vexation, confusion and [illegible] that [illegible] may be known to us in various stand points. One trouble is the departure of friends and relations by death To [illegible] loved ones from our family circle is trouble to the [illegible] to reach that the [illegible] and misery implied that [illegible] with cure, is now hushed in [illegible] perhaps, with which none other. When I hear the winds blow, and see [illegible] of descending in such torrent, I think [illegible] departed friends, and it brings back to my mind the remembrance of bygone days.

Another cross is the loss of fortune, and the disappointment of future prospects. When the mind is towering upon the pinnacle of prosperity, and the future hopes are luxury and happiness—when we can say to the soul, Soul, thou shalt live for many days—then let destruction come, our friends be separated from us, our fortune fly, and the heir be brought to adversity,—and who can tell the pain, the anguish, the chagrin, the perturbation that must fill such a soul! What thunder is to the ear, and lightning to the eye, and the piercing of a sound is to the flesh, so is such news to the heart of one in the situation just described.

Another great cross is poverty; and, I think, in my opinion, it is the heaviest of all crosses to bear. Many persons say that they are poor, and yet are comfortably situated. But I speak of extreme poverty—where the widowed mother and half a dozen children are stowed away in some time-worn hut, where the weather beats in whenever it wants, and where they have no fuel but that which they find in the woods, or which some kind friend brings them,—with very little to eat, and that little from the hand of some kind benefactor. When the mother looks at her half-dressed, shoeless, stockingless, and bare-toed children, day after day, and cannot think that times will be any better until winter is gone, how great must be her anxiety of mind. Such a scene, I think, is heart-rending sorrow.

Another great cross is disobedient, dissipated, and ungrateful children. Many parents can quote the language of Scripture, and say: "I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me." Some people suppose that if it were not for their children they would be happy. But, as I have before said, "Man was born to trouble." It is impossible to get through this hostile world without trouble. There are those who, seemingly, have no trouble; yet they have their sightings without, and fears within. But, with all our conflicts in this world, we desire life; and many of us, in our darkest hours, look forward to sunshine.

As we have already said, "This world is a two-sided subject." Some persons look on the dark side, and others on the bright side. Many meet trouble half way—that is, they worry themselves about what they are afraid will happen. Many persons have the fair side turned towards them: they neither carry trouble, nor meet it until it comes. They walk in sunshine to-day, and take a view through the telescope of enthusiasm, and see nothing to mar their happiness. When great trouble comes upon such persons, it is like the overflowing of the river Nile.

Seeing that man is doomed to trouble, let us lean upon the arm of God, remembering that his arm is omnipotent.

For the Christian Recorder.

MR. EDITOR.—Dear Sir: In glancing over the Recorder of September 21st, 1861, I saw an article entitled, "Thoughts on Greece," which is claimed to have been written by a distinguished clergyman of the A M E Church.

Now, although he may not have intended to deceive, yet I find the self-same article, verbatim et literatim, in a book printed in 1829 by Vanderpool & Cole, New York, and entitled, "Stephanini's Narrative." It is, as its title imports, the personal narrative of J. Stephanini, a native Greek, and is written in a very clear, glowing, and elegant style. Indeed, neither the reverend clergyman above alluded to, nor any one else alive to the eloquence of letters, can be in the least censured for falling in love with so fine a work.

That the A. M. E. clergyman has seen and copied from this book, I cannot say. Yet this much may be advanced: if the said clergyman and the native Greek (J. Stephanini) both think exactly the same thoughts, and express those thoughts in the same words, arranged in the same manner, I submit that one of them might, without any loss to the literary world, take up some other employment than writing pro publico. At least, such is the opinion of

REV. T. STROTHER AND HIS CAVILS ABOUT INCONSISTENCIES.

As we have before intimated, Brother Strother has written three long and tedious, dark and gloomy articles about inconsistencies, in the 58th, 63d, and 65th numbers of the Christian Recorder, which, in themselves, contain, from the confused and agitated brain of that good brother, the most inconsistent reasonings—or, more appropriately, we should say, rambling assertions, contradictions and absurdities—that we have ever seen from any one writer in the columns of this paper, from its first publication unto the present issue. Moreover, his FALSE reasonings, contradictions and absurdities relative to the present Episcopal discussion appear to exceed in the amount of their ridiculousness and number the sum total of all that has been said by all other writers put together! This assertion is made without the least fear of a truthful and successful contradiction whatever from ANY source. We purposely and intentionally refrain from entering into a discussion with him about the statements made in his first article upon the subject, in number 58, because he pleaded ignorance of the subject about which he wrote in that article But in his second article (number 63) he charges us with misrepresenting him "very glaringly."

He now positively denies making use of the following language quoted by us from his article in No. 58, Feb. 15th, 1862, which reads as follows: "If I know which one of the Church organizations he (that is, Bishop Nazrey) went with in the division of the Churches as named above—and if I know how often he had resigned since—and if I knew what Church or Churches he has attached himself to since such resignation, I would know then precisely where to go to find him; and in that way I would put a stop to any further wrangling or jangling on the subject" These, and these only, are the words quoted from him by us in our article, No. 59 of the Christian Recorder, headed, "Bishop Nazrey, or the True State of the Case." Now, when a brother makes a statement like the one above specified, and afterwards "most positively denies" that he has made that statement, in the face of a written and published document, when it is quoted in as near a [illegible] against him by another brother, he is not the man with whom we should discuss any question whatever in hope of receiving or imparting light upon any subject; and from such we turn away with disgust and horror Brother Strother cannot show our readers [illegible] one word quoted by us from him, and in his name, that he did not utter. We have been particular in this matter, because we have no confidence nor any pleasure in an attempt to advance the cause of truth by false reasonings and misrepresentations. Logical, philosophical, and friendly controversy is an occasion of the advancement of light and truth in the world—but absurdities, contradictions, and cavillings never do; and the man who will deny written and published statements made over his own signature, is not worthy of receiving any other reply than an exposure of his weakness and unmanly attempt to cast contempt upon an honest opponent.

Brother Strother wishes to make the impression upon the minds of his readers that he is a logical reasoner. In view of that fact, we will give them a specimen of his logical acumen. He says, "I see that the Rev. J. P. Campbell has noticed my communication on Bishop Nazrey's position." "He says Rev. T. Strother thinks he has made a discovery of inconsistencies; and, after telling us what he conceives them to be, he tells us himself that he does not know what the major proposition is about which he is writing. Now, Elder Campbell has misrepresented me very glaringly. Now, his major proposition and mine are different; for he proposes to explain or define Bishop Nazrey's position: my major proposition, if I have one, is found in the predicate of the sentence which forms the heading of my communication, which predicate is, 'A Discovery of Inconsistencies.' Discovery of inconsistencies, then, is my major proposition."

Here we have an exhibition of his logical powers. He calls the heading of his article both a sentence and proposition—more: he calls the same term both a proposition and the predicate of a proposition; for he says, "A discovery of inconsistencies is my predicate:" and then, in the next sentence, he says, "Discovery of inconsistencies is my major proposition." If a collection of words are so arranged as to constitute a proposition, then they are not the predicate of that proposition. Again: a collection of words, as, "A Discovery of Inconsistencies," do not constitute a sentence. A sentence in logic must always consist of these three parts—a subject, predicate, and copula. The words, "Discovery of Inconsistencies," are not a proposition in logic—much less do they constitute the major proposition of a logical syllogism. A sentence is a judgment expressed in words. A logical proposition is a sentence indicative. But the words "A Discovery of Inconsistencies," is neither one or the other. Our would-be logician tells, in the beginning of his article, that he has been writing a communication about Bishop Nazrey's position, and, within twenty-five lines afterwards, tells us that Elder Campbell is explaining Bishop Nazrey's position; but my subject is different—mine is a discovery of inconsistencies. Now, the truth is, that the sentence which we quoted from Brother Strother's article, which appears in No. 58, as stated by us in No 59, is a hypothetical proposition, with three conditional antecedents in the major premise—all of which directly refer to Bishop Nazrey and his position. Let those who are possessed with curiosity enough, and who are really versed in the science of logic, examine the matter for themselves for farther satisfaction. We are unwilling to discuss the question under consideration with any brother who reasons like Brother Strother. There are brethren in both the West [illegible] and East with whom we are willing to discuss [illegible] they are reasonable men. J. P. [illegible]

MR. EDITOR:—I will now give you a short sketch of the state of things with us. We have had a very hard year, both spiritually and temporally. This may be some help to such as are being discouraged in their labors of love. We entered our field of labor, this year, through a great deal of opposition from many in the Board, and this has been continued, by some of them, up till the present time. We have thought that this must be the season when the devil is turned loose. It is true that the spirit of the times is in our people here; for the spirit of rebellion and war has been in the people during all the year. Truly, we have thought, we would be driven from the walls this year, and compelled to seek some employment, in order to get bread for our [illegible] but as the day came, the Lord supplied our need, and we have labored on, the Lord helping us through it all; and though the devil, through men on earth, has raged, the Lord hath given victory on Israel's side. On the 23d of February, the work broke out—the Holy Ghost giving edge to the word. Sinners were convicted, mourners presented themselves at the altar, that prayer should be made for them, that they might escape the impending wrath they saw hanging over their heads; thus we have had from 5 to 28 mourners at once, and the Lord, in answer to prayer, has converted and added to the Church, which we trust [illegible] especially saved. 19th of March, we baptized five on P[illegible] on the 23d and 24th, at New Richmond, [illegible] were baptized, and the work is still going. Praise be given to the God of love.

I am ever yours, in Christ,

MUST BE HELD SACRED

"Slavery is the sum of all villainies. It [illegible] the children of Africa, degrades [illegible] human brotherhood; it puts the manhood of [illegible] the chastity of woman, the unity of the family, the sanctity of the Sabbath, and the gates of the temple in the power of the master; it hides the key of knowledge and withholds the word of God, and cries at will—'Going—going—gone,' over human hearts. It hath its revenges on the master, too, for it opens the gate to his lust, loosens the reins of his passions, bewilders his intellect, sears his conscience, obscures to his vision the bright forms of liberty and justice, and exhibits the Son of God as the patron of its concentrated wrongs; it has filled a belt of States with treason and perjury, disgraced the character, invaded the territory, stolen the property, exiled the friends, and blockaded the Capital of the United States; it has torn down our flag within a tract the greater part of which was bought with our money, and stretched around it a line of troops, so that our citizens cannot penetrate it without fire and sword; yet we must hold it sacred."

Dr. Thompson.

EMANCIPATION OF SLAVES OF REBELS.

ST. LOUIS, March 31st.—General Curtis has issued the following special order:

"Headquarters Army of the South west, March 26th, 1862.

"Charles Morton, Hamilton Kennedy, and Alexander Lewis, colored men, formerly slaves, employed in the rebel service, and taken as contraband of war, are hereby confiscated, and not being needed for the public service, are permitted to pass the pickets of this command northward, without let or hindrance, and are forever emancipated from the service of masters who allowed them to aid in their efforts to break up the Government and the laws of our country.

MERIT TO WHOM MERIT IS DUE.

We copy the following from the New York Independent, which we recommend to all our readers, especially to those who have had so little confidence in the ability of our people, either in the North or in the South, and we doubt very much whether there is any other class of people under the heavens would have been so quiet under the past and present circumstances. It is their religion that enables them to stand:

THE REMARKABLE good CONDUCT of the African people during the convulsions of the past year ought to excite the attention and gratitude of good men. The free colored people have avoided any intercourse calculated to excite prejudice already too sensitive. In the South, they have justified all the good opinions that have been entertained of them, and put to shame the popular expectations. For the people have for a generation been brought up and fed on the fears of insurrection, rapine, blood, cruelty, conflagration, robbery, and lust, should the slave lose the control of his master. Instead of this, the thousands and thousands of escaped or liberated slaves have proved themselves as kind obedient and as industrious as was possible in their circumstances.

They have never proved fractious or indocile.

They have never been revengeful or sullen.

They have shown no indisposition to be restrained and guided by civil and special police regulations.

They have, in the main, been industrious, faithful and as careful as their training would allow.

They have gladly received religious instruction and shown an eargerness in learning to read and write. These things give great encouragement to Christians. In the providence of God, we are called to an extraordinary work. The least misconduct of the slave or free colored population will be a spark upon the most inflammable materials, and produce disastrous consequences. Nothing but Divine help can prevent development of the worst passions of the ignorant and unprincipled part of our white population. Christians never so much needed to be clothed with the spirit of the Master. Let much prayer be offered, not only for our rulers but for those under them. Especially, let unceasing supplication be made that out of the churches of this land may go forth an influence which shall hold in restraint the cruel prejudices and the selfish passions of men. Should this people be enabled to deliberate and justly settle the momentous questions now before them, it will present to the world one of the noblest triumphs of Christianity. It would also unalterably convince the world that a Republican Government, under Christian auspices, is the safest as well as most efficient of all.

We entirely agree with Dr Palmer of New Orleans, that God committed the African people to this nation as a solemn trust. They are a trust. God will require them at our hands! Dr. Palmer would execute this trust by imposing the slave law upon the African. We would execute the trust by breaking their bondage to men, and by giving to them the liberty of the Gospel. They are among us. They are weak, ignorant, and despoiled. We cannot escape responsibility. We must take care of them! Many think that the question may be settled by avoiding it; by dextrous management; by casting it out of Congress, and keeping it out of politics; by excluding it from church courts and from the pulpit.

This will not do. There are Divine Decrees at work. Four million human beings are not to be ignored easily. They pull at us on every side. They come upon us from the most unexpected quarters. Do what we will we shall not be able to rid ourselves of the black men. He cannot vote, and yet he will control the ballot-box. He is dumb, yet he keeps the whole nation in endless discourse. He meddles with our laws, and corrupts them. He shuts the school-book from our Southern Brethren, and locks the school-house. He casts his shadow on the pulpit; he sits behind the judge and grins over his shoulder. He interrupts the caucus, and sends confusion into Congress. The African is the pivot on which public affairs will turn for half a century.

It is time that men should cease talking about ridding themselves of this subject. They have no more control over it than they have over the seasons. Our only choice is whether we will accept and administer this trust in a spirit of Christian justice and mercy, or will leave it to be settled by hate, lust, and selfishness?

NOTICE.

The Social, Civil, and Statistical Association of the Colored People of Pennsylvania open a subscription list to aid the freed men at Port Royal and other points where they may be located, and respectfully ask the co-operation of the colored citizens and others in this city, or elsewhere, in money or clothing.

Any amount of value received will be acknowledged, with the name of the donor, in the Recorder, where a constant record will be kept.

Subscriptions may be sent to Jacob C White, at the office of the Lebanon Cemetery, 711 Lombard Street, and also to William Still, 107 North Fifth Street, and to Rev. E. Weaver, 619 Pine Street.

Port Royal Contrabands.—At a meeting held on Wednesday evening, at the Philadelphia Institute, by the Executive Committee of the Statistical Association of Colored People, of this city, the following resolutions were passed, which were read at the close of a concert by the Hutchinson Family last evening, given in aid of the escaped slaves at Port Royal:

Resolved, That the claims of the "Contrabands" in the vicinity of Port Royal and elsewhere call loudly upon the friends of humanity for material aid and sympathy.

Resolved, That while there is reason to regret that the Government has not more fully defined the status of these poor creatures, nevertheless it is clearly the duty of the Social, Civil and Statistical Association of the Colored People of Pennsylvania, not only to render aid as an organization, but also to commend these sufferers to the consideration of the various colored churches and societies of this city and State, that they may co-operate in the noble work of helping the Freemen's Association or other proper enterprises, which have undertaken to furnish food, clothing, and teachers, moral and religious, so much needed to relieve immediate distress and to inspire them with hopes of final deliverance.

Resolved, That we cannot lose sight of the Act of Congress, passed at its extra session, or of those proclamations emanating from the several Generals and Commanders of the Army, in which freedom has been declared to the slaves of all parties aiding directly or indirectly the rebellion.

Resolved, That in view of these acts, the slaves cannot (in our judgment) be considered other than FREEMEN

"Don't Send the Whisky."—A soldier in the army, who, himself not a professor of religion, had a praying mother and wife, wrote home last December, requesting that a bottle of whisky should be included in his Christmas-box. The Christian wife, praying every day for her husband, hesitated to fulfil his wish, but at last concluded that her duty required it, and prepared the bottle to go with the little luxuries and love-tokens which every one hoped would give a sweet remembrance of home. But just before the box was to be sent, another letter came, and it began with these words, "Don't send the whisky; for since I wrote you I have found Jesus, and given myself to him, and I do not want a bottle of whisky to add to my temptations." The letter went on to thank his faithful partner for her consistent Christian life, her love and her prayers, and to describe his joy in the newly-found Saviour.

Drinking has made sad work in our army, and it is to be hoped that many a manly second thought, even though not springing from actual [illegible] of a converted soul, may refuse the proffered temptation, or write home the welcome words, "Don't send the whisky."

Religious Intelligence.

Rev J. V. HUNTINGTON, who was formerly an Episcopal minister, but became one of the converts to Popery and a few years since returned [illegible] has asserted that [illegible] enjoy real fortification thus erected, and that their only service was in a fair field. The rebels have [illegible] at Corinth, Miss., [illegible] Memphis [illegible] our hands.

Dates from Fort Union, New Mexico, up to the [illegible] had been received at [illegible] Canby's [illegible] was still penned up in Fort Craig, but it was [illegible] Union to succor him. Albuquerque and [illegible] in possession of the rebels, and Fort [illegible] was [illegible] Fort Craig, [illegible] and three regular boats opened fire on the rebel floating [illegible] broke loose from its moorings, and floated down the river, considerably injured. Our fleet also threw several shells into the different batteries of the rebels, but with what effect is unknown.

A despatch from Fortress Monroe informs us that important military movements are taking place in that vicinity and that startling news may be expected at any hour. A large army having, as is well known, been gathered at that point, it is more than probable that a forward movement has taken place.

Governor Curtin has issued a general order, in which he compliments the two Pennsylvania regiments engaged in the battle of Winchester. The Governor says that their bearing during the trying moments of that day was worthy of the high reputation already won by Pennsylvania soldiers on the fields of Drainesville, Roanoke, and Newbern. "Winchester, 23d of March, 1862," is also ordered to be inscribed on the ensigns of the 84th and 110th Regiments.

A despatch from St. Louis states that General Steel's advanced guard had reached Pittman's Ferry, Arkansas, and that Colonel Carline had had a skirmish with the enemy, during which he captured five prisoners, and a lot of camp equipage and other spoils.

By order of the President, Secretary Stanton has issued a war bulletin, creating a new military department in that portion of Virginia and Maryland lying between the Mountain Department and the Blue Ridge. It has been called the Department of Shenandoah, and is placed under the jurisdiction of Major General Banks. That portion of Virginia east of the Blue Ridge, and west of the Potomac and of the Fredericksburg and Richmond Railroad, including the country between the Potomac and Patuxent rivers, has been made the Department of the Rappahannock, and the command of it has been assigned to Major General McDowell.

MONDAY.—From Fortress Monroe we have the information of a reported fight at Yorktown, in which direction heavy firing had been heard all day on Saturday. The Merrimac on Friday night was coaling up at the Norfolk Navy Yard, and was expected to come out on Saturday. Fort Macon still holds out, and extensive preparations for a siege were being made. A flag of truce has restored to loyal soil four gallant officers of the Union army. Two men claiming to be British subjects were [illegible] have been hung in Richmond last Friday for disloyalty, but a short respite was granted them. By an arrival from Newbern we are furnished with the current report that Burnside had been ordered to abandon that place within six days, and that he had answered the rebel commander by a promise to meet him at Goldsboro' and Raleigh.

Our gunboats on the Tennessee river have made another reconnoissance up stream as far as Florence, Alabama. They met with no resistance.

The news that the rebel battery at Island No. 10 had been disabled is confirmed by a later despatch One of our shells exploded directly within the battery, killing three men and so injuring the vessel that it drifted down the river helpless. A rebel battery opposite Point Pleasant opened fire on one of General Pope's batteries at that place, but was speedily silenced. The telegraph between New Madrid and Cairo has been cut in several places Gen. Pope threatens retaliation upon the residents along the route if the outrage is repeated.

There seems to be little doubt that Fort Pulaski, the principal fort on the Georgian coast, and one of the strongest in the country, is in possession of our forces The steamship Supply left Warraw Sound on the 30th ult., and heavy firing was then heard in the direction of the beleaguered fort, which was so surrounded by our batteries that its reduction was certain.

The news from General Banks' command is cheering. On Friday afternoon a rebel battery opened on the right wing of our forces at Edenburg. One of our batteries under command of Captain Huntingdon shelled the rebels from their position. The military force under Jackson is said to be in a spiritless condition, being composed mostly of impressed men, large numbers of whom refuse to fight the Federal troops

A letter from Nashville states the organization of a Union League in that city, and the arrest of the traitor Cheatham. A very general desire prevails to obtain information as to the success attending the efforts of our Government to restore constitutional law and liberty in Tennessee; and while a few doubt the final result, all attach much importance to the slightest indication pointing to its happy consummation.

General Wool has sent an important despatch, dated Fortress Monroe, Saturday, to Secretary Stanton, in which he states that firing has been heard in the direction of Yorktown. The Merrimac is in the dry-dock at Norfolk taking a supply of coal. Gen. Wool does not believe that McClellan's army will have a very formidable foe to contend with.

The New York World, in an extra issued on Saturday, states, as a piece of reliable information, that Beauregard's army at Corinth, Mississippi, has been outflanked, and that a considerable body of Federal troops is between it and Memphis, thus cutting off its communication and retreat. The news needs confirmation.

TUESDAY.—General McCLELLAN has telegraphed to the War Department that he had thoroughly examined the rebel fortifications, and found them very formidable, especially their water batteries.

A desperate battle is impending at Shiloh, [illegible] Point and a number of other places not named in the telegraph have been occupied by our forces.

General Wool says that there are 30,000 rebels behind the entrenchments, under the command of General Magruder.

Affairs on the Mississippi, in the neighborhood of Island No. 10, are coming to a decisive point. Two of our gunboats have run the rebel blockade, and arrived safely at New Madrid. A ferry-boat, also, has reached the same point by a new route around the swamps. Under cover of these, General Pope crossed the river and landed on the Tennessee shore.

The official despatch about the occupation of Washington, North Carolina, has been received.

When the Merrimac retired from the contest with the Monitor, she had seven feet of water in her hold.

Recruiting Stopped.—All officers engaged in the recruiting service have been ordered to their regiments, and notice given to the Governors of States that no new enlistments nor new levies will be received until further orders from the War Department.

The force now in the field is deemed amply sufficient for the suppression of the rebellion and the speedy termination of the war.

The Foreign News.—The steamer Hibernia, which arrived at Portland yesterday, brings us five days later news from Europe than previously received. The President's emancipation policy was still a fruitful theme for the comments of the English journals. The Daily News [illegible] the last Confederate message to the House of Representatives, while the Times continues to think that no practical use can be made of the proposition. Mr. Russell has another letter in the Times, in which he observes that the passage [illegible] Bridge was a splendid spectacle, and eulogizes McClellan for forming an army out of disorderly masses of men. The Spanish Government has ordered General Prim to [illegible] he enters the city of Mexico. Demonstrations in favor of Garibaldi [illegible] in different parts of Italy. The Greek insurrection is not yet quelled.

Island No. 10 Surrendered!—NEW YORK, April 8th.—We have information that Island No. 10 was surrendered at midnight last night, with all the men, transports, &c.

The Future.—"Ossessian-I" writes: "This is the week that many newly enemies age or utterly mar the Rebellion [illegible] land and our navies by sea will soon strike other and more effective blows. Gen. Wool tells the Secretary of War, in a public and printed despatch, that [illegible] the army of the Potomac will find many troops to contend with. From this, it is fair to assume that the rebels are now, and have been for some time, on the move, and that, on the arrival of our army at Norfolk, Richmond [illegible] their points heretofore supposed to be impregnable, the [illegible] will [illegible] general climax. It [illegible] and reposeful days [illegible] and vapourous dissipations [illegible] capture the rebel [illegible] of the Mississippi. On the [illegible] to let results speak for us [illegible] our military movements [illegible]

A Great Battle at Pittsburg Landing, Tenn.—[illegible] Landing, on Fort Henry, April 12th, a. m. [illegible] greatest and bloodiest battles [illegible] both morning. The battle lasted, without intermission, during the entire day, and was renewed on Monday morning, and continued undecided until 4 o'clock in the afternoon, when the enemy commenced to retreat, and are still flying towards Corinth, pursued by a large force of our cavalry.

We have taken a large amount of artillery, and [illegible] a number of prisoners. We lost a number [illegible] prisoners yesterday; among them is Gen. Prentiss. The number has not been ascertained yet, but is reported at several hundred. Gen Prentiss is reported wounded.

The loss on our side is estimated at from 5000 to 7000 killed and wounded. The rebel loss is twice that number.

Among the killed on the rebel side, is the General-in-Chief, General Albert Sidney Johnston, by a cannon ball, on the afternoon of Sabbath. It is further reported that Beauregard had his arm shot off

Thanks to the Almighty.—War Department, April 9th, 1862.—Order giving thanks for the recent great victories over rebels and traitors. Ordered,

First, That at meridian of the Sabbath next after the receipt of this order at each and every regimental [illegible] in the armies of the United States, there shall be offered by its Chaplain, a prayer giving thanks to the Lord of Hosts, for the recent manifestations of His power in the overthrow of the rebels and traitors, and invoking the continuance of His aid in delivering this Nation, by the arms of patriot soldiers, from the horrors of treason, rebellion and civil war.

Second, That the thanks and congratulations of the War Department are rendered to Major General Halleck for the signal ability and success that have distinguished all the military operations of his department, and for the spirit and courage manifested by the army under his command, under every hardship and against every odds, in attacking, pursuing and destroying the enemy wherever he could be found.

Third, That the thanks of the Department are also given to Generals Curtis and Sigel, and the officers and soldiers of their command, for the matchless gallantry at the bloody battle at Pea Ridge, and to Major Generals Grant and Buell, and their forces, for the glorious repulse of Beauregard at Pittsburg, in Tennessee, and to Major General Pope, and his officers and soldiers, for the bravery and skill displayed in their operations against the rebels and traitors entrenched at Island No. 10, on the Mississippi river. The daring courage, diligent prosecution, persistent valor, and military result of these achievements, are unsurpassed.

Fourth, That there shall this day be a salute of one hundred guns from the United States Arsenal at Washington, in honor of these great victories.

(Signed,) EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War

Foreign Summary.

Preparations of a very extensive character are making for the great Exhibition in London. Among the things to be exhibited, the Archbishop of Paris has lately had prepared a reliquary, which consists of one of the finest pieces of Parisian goldsmith work, containing the nails and pieces of the cross of the true Cross, brought from the Holy Land by St. Louis in 1254. Surely, such things would well grace the antiquary department of such an exhibition!

A MARRIAGE of considerable interest took place at Frankfort on Wednesday, the 12th of March. It was between Mlle. Adele de Rothschild and Baron Solomon de Rothschild. On the 13th the civil ceremony took place, and on the following day the religious part of it was performed at the synagogue—the Great Rabbi of the Consistory of Paris officiating. The Rothschild family, entire, from Paris, London, and Vienna, were all in attendance. Truly, riches were well represented on the occasion.

The exports from Great Britain to the United States have greatly fallen off during the past year. The official returns for 1861 show that while the United States was formerly England's best customer, it is now the fifth on the list, being exceeded by British India, Germany, Australia, and South America. This, no doubt, has much to do with any uneasiness and restiveness there is among business men on account of our national troubles. Interest often makes individuals and nations great lovers of peace.

Much has been said about Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, but the following statistics of his church in London for the past year are interesting. During the year, three hundred and ninety-seven persons were received by baptism, and forty-two by letter. Only fifty-eight were removed by death, dismission, expulsion, &c., and thus the real increase was three hundred and thirty-nine. The entire membership is one thousand nine hundred and twelve. Who is sufficient to take proper care of so many souls?

A good deal has been said about the practice of English Baptists on Communion. It is well known that Robert Hall and Baptist Noel have ever repudiated the principle of close communion. Rev. Dr. Perkins, a returned missionary from Persia, says, after spending half a year in England, on behalf of the Turkish Aid Society, and preaching often in Baptist churches, he was invariably invited on sacramental occasions to commune with them. This is far from the Baptist practice in the United States.

Great interest is taken in England in the Handel Festival, which is to be held in the Crystal Palace, Sydenham, London, in June next. There is to be a chorus of four thousand voices—and such is the desire to be sure of an attendance, there were £8,000 (or $40,000) worth of tickets sold on the first day the sale of them was open to the public. Oh! that multitudes were as ready to give for duty as for pleasure!

A wonderful, and, it may prove, a most important step has been taken by the Turkish Government. An order has been given to have all the libraries connected with the Mosques and other religious institutions carefully revised, systematized, and catalogued. In Constantinople there are about fifty of these libraries, founded long since in the most prosperous periods of Turkish history, and containing vast numbers of valuable and hitherto, probably, unexplored manuscripts of inconceivable value. Large results may flow from this step.

There is a strong tendency to Union among the different members of the Presbyterian family in Great Britain. This is seen, among other things, in the following statement, of a recent date:—"A united communion of members of the congregations belonging to the English Presbyterian and United Presbyterian bodies favorable to their union, took place on Saturday evening in Rev. Dr. Hamilton's church, Regent Square, London. The entire area of that spacious and elegant place of worship was allotted to communicants, and every seat was occupied. The gallery was for spectators. Of the ministers participating, there were three belonging to each denomination. Rev. Robert Redpath, of Wells Street Chapel, Dr. Archer, of Clerkenwell, and Dr. Edmund, of Islington, represented the United Presbyterians, and Rev. Dr. Hamilton, Rev. Mr. Chalmers, and Rev. Mr. Bannatyne, the English Presbyterians. Rev. Dr. Hamilton preached on Sabbath the ministers in London [illegible] to the movement exchanged pulpits."

Island No. 10—Storming of one of the Forts.—Washington, April 2.—The following official despatch has been received from Com. Foote.

U. S. STEAMER BENTON,
Off Island No. 10, April 2d, 1862.

Hon. Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy:

Last night an armed boat expedition was fitted out from the squadron and the land forces at this point, under command of Col. Roberts, of the 42d Illinois regiment. The five boats comprising the expedition were in charge of First Master J. V. Johnson, of the St. Louis, assisted by Fourth Master G. P. Lord, of the Benton; Fourth Master Pierce, of the Cincinnati; Fourth Master Morgan, of the Pittsburg, and Master's Mate Scanlin, of the Mound City—each with a boat's crew of twenty men from their respective vessels, carrying in all one hundred men, exclusive of the officers under the command of Col. Roberts.

At midnight the boats reached the upper or No. 1 Fort, and, pulling directly in its face, carried it, receiving only the harmless fire of two sentinels, who ran off, discharging their muskets, while the rebel troops in the vicinity rapidly retreated; whereupon Col. Roberts spiked the six guns mounted in the Fort, and retired with the boats uninjured.

The commanding officer represents all under his command, from their coolness and determination, as being [illegible] to perform more hazardous service, had it been required—the fulfilment of the object of the expedition.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, &c., your servant,

A. D. H. FOOTE, Flag Officer.

CAIRO, April 4.—This morning, the Benton, Cincinnati, and Pittsburg, with three mortar boats, opened, and continued for more than an hour a fire on the rebels' heavy floating battery at Island No. 10, when the latter, having received several shells from the rifled guns and mortars, cut loose from her moorings, and drifted two or three miles down the river.

Western Virginia in Favor of Gradual Emancipation.—Wheeling, April 3.—The vote in this city to-day gives 646 majority for the new Constitution, and a majority of 7888 in favor of gradual emancipation.

The interior counties, as far as heard from, give the same ratio.

The rebels are preparing, with tar and rosin, to burn Memphis when compelled to evacuate. The most prominent citizens of Memphis say they would yield forthwith, if assured of the safety of their property from confiscation by the United States Government.

Judge Ogden Edwards, a well-known citizen and jurist of New York, and a near relative of Aaron Burr, who was buried from his house, died on Tuesday, the 1st inst., at his residence on Staten Island, 81 years of age.

Gen. Geo. B. M'Clellan has been elected a corresponding member of the New York Historical Society.

The late somewhat eccentric, but clear-headed and able Col. Benton, of Missouri, is said to have warned the country, some years since, of Jefferson Davis, in the following language:—"He is a martinet, puffed up with West Point science, dogmatical and pragmatical within his circle; but that circle is a narrow one, and he moves uncontrolled within it. He is an avowed secessionist."

The well-known Parson Brownlow, as he is termed, having been driven by the enemies of the Union from his home in Knoxville, Tennessee, is now on his way northward, and Childs (late firm of Childs & Peterson,) has offered him $10,000 for his Autobiography.

Wendell Phillips, after lecturing in Philadelphia, Washington, and Pittsburgh, and some other places, in a greasy meeting in the open air, in the state of the country, was recently mobbed, chased, and driven out when attempting to deliver a lecture in Cincinnati.

M. Blondin, whose walking on single ropes and in most exposed positions, has caused much sensation in this country and abroad, has been in various parts of England, where he is said to have realised $150,000 from the witnesses of his performances.

Hon. T. S. Cooper died, April 4th, at his residence in Pittsburgh, Allegheny county. He formerly was a member of the present Congress from the 7th District

Col. Barksdale who was a recording delegate to the National Democratic Convention at Charleston, from Mississippi, is Colonel of the [illegible] from that State. His regiment is said to be [illegible] the first which deserted from Manassas Junction.

Chronicle of the Latest News. Tuesday.—The bombardment of Island No. 10 still continues. Significant movements of our forces have taken place in that quarter lately. Several boats have been sent down to General Pope at New Madrid. With these he is expected to cross the river and cut off the retreat of the rebels by land. Their retreat by water is an impossibility, so long as our troops hold possession of New Madrid and Point Pleasant. [illegible] to co-operate with the land forces. He is confident that he can in three hours drive the rebels from all of these batteries, as soon as the proper time shall arrive. Everything betokens a desperate conflict at Island No. 10.

We have news from Fortress Monroe that the rebels have fired several shots from Sewall's Point at our transports, but without doing any damage. A reconnoissance [illegible] Wednesday from Newport News, and a party of three thousand rebels, who endeavored to dispute the passage of the troops, were dispersed. The rebels have reoccupied Big Bethel. The Merrimac has not yet made her appearance, but [illegible] Savannah paper says that the battle of Pea Ridge was a severe disaster to their cause.

A number of refugees from Richmond [illegible] at Washington. All between the ages of eighteen and forty-five are being pressed into the rebel service, and gangs of men are [illegible] hunting for those who hide themselves to escape the draft. All the necessaries of life are selling at very high rate, and the people have commenced to eat [illegible]

PROGRESS IN AGRICULTURE

Maxwell's [illegible] and [illegible] gives the following amusing sketch of agriculture in Berkshire, Eng., at the present day, and what it may be in 1900

A. D. [illegible]

Come wife, 'tis time for we to rise,
The clock is striking five,
Be quick and get the taties fried:
Now do, lass, look alive.
I've got to put my barley in,
At know the first of May 'a come,
I don't know how I shall get on,
If many rainy days come.
I've got to cart out all my dung
And time to till the taties
The land's as wet as wet can be
How bothered my poor pate is!
There's Brisk and Boxer cruel galled,
And Tidy Mare is gripy;
And oats are down, and wheat's a'veiled,
And Roger's always sappy,
And all the sheep have got the scab,
And wool's a going down,
And I've to draw my produce in,
Vul fourteen miles to town.
And Lady-day's a'come and gone,
And I've not paid my rent yet.
And Bill, and Jan, and little Joe
He 'ain' to school been sent yet
Us can't get on if times don't mend—
Tis rely quite alarming:
I only wish my lease was out,
I'm sure I'd give up farming.

A. D. 1900.

Matilda! order chocolate,
It's nearly ten a'clock;
And getting up at half-past eight
Is really quite a shock.
I worked so hard till nine last night,
To prove that last analysis,
That, should my brain be farther tried,
I really fear paralysis
Well, I'll just take a quiet ride
James, bring my locomotive—
That half-horse power, with trotting spring,
Of health 'twill be promotive.
And, James, do fetch a gallon of Concentrated Thames water;
I'll just top dress my cucumbers—
Five acres and a quarter.
Well, here I'm back, I've been all round;
The farm is looking splendid.
What fools they were, some years ago,
To work as hard as men did!
I've heard my grandsire say, his dad
Met with some dreadful losses,
No wonder, when they used to work
With those great horrid horses.
And, James, just touch the telegraph
And bid my engineer
Turn out six dozen plows next week,
To get the breaches clear:
And tell Professor Farmby,
And my sub-chemist, Jones,
To forward, by next Monday's post,
Their last extract of bones
'Tis time I got my turnips in;
I should not like to mess it;
And as I've only one square mile,
There'll be enough to dress it.
And, James, do turn the battery on,
The wheat is just in flower,
And give it one galvanic shock.
It wants a gentle shower.
And syringe all the cabbage plants
With essence of guano;
And ask Miss Jane to milk the cows
With the new "vaccine piano."
And, James, fetch down my last balloon,
With speed-retarding crupper;
I'm going to Barnet fair to-day.
And shan't be back till supper.

WHY I GAVE UP SMOKING.

BY EBENEZER DAVIES.

Minister of the Caledonian Road Chapel, London, formerly a missionary in New Amsterdam, Berbice.

I was a smoker, and the son of a smoker. I began to smoke when I began to preach—that is, when about twenty years of age. Most of the preachers of my acquaintance did the same. I thought it preacherly to imitate them. I smoked during the time I was at college: that was contrary to the rule of the institution; but then the President was a smoker too. In after years, however, when we were having a friendly chat over our pipes, he positively and solemnly assured me that, if he had found me out, he would have expelled me from the College instanter! When about to sail as a Missionary to a distant land, I recollect having the honor and felicity of having, in a little room, not three miles from Paternoster Row, in London, a pipe with a Veteran in the service, whose praise was, and is, in all the churches. "A fine thing," said he, with a little Scotch accent, "is a Pipe of Tobacco in a hot climate. Let me recommend you, my young brother, to take with you a good stock of pipes and tobacco." You need not ask me whether I did so. In the course of time, however, when laboring as a missionary, I felt compelled, for the sake of example, to become a Teetotaller, and to throw myself heart and soul into the total abstinence movement; but, still adhering to the beloved pipe.

In a parcel of Ipswich Temperance Tracts, kindly sent me by R. D. Alexander, Esq.; was one headed, "Dost thou Smoke, Bill?" I read it and it made me feel uncomfortable. Some copies of it had got into circulation among my people before I was aware. A fine black young man came to me one day, and after bowing and scraping, and bidding me "good morning," "Will massa please gie me one leetle tract?"

"Yes, Quamina, and welcome; which will you have?"

"Dat tract called 'Dose you smoke, William?'" (He thought it would be too vulgar, in my presence, to say "Bill;" politeness led him to say "William.") I gave him the tract; but I felt I would rather he had asked for any other than that, and my uneasiness was increased. The tract was evidently exciting some attention. It was condemning, amongst the people, their pastor's habit.

One night, soon after Quamina's visit, having knocked out the ashes of my last pipe, before retiring to rest, a colloquy took place between my conscience and myself, of which the following is a faithful report:

Conscience. You have given up all intoxicating drinks, and you have done well. Why not give up that smoking too?

Myself. I cannot. It is a pleasant habit, to which I have been addicted for fifteen years

Conscience. Does it do you any real good?

Myself. I must confess that it does not.

Conscience. Is it not in a variety of ways positively injurious to you?

Myself. It is; both my judgment and my experience are against it.

Conscience. Do you not, at Temperance Meetings, feel that many of the arguments urged against the use of drinks tell with almost equal power against the use of tobacco?

Myself. I cannot deny that I do.

Conscience. How much have you spent on tobacco during the fifteen years that you have been a smoker?

Myself. Oh, not much; I never smoke cigars, except when some ship captain makes me a present of a few: they are otherwise too expensive; the pipe is much more economical.

Conscience. But how much has the pipe cost you since you became a preacher? Try to form an estimate Myself (after a long pause. The amount, I find, is larger than I thought it was; I cannot, however, exactly say how much it is.

Conscience. But I insist upon knowing. Honestly now, can it have been less, on an average, than two pounds a year, or thirty pounds in the fifteen years?

Myself. I believe that will be somewhere about it.

Conscience. And how much during the same period did you contribute directly toward the spread of the Gospel?

Myself. I really cannot tell; for I try not to let my left hand know what my right hand doeth

Conscience. Come, come, none of that cant and nonsense. I insist upon knowing. Call to mind your contributions, and give me some approximate idea.

Myself (after another long pause.) I believe about ten pounds.

Conscience (in a thundering voice.) What! only one-third of what you have spent upon tobacco!

Myself. Only one-third!

Conscience. And yet you are a minister of the Gospel!

Myself. Yes, I am.

Conscience. A missionary sent out to this distant land?

Myself. Yes.

Conscience. Supposed, of course, to be a very good man.

Myself. Yes.

Conscience. And your business as a missionary is to try to make these black and colored people around you good?

Myself. Yes

Conscience. You tell them that their money is not their own; and you urge them to deny themselves, and to make sacrifices, in order that they may be able to contribute towards the support and spread of the institutions of Christianity

Myself. I do

Conscience. You urge even the children not to spend their little [illegible] goos, sugar-canes, and mpeddlas, with other fruits and sweets but to give it to send the Gospel and to plant its institutions where they are not yet known?

Myself. I do

Conscience. A pretty fellow, then you are! During the time you have had the honor of being a minister of the gospel, you confess that you have yourself spent three times as much of God's money on that worthless weed, or rather that injurious poison, tobacco, as you have given for the spread of that glorious Gospel, which you call "Heaven's best boon to man!" And yet you have the face to call upon others to deny themselves for that purpose! Shame, shame upon you!

Myself. I am ashamed and confounded. I scarcely felt ever more despicable in my own eyes than I do at this moment. From this night forth, I vow that I will never spend another penny in tobacco.

Conscience. Good, good; stick to that, and you will be more worthy of your position and office

So ended the colloquy. Having asked God to forgive me the great sin of which I had been guilty, and to grant me grace and strength to carry out the resolve I had just made, I went to bed

The next day was the commencement of a great conflict. At the usual times for taking the pipe, the craving for it was very strong. I managed to resist it however by putting to myself a few simple questions, such as, "What is the matter with you? Why are you restless and unhappy? Have you a headache?" "No." "A toothache?" "No." "Have you pain in any part of your body?" "No." "Are you cold?" "No." "Hot?" "No." "Are you hungry?" "No." "Thirsty?" "No." "Then why, in the name of all that is rational, are you not contented, and even thankful to God for the exemption from pain which you enjoy?"

In this manner I lectured myself against the unnatural craving. Every time I resisted the appetite, I felt that I had achieved a victory; that I was rising higher in the scale of being; that my moral strength was augmented; that I was getting more into harmony with God's laws and my own conscience; and that my example, in regard to the youths of my congregation, was becoming more worthy of me as a Christian missionary and pastor. Ere long the craving ceased; the appetite died away; I was emancipated! And now I would not be again enslaved for "all the world calls good or great." Most devoutly do I thank God for my deliverance both from alcoholic drinks and from tobacco. Against them both I am determined to battle till I die.

THE CATS AND THE BUCKWHEAT CAKES.

Rev. Robert Boyd, of the Pittsburgh Conference, in his Personal Memoirs, just issued, narrates the following, pages 184–6:—"I recollect a sore, red-eyed woman, that wore an old hat, on the first circuit I travelled, who had prepared dinner before going to meeting at the old log schoolhouse. And as it was her purpose to bring the preacher home with her, even the buckwheat cakes were all baked, and set in what was called the stock-hole, in the back wall of her cabin chimney. As all had gone to meeting except the cats, when the door was opened the cats were seen helping themselves to the cakes. The old lady hallooed, 'Thise cats!' at the top of her voice, and then, in the way of heavy complaint, remarked that she believed they 'had the worst cats in all the country, for they wouldn't let any thing alone.' But as they only nibbled around the edges, and did not eat much, the old lady sprang around and got the cakes on a slab table, with some milk in hard-looking tins, and some butter on an old pewter plate, which reminded me of Joseph's coat of many colors. I managed so as to wait till some one took the top cake, on which the cats had sat, and in taking off another, I was careful to use only the middle part, leaving the edge part, marked with the cat's teeth, on my plate. I have often felt that it would have been a great relief if I could have kept away from such meals. And I only sat at these tables lest I should offend them by staying away. I frequently tried to talk about hunting or any thing that came to hand, in order to keep them from noticing how little I ate. Yet I often heard the wonder expressed, how it was that I looked so well and ate so little But they did not know that I sometimes had bread in my saddle-bags, which I used along the road, and drank pure water from the rocks instead of dirty milk."

THE COW

When George Stephenson, the celebrated Scotch Engineer, had completed his model of a locomotive, he presented himself before the British Parliament and asked for the attention and support of that body The grave M. P.'s looking sneeringly at his invention, said:

"So you have made a carriage to run only by steam, have you?"

"Yes, my lords."

"And you expect your carriage to run on parolled rails, so that it cannot get off, do you?"

"Yes, my lords."

"Well, now, Mr. Stephenson, let us show you how absurd your claim is. Suppose when your carriage is running upon those rails at the rate of twenty or thirty miles an hour, if you're extravagant enough to even suppose such a thing is possible, a cow should get in the way. You can't turn out for her—what then?"

"Then 'twill be bad for the cow, my lords"

PRINCE ALBERT AND LUTHER'S BIBLE

The late Prince consort once sent to the British Museum to borrow a copy of Martin Luther's Bible. A messenger was sent with it to the palace, and shown into a room where he saw the Queen and his Royal Highness engaged in the study of the Bible. The Prince, opening Luther's Bible, referred to a passage which had been the subject of investigation, and expressed his great satisfaction in finding his views supported by the text of Luther's Bible.

PRESENT TRIALS AND FINAL SALVATION

When all thy waves and storms are past,
Shall I, shall I be saved at last?
Then let my Lord conceal his face,
Withhold the knowledge of his grace
Leave me in doubts, in darkness leave,
But at the latest hour forgive.

Deliver from the wrath to come,
And scourge me, Saviour, to the tomb;
[illegible]
And weep in unrenewed [illegible]
But when my lying head I bow
Assure me then those tortures more

WESLEY.

Rev. J. W. Chadwick, Rector of the Church of the Epiphany, (Protestant Episcopal,) in this city, which was formerly under the pastoral care of the Rev. Dr Tyng, and afterwards of his lamented son, the Rev Dudley A. Tyng, has resigned the charge, stating, in his farewell discourse, he had been constrained to take this step on account of the persecution to which he had been subjected in the congregation because of his sentiments of loyalty to the Union.

CHARLIE LEE

BY M. P. H.

Did you ever know Charlie Lee? Perhaps not, but when I tell you about him, you will say, "I know a boy just like him."

Charlie is one of that class of boys, who always walk with a stoop in their shoulders, as though they were very tired, or just going to shiver with the cold, and who [illegible] they can hardly lift them at all, and whose hands, if they have any, are put carefully away in their pockets. They get rid of all the "chores" at home, and all the lessons at school, if possible, and always "fish" their sums from the other boys' slates, when they can. The boys call them "lazy," but as that is not very elegant, we do not like to repeat it No one thinks them very manly, however, and you never hear people say, "that boy will be the Governor some day."

Charlie Lee got sadly punished last winter for his disposition to get away from a little extra labor. As he learned nothing at home, his mother sent him away to boarding school.

It was the last day of the quarter, and the boys were to have three days' vacation between the terms. Of course they were not to go home for so short a time, but the skating, sliding, and fort building they had planned for those three days was enough to last all winter.

They had put their books away, and were waiting to be dismissed. The teacher's bell called their attention, and after thanking them for their diligence and good behavior, Mr. Percy said—

"There is one exercise more I am very anxious to give you before we close the term, but my time is all gone now, and I see no other way than to borrow some of yours. Of course you need not give it to me unless you choose, but if you will come to the school-room as usual to-morrow morning, I shall be very much obliged."

Now that was a disappointment, wasn't it, to boys who had almost put on their skates the night beforehand? But boys know what is right, and they generally mean to do it too. They knew that Mr. Percy had been trying to make their time pass happily, as well as profitably, all winter, and they at once agreed to do as he desired,—all but Charlie Lee

He knew what Mr. Percy wanted—it was that hateful algebra review. It was bad enough to study when they were obliged to. They needn't go unless they chose, and for his part he didn't choose to.

The next morning Charlie kept out of sight. The others all assembled in the school-room, with slates and algebras, for they too had "guessed" what their extra task was to be.

"Now the first thing to be done," said Mr. Percy, "is to get your coats and caps, and come with me to the front door"

Their surprise was only equalled by their haste to obey this unexpected order. There stood a sleigh large enough to hold them all, with four horses attached.

"This is the exercise I meant for you," said Mr. Percy, "a ride to the city, and a day among the curiosities. But where is Charlie Lee?"

Charlie had hidden himself so effectually for fear of the algebra, that he was not to be found

They went without him. After a fine ride of ten miles, they reached the city, visited the museum, a fine panorama, and looked at other pleasant sights until they were tired, and then rode home again, to talk about their famous "extra exercise" the rest of the year—and they will not forget it the rest of their lives.

As for Charlie, he stayed at home, with the consolation of thinking that he "didn't choose too."

Mothers' Journal

THE "JUST AS I'VE A MIND TO."

I saw a tigress, a little while ago. She was in a cage gnawing a bone. A man put his umbrella against the bars of her den, and oh! how madly her eye glared. She showed her white teeth, growled, and sprang towards the man, in a way that made him start back in a hurry.

"Well," thought I, half aloud, "if you were loose, Mistress Tigress, and in the streets, I should not like to meet you. You'd make mince-meat of the boys and girls 'mazin' quick."

"But there is a creature as dangerous as the tigress, running loose among the children," whispered a friend at my elbow

"Ah!" cried I, looking around with surprise in my looks; "what is it?"

"The Just-as-I've-a-mind-to."

"The Just-as-I've-a-mind-to," mused I. "He's joking, I guess. And yet it seems to me I've heard that name before."

"Oh! I've got it! He means the spirit of willfulness and obstinacy which leads a boy or girl to despise good counsels, and to say, 'I'll do just as I've a mind to.' That's it. The Just-as-I've-a-mind-to is a tigress indeed. It destroys a great many children, certainly."

Then I thought of some things the Just-as-I've-a-mind-to had done. I remembered Will Crusty, who was sent to mill one day by his father with the horse and wagon. As he left the dooryard, his good father said:

"Will, don't ford the river to-day. The water is too high. Go round by the bridge."

Will cracked his whip, and drove off muttering; "I shall do just as I've a mind to about that, old gaffer," said Will

So he drove into the river at the ford. But the water was very high, the current was strong. The horse lost his foothold, and was carried into deep water. Will was frightened, and falling into the water, was carried over the mill-dam, and dashed to death among the rocks. The Just-as-I've-a-mind-to killed him as certainly as any loose tigress would have done. Children! beware of it!

HOME TRAINING

How important it is that parents should pay the greatest attention to the home-training of their children—to those tender plants which have been committed to their care to be nurtured for eternity.

Some parents think, that if they prepare their children for the Sabbath School, and send them there to be instructed by their teachers, that they have done their duty, and nothing more is necessary on their part But not so; first the parent, then the teacher; and if both would perform their duty faithfully, what a different world this would be!

The mother, in a special manner, exerts a mighty influence for weal or wo upon the future lives of her children. Think of the influence exerted upon the great artist West, by his mother, when he made use of such language as this, "It was my mother's kiss made me a painter;" and of the high estimation in which an eminent English Lord held his mother, when he said, "If the whole world were put into one scale, and my mother into the other, the world would kick the beam."

Parents, therefore, especially mothers, should train their children with the utmost care, so that when they arrive at the years of maturity, they will be able to use the language of the examples quoted above.

MINNIE

My Dear Children:—In your catechism you learn, that "Man's chief end is to glorify God," but have you carefully inquired what this means? If you have not, pause now, and reflect. Ask yourselves,—What am I doing to accomplish this, the great object in my creation? You must not think that it is time enough to begin to serve God when you are men and women; for then it may be too late. I will tell you some things that very little children can do to glorify God. They can sing His praise—when you are able to read to the Bible, you will find that God has said, "Whoso offereth praise glorifies me" "Obey your parents in all things; for this is well pleasing unto the Lord." "Putting away lying, speak every one truth to his neighbor" Keep holy the Sabbath day, remembering that it is the Lord's day, and that he has given you six other days to seek your own pleasure and speak your own words

Do not let evil companions draw you away, making you believe that you can glorify God or not, as you please; for if you are hard-hearted and rebellious, He will deal with you as he dealt with his people of old, and glorify himself in your destruction. He will make even the wrath of man to praise Him:

"The Lord preserves all who him love,
[illegible]
But he all those that wicked are [illegible]"

Rem

ONLY A LITTLE WAY.

There were two little boys who lived in one of our large cities. They had very kind parents, who had brought them up to love them and respect their commands as well as to love God. One day a regiment of soldiers was passing their house, with a fine band of music. These little boys were on the street, and they were so delighted with the music and the gay appearance of the soldiers that they followed them to the next street, contrary to the commands of their parents. When they got about a square from home, one said to the other, "Let us go to the next street, and then we will go back, and Pa and Ma will not miss us" The other agreed to this. Now observe, how the giving way just a little, leads on to give way a great deal. After they had gone past another street, they thought they might go a little farther. They were so much occupied in looking at the soldiers and listening to the music that they did not notice how far they were going from home, until they looked around and saw that the houses looked strange. They stopped and thought they would go back. So they started for home the way they thought they had come. But after walking a long distance, they did not come to any place which looked familiar to them. They would not ask the way home, as they were too proud to appear as if they did not know the city.

By this time it began to get dark, and they too late repented of their disobedience to the commands of their kind parents. After wandering around till night had fully set in, the younger one began to cry. This attracted some persons to ask them their names and where they lived; but they were so frightened they could not tell. Some kind person took them to the police telegraph station, where they were cared for, and where inquiries would likely be made for them.

In the mean time, their parents were very much alarmed about them. The father went to a telegraph station, and the officer there telegraphed to all the stations in the city, to know if two little boys had been found answering to the description given by their father. An answer came back that they were at such a station, in a distant part of the city. The father sent word home to their weeping mother, telling her they were safe and would soon be home, and then started off for them. Soon they were in their father's arms. And, oh! how glad they were to be safe in that father's arms once more. They resolved they would never again leave home without their parents' consent.

Dear children, obey your parents in all things, as they know what is best for you. See what trouble these little boys got into by this one act of disobedience. These little boys did just what we are all doing, when we disobey our Heavenly Father. When we do any thing wrong, we are disobeying Him, and we are going astray. The only way then is to go to Him, and he will receive us with open arms

THE BIRD'S MISSION

Too bad! too bad! pouted Annie, as she threw herself upon the grass in the garden, I wish Pa and Ma were so poor, that to procure a livelihood their tolls might prevent them from making such strict rules, or requiring me to live up to them; study six hours a day, and then washing and dressing is a duty every day to perform. What a luxury it would be not to be compelled to be so particular. While Annie sat complaining, a bird being in some way injured, had fallen, and now lay dying not far from her. Upon seeing it, she began saying, dear little bird, your parents do not chain you at home, [illegible] when they [illegible] with a mournful chirp, and limping to some water near, lowered its head and after drinking looked upwards, then falling back—died.

Annie, with a very sad countenance, brought the dead bird to show to her brother and mamma. Annie's mother being a good woman, improved the opportunity to teach her little girl how to be thankful. After this Annie became more thoughtful. What a little thing, only a drink of water, yet it seemed thankful, looking up to heaven in thanksgiving as it was received. This and many better thoughts passed through her mind, and her face burned with shame, that the tiny songster should become her teacher, and that its life had been sacrificed for her good. Then, Annie's eyes were raised upwards, and her humbled heart asked forgiveness for its unthankfulness.

Let us all strive to perform our mission as faithfully as the bird did, and like it evince willingly a thankful spirit, for even the least of the blessings we receive

MANUFACTURED FROM UNBOILED BONES

BY BAUGH & SONS,

Wholesale office and store, 20 N. Wharves, between Market and Chestnut Streets, Philadelphia

CASH PRICE $45 PER TWO POUNDS, 2½ CTS. PER POUND.

In the preparation of this valuable Manure BONES ARE USED IN THEIR RAW STATE ONLY. They have never been boiled or calcined. They are taken as nature has made them, crushed with powerful machinery, and subjected to a process by which we avail the virtue of the bone as contained in a Fertilizer by presenting it in a concentrated and soluble form, the two indispensable ingredients for the growth of Plants and reaching the soil, viz.: phosphoric acid and ammonia. These two ingredients, by the use of BAUGH'S RAW BONE SUPER-PHOSPHATE, are given to the soil in all their original strength and purity They assimilate at once with the soil, furnish all the essential ammonia for the growing crop giving it ample nourishment, and leave the land permanently benefited, so that its greatness can be traced for years afterwards.

Messrs Baugh & Sons: Gentlemen,—I have been using your article of Raw Phosphate on wheat and corn for several seasons, and can well attribute to it the value as an active and "paying" fertilizer I have applied it on wheat at the rate of 200 pounds per acre, alongside of a heavy coat of barnyard manure, kept by side and never, and the result was, that by harvest the wheat where the Phosphate was put, was much the better headed and heavier, while the grass was taken more strongly than on the other portion of the field. I have also used the Phosphate by the side of Peruvian Guano, each in the same quantity, and in regard to both grain and grass, the action of your preparation was much the more satisfactory On corn, my experience in its use has been that it pays well for its [illegible]

Messrs. Baugh & Sons:—Being anxious last season to test more properly manure offered for sale, I was induced by your agent to make a trial of three different kinds, which I did on wheat, side by side, in the same field. I purchased Peruvian Guano, Stone and Super-Phosphate of Lime (one of the most popular in use) together with your Raw Bone Super-Phosphate, and used them as above stated. During the growing, as well as the gathering of the crop, the test resulted [illegible] My in favor of the latter

But whether it is from the mode and care in preparing, or in the superior quality of the material used in your Raw Bone Super-Phosphate, I am unable to say; however, I have [illegible] most [illegible] of my friends, thinking that others may be induced to make similar experiments, and in my opinion, greatly to the agricultural interests of the whole country

Baugh & Sons: Gentlemen,—Having used your Super Phosphate, bought of [illegible] W. Christman at the Montgomery Agricultural Store, on wheat and corn, I can with pleasure recommend it. The effect it produced was remarkable [illegible] on wheat, as also on the corn, it was very perceptible [illegible] wheat, but was decided in the general appearance of the field was fully equal to the [illegible], which had a heavy coat of barn yard manure. Where it was applied on the corn, I can safely say the yield was fully 4 bbls

C. F. Holzer's Improved Original Gas Saving Regulator.

C. WILSON FOSS AND WM. D. REICHNER,

PATENTEES, MANUFACTURERS, AND PROPRIETORS

No. 104 N. Tenth St., above Arch, Philadelphia.

This superior Regulator and Economizer of gas is so simple and practically effective in its operation that it at once commended itself to the hearty approval of many scientific and practical gentlemen of this city and elsewhere. The great advantages of this invention over all others is, that its operative principle, a sealed spring which accommodates motion to the street pressure, being connected with a brass tube, it is fully protected from the corrosive and injurious effects of the gas, and, therefore, is not liable to get out of order—its working is ever perfect, securing to the consumer a saving of gas, from 20 to 50 per cent. with a cleaner, more pleasant and steady light free from all the noisy flaring of other irregularities of the flame, affording a soft, mellow light, far less hurtful, and more

NONE BUT THEE.

BY GIO. B. GRANT.

Whom have I in heaven but Thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside Thee.—Psa. lxxiii. 25.

Lord of earth! thy forming hand
Well this beauteous frame hath planned,
Woods that wave, and hills that tower,
Ocean rolling in his power;
All that strikes the eye unsought,
All that charms the lonely thought;
Friendship—gem transcending price;
Love—a flower from Paradise;
Yet amid this scene so fair,
Should I cease thy smile to share,
What were all its joys to me?
Whom have I on earth but thee?

Lord of heaven! beyond our sight
Rolls a world of purer light;
There, in love's undecided reign,
Parted hands shall clasp again,
Martyrs there, and prophets high,
Bless—a glorious company;
While immortal music rings
From unnumbered seraph strings.
O! that world is passing fair:
Yet if thou were absent there,
What were all its joys to me?
Whom have I in heaven but thee?

Lord of earth and heaven! my breast
Seeks in thee its only rest:
I was lost! thy accents mild
Homeward lured thy wandering child;
I was blind! thy healing ray
Charmed the long eclipse away,
Source of every joy I know,
Bless of my every wo,
O, if once thy smile divine
Ceased upon my soul to shine,
What were earth or heaven to me?
Whom have I in each but thee?

THE RESURRECTION.

The greatest event of the Christian year, is celebrated in the noble extract beneath. Poetic genius cannot work more worthily than by adorning, glorifying, and applying to human experience, the simple but glorious texts of the everlasting Gospel.

[illegible] xxiv. 1-6.—new xx. 1-18.

Methought—(it was the midnight of my soul,
Dead midnight,) that I stood on Calvary;
I found the cross, but not the Christ. The whole
Of heaven was dark: and I went bitterly
Weeping, because I found him not. Methought—
(It was the twilight of the dawn and mist,)
I stood before the sepulchre of Christ:
The sepulchre was vacant, void of aught,

Saving the sere-clothes of the grave, which were
Upsiden straight and empty: bitterly
Weeping I stood, because I an even there
I found him. There a voice spake unto me,
"Whom seekest thou? Why is thy heart dismayed?
Jesus of Nazareth, he is not here:
Behold, the Lord is risen. Be of cheer;
Approach, behold the place where he was laid."

And while he spake, the sunrise smote the world.
"Go forth, as I tell thy brethren," spake the voice,
"The Lord is risen." Suddenly unfurled,
The whole unclouded Orient did rejoice
In glory. Wherefore should I mourn that here
My heart feels vacant of what most it needs?
Christ is arisen!—the sere-clothes and the weeds
That wrapped him lying in the sepulchre

Of earth, he hath abandoned; being gone
Back into heaven, where we too must turn
Our gaze to find him. Fear, O risen Sun
Of Righteousness, the light for which I yearn,
Upon the darkness of this mortal hour.
This tract of night in which I walk forlorn.
Behold, the night is now far spent. The morn
Breaks, breaking from afar through a night showers.

THE POSITION OF ENGLAND.

BRITISH AND AMERICAN VIEWS.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—The enclosed is clipped from the Edinburgh Weekly Scotsman. We send it to you with the request that you will give it a place in the INSTRUCTOR.

We do this because of several articles which have appeared of late in your columns, censuring, in bitter terms, Great Britain in reference to the position she has taken in relation to the American Civil War, and attaching to her the most unworthy motives.

Such uncalled for vituperation may please a party who can see nothing good nor great over which the American eagle does not float. At least, such uncalled for fault-finding is calculated to engender bad feeling at a time when the bonds of friendship should be strengthened. Indeed, we would like to know what the British Government could, in honor, do, which they have not done in reference to your national troubles. If British sympathy, as alleged, be with the South, what power on earth could prevent the practical manifestation of such by acknowledging the Southern Confederacy, breaking up the blockade, and consequently concluding the war in favor of the South?

Though a British subject and living on British soil, I am actuated by no bad feelings in these remarks. My whole sympathy is with the North, and my prayer is that she may never lay down her arms till Slavery shall no longer lift its monster head under the stripes and stars of liberty.

Yours, fraternally,

ROBERT WILSON

ON BEHALF OF CANADA

"Dr. Guthrie began by defending in a humorous strain his presence as a Christian minister at such a meeting, more than one minister [illegible] upon him [illegible] entering the; he was Angus born, Angus bred, and had an Angus tongue to his head, and that he thought he was in his proper place wherever he could do good, whether by preventing dissipation, and keeping lads and lasses in good order, as at Bigger Fair, where he could contribute to the pleasant, innocent, or profitable spending of an evening among such a highly respectable assembly as he saw around him. (Applause.) The Rev Doctor then announced Commerce as the theme, and proceeded to deliver a lengthened, and often humorous and anecdotical address, from which we make the following extract:

AMERICAN AFFAIRS.

"I [illegible] at the present time; but, at the same time, while I know many excellent Americans for whom I have the highest esteem, while I know there [illegible] to which I do not [illegible] in Christendom has such missionaries as the American churches have—I am bound to say that our friends across the Atlantic—our cousins over the great lake pond, as they call it—[illegible] vain. (A laugh.) There was a pride and haughtiness—for I have met them—and an assumption about our friends in America that I must say, while it is very ridiculous, was very intolerable. Just think of a people that had four millions of their fellow-creatures in chains—four millions of human beings in chains!—and sell them by the pound. I saw a gentleman who was in the Southern States not very long ago, and who told me he was present at a slave auction; and I said to him "What did you see, Sir?" "Why," he said, "I saw a beautiful boy of twelve years of age, put on the auction block, and on one side of him stood an old gray-headed negro—it was plain he was his father—and he kept his eyes on the boy, and the boy kept his eyes upon the old gray-headed man, and the tears rolled in silence down the cheeks of each. On the other side of him stood a ruffian with manacles." Near beside us there stood a little lady, very little either by me or by the speaker, and I shall never forget the flash of her eye, or the clench of her hand, when she looked up to this tall traveller, as he told of the manacles, and said, "Did you not knock him down, Sir?" I felt that it was the voice of nature. Well, I say for a country such as that to talk of itself as standing in the van of freedom—in the van of freedom!—and waving over four millions in chains the vaunted flag with the motto, "All men are born free!" is not that a mockery? (Applause.) After all, I am not sorry that the wind is going to be taken out of them. (Laughter.) There was a friend of mine who, talking of another man who was rather vain, said, "Oh, he is a mere windbag." Now, I must say our friends in America are rather like a windbag—(laughter)—but I am sorry that it should be the knife that is being used to take the wind out of them. I am sorry it should be taken out in such a way; nevertheless I am bound to say, in regard to that country now learning the evils of war, that there was a haughty insolence about these men that was really intolerable. (A laugh.) And what vanity was that that made them think—and I read the American newspapers every week—what intolerable vanity is that that makes them think we are envious of them, and makes them say we are now rejoicing in their disasters, because we are jealous of their Republican liberty? Envious of them! (with great irony,) envious of them! Britons are envious of none. (Applause.) We have no cause to be envious. We have a Sovereign enthroned in the hearts of her people—(loud applause)—with whose tears we have mingled our own, and who has mingled her tears with those of the poor bereaved widows of the Hartley Colliery. (Renewed applause.) And I venture to say, if American or Frenchman, or any man, dared to touch a hair of Queen Victoria's head there are ten thousand thousand arms would rise up in Britain to defend her. (Great applause.) Well, we have a Sovereign enthroned in the affections of her people. We have a Parliament—I don't say the Parliament always behaves as well as it should do—(laughter)—but considering all things it does marvellously well, and, on the whole, reflects the mind of the public. Then, we have a free press, and then we have free tongues; and we have no tarring nor feathering in our country. (Laughter.) The only use we make of feathers is to make soft pillows, and the only use we make of tar is to pitch the bottoms of our ships. We never put it into men in that way, whatever we do in other ways. (Laughter.) We have no cause to be envious of any country; and I take this opportunity of saying that our friends in America are labouring under the greatest of all possible delusions in fancying that we rejoice in their disasters or are in any way envious of them. (Hear, hear.) If people do rejoice, I am sure they do not rejoice in their disasters, but I am free to confess that we do like to see a vain people a little humbled. Nobody likes pride. I hate ecclesiastical pride; I hate national pride; and above all things I hate purse pride. There is a word for you, merchants of Dundee. (Laughter.) Well, you know we do not object much to see the pride a little taken out of people just as you see a man come strutting down the streets of Dundee tailored to the top of the fashion, smiling by everybody as if they were the dirt on his feet, and treating the earth as if it was beneath his notice, carrying his head as high as if there was nothing below the stars worthy of his notice, when by comes a gust of wind and carries off his hat—(laughter)—and his wig, too. (Renewed laughter.) Then he scuds away, not under bare poles, but under a bare poll—(great laughter)—in pursuit of his hat. Now, really you cannot hinder the people to laugh. (Laughter.) I do not blame them for laughing; I laugh myself, and the more proud the man was, I laugh the more. And then the laugh did him so [illegible] the man gets up to the hat, and just when he is about to grasp it, the hat—oh, that wicked hat—(laughter,—as if it had a pleasure in making a fool of him, starts off on a new journey and goes rolling away into the mud, until the man has not one cover either for his head or for his confusion. (Laughter.) You see we all like to see pride taken down a little. But, with regard to America, God grant that the troubles of that country be soon over! We have no hatred towards America; I am sure it would be well for Dundee if peace were restored in that country; and God grant that it may be soon. But I heartily say that I for one would say "No peace" so long as there is slavery in America. Slavery in America! God send no peace till that evil, that cancer, is thrust out of their land! I have no hesitation in saying that; but I hope in God's blessed providence that the grand result of these troubles will be freedom to the slave. We have heard of fasts in America—the last I went President Lincoln to proclaim is that fast which God says he hath chosen, "to break the bonds of wickedness, and to let the oppressed go free." (Loud applause.)

MERCY

A brother in Canada has sent us an extract from a lecture delivered by Dr. Guthrie in Dundee, in which he professes to give the British feeling towards us in our present trials. While we differ very widely with both the speaker and the sender, yet we are willing to let them be heard, believing that it is generally best to hear both sides of every question.

Our good brother takes the INSTRUCTOR pretty sharply to task, for its "censuring, in bitter terms, Great Britain," in "uncalled for vituperation," in "uncalled for fault-finding," and asks "to know what the British Government could in honor do, which they have not done in reference to your national troubles," and strongly intimates that we may consider ourselves very fortunate that Great Britain has been so generous as not to exert her unbridled power in "breaking up the blockade, and concluding the war in favor of the South."

Now to all this we answer, that while the mass of the Irish, and many good people in England and Scotland feel sincere sympathies with us in our present troubles, and we are grateful therefor, yet we do believe and affirm that the British Government and the lords and moneyed aristocracy from which that Government draws its inspirations, has been and still is against us, and we therefore have expected nothing for us, and been restrained from doing anything against us upon the ground of nonintervention, as the best they could do under the circumstances. Last May, when [illegible] rallied haste she recognized the Southern Confederacy as a belligerent power, and ever since has given moral aid to the South by the proclamation of her ministers in Parliament and out of Parliament, that secession is a permanent thing, and that the North [illegible]

With human tribunals there is many a slip by which the guilty is cleared. Can you hope to escape condemnation at the white throne of God upon any such plea as this?

Do you hope to escape the trial? Many a defaulter has pounced upon a treasure of gold and absconded to some foreign land, where he has eluded his pursuers. The murderer has often wandered a fugitive and a vagabond on the earth, without being caught. In the black and dark night, many a libertine has gratified his lust, and never been overtaken by justice at the hand of man. But can you so escape with God? Can you elude his grasp? Can you baffle his detectives? What wilderness will afford you an asylum? What ship of Tarshish will convey you beyond his reach? "Whither," says the Psalmist, "whither shall I go from thy Spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there: if I make my bed in hell, behold thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning and dwell to the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand hold me."—(Psalm cxxxix 7-10.) "Though they dig into hell, thence shall my hand take them," saith the Lord. "Though they climb up to heaven, thence will I bring them down; and though they hide themselves in the top of Carmel, I will search and take them out thence; and though they be hid from my sight in the bottom of the sea, thence will I command the serpent, and he shall bite them."—Amos ix 2-3.

Do you hope to clear [illegible] the lawyers? In this way man often escape from justice at a human tribunal. Human laws are necessarily somewhat imperfect and skilful advocates avail themselves of those imperfections, and so clear their clients. Cases are continually occurring where the culprit escapes through a defect in the charge made against him, or a failure of the written law to cover his case. His lawyer readily discovers the loophole, and sends the transgressor, through it, away from the grasp of justice.

Do you hope thus to be acquitted? Who will be your advocate at the bar of God? Who will point out some flaw in the indictment, some technicality, some oversight on the part of the officers of justice, or some failure of the law to meet the exact case, by means of which you can be cleared? Satan would doubtless make a good attorney, but all his wiles would be of no avail. Christ is an advocate with the Father, knows the law, and has a right to plead at that tribunal; but not a word will he utter in behalf of the impenitent. Those who believe, have him as their advocate, and have the assurance that he will leave them fully acquitted; but the unbelievers know that Christ will testify against them, and confound and overwhelm them with everlasting shame and contempt!

Will you escape [illegible] want of proof? Often, in the administration of justice upon earth it happens that the transgressor is brought before the bar, and duly charged with his guilt, yet no one can certainly testify to the facts. The deed has been done, but it was secretly, or those who are acquainted with it are unknown, or if they enter into court, testify falsely, and so although the man is guilty, he goes unpunished for want of proof. Some thought of this kind takes possession of the sinner's mind, in reference to his condemnation before God. He flatters himself that his wickedness will never be known. "They slay the widow and the fatherless, yet they say, The Lord shall not see, neither shall the God of Jacob regard it." See, also, Ps cxxxix. 1-5, and 11, 12.

Well proof of your guilt be wanting? Some [illegible] especially not [illegible] your conscience will [illegible] you. Like [illegible] with worn [illegible] the wedding garment, you will be speechless. All your secret acts will stand out as if written in letters of light. The human mind is indeed so constructed, that it may need no other witness against itself. We forget, sometimes, that we have sinned, but who has not had his sin recalled by some unlooked for event, and that suddenly, as in the twinkling of an eye? You hear a child warned against lying, and instantly a scene of the kind, committed, perhaps, fifty years ago, leaps before your eyes more vividly than ever. A single word in praise of the honor and happiness of chastity, has not the utmost forgotten effect of early life before the mind and recall the [illegible] and feel anew the vileness of [illegible] be that every sin is recorded as with the point of a diamond, in a rock for ever. Take the case of a drunkard for the sake of illustration. You may have some reason to suspect him of tippling, you go to him and inquire about it but he protests his innocence. Time rolls on and the man's face proclaims unmistakably his guilt. The unnatural redness, the bloated cheek, the "rum blossom," (those signals of distress that are hung out upon his face,) and tell to every intelligent beholder that the man is a confirmed drunkard. Anything [illegible] man in a chemical room, working with a certain kind of liquid, saw his employer absent, went to a drawer and took out some money. His employer charged him with the theft, but the young man, as is generally the case, denied it, thus adding sin to sin. "Look here," said his master, "were you not the only person who has been working in this liquid?" "Yes, sir," said the thief. "Now look, here are the proofs of your guilt. On this drawer are the marks of the liquid, which at first is invisible, but after drying can be seen." The young man saw that he was caught in a trap that he had unconsciously set with his own hands. So it may be that we are all recording in some way every evil deed. But, be this as it may, we have to deal with an omniscient God, who knows the law and [illegible] and will [illegible] Away, then, with the thought, that there will be no proof of our sins.

Do you hope to [illegible] the judge? The guilty have often been cleared through the perverting influences of money. Will you, my guilty reader, approach the burning throne of God with a bag of gold in your hand? Will you get some influential friend to slip into the pocket of the judge a reward for your clearance? How will you manage this matter? How much gold and silver would be necessary to bribe God? How will you get it quietly sent to the judge?

Or, after all, do you hope to [illegible] of the sentence? The guilty have many a time been condemned, but the [illegible] of the law have been unable to carry out the sentence, and the [illegible] Shall you [illegible] Almighty shall contend with [illegible] Dost [illegible] like him? He [illegible] There is none that shall let it." "Ah [illegible] behold thou hast [illegible] earth by the great power and [illegible] hand for thee!

Mere [illegible] like panelling [illegible] recesses and elevations, and ensembles [illegible] of devotion. But coming lower down, [illegible] beneficial; it rouses the circulation [illegible] mination around. Does a lazy man [illegible] Does a milk and water character [illegible] a stirring note? Never. Song is [illegible] of mental and physical activity, and both by its exercise. No child has [illegible] a religious education who has not [illegible] it to sing the song of Zion. No

CAN THE GUILTY BE CLEARED!

The encouragement in the proclamation of Jehovah's name, (Exodus xxxiv. 6, 7,) is as strong as the penitent sinner can possibly desire. "And the Lord passed by before him, and proclaimed, The Jehovah, the Jehovah God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, and transgression and sin." Here God is revealed as the self-existent and independent One, He "who is, and who was, and who is to come, the Almighty;" and consequently also the eternal, immutable and infinitely perfect God. He is also revealed especially as the God of pardons, waiting to be gracious, having exhaustless stores of blessing, able to bestow mercy on thousands of thousands, and to forgive all the various descriptions of sin. If, therefore, it be possible for divine language to give hope to the anxious inquirer, he certainly may find it in these precious words. [illegible] Hebrew who had been dancing and shouting around the calf of gold, when stricken with terror for his sins, was hereby warranted to approach the Lord in the full assurance of faith, [illegible] needed that He who had spoken such words concerning himself, would not despise the sacrifice of a broken heart and a [illegible]

But [illegible] by the eye of the Lord, in the clefts of Sinai, does not reveal God as indifferent to sin, or as giving any encouragement to the transgressor to continue his sinful [illegible] in the way of the sin [illegible] God yet countenance is given to his perverse [illegible] in wrong. The voice [illegible] tudes on the plain, was [illegible] of your work it [illegible] whatsoever, that [illegible] had, and that [illegible] would regard [illegible] falsely sworn [illegible] Law [illegible] the peaks of [illegible] things, and even [illegible] might trample it under their foot as an unmeaning thing. To give the law with so much solemnity, and then to encourage its transgression, is a [illegible]

"And that will by no means clear the [illegible]

This does not mean that every [illegible] doomed to suffer the penalty of his [illegible] would be to render the mercy of [illegible] in the foregoing words, a dead [illegible]

OUR FORERUNNER

It is not in every one who [illegible] us to any place that we can recognize a forerunner. Enoch and Elijah went before us unobserved, but though we might infer [illegible] we could not [illegible] the certainty that [illegible] Nor when [illegible] other [illegible] we [illegible] enter [illegible] us, but they did not [illegible] our [illegible] runners, enter "for us."

A forerunner is one who goes before to some specified place, in order to prepare the way and arrange certain important matters for others who are to come after him. It is a great pleasure to the traveller, especially if in lands foreign and remote, to know that some dear friend has even preceded him, and looked upon the scenes on which he is now, for the first time, gazing as he follows on. And this pleasure is, of course, greatly enhanced if he knows that this friend is now in the distant, and, to him, new and strange place whither he also journeys, "for him," preparing [illegible] and happiness when he shall arrive. If the journey is long and difficult, and beset with perils and trials, it renders the preparation made along the journey, as well as at the journeys' end, so much the more welcome.

Never can the writer forget the emotions of a little band of travellers, to which he was attached, on a journey to the earthly Jerusalem. It was in the midst of wars and tumults that convulsed the land. The "Holy City," toward which we bent our pilgrim steps, was wholly new and strange to us all, and, to some of our company at least, the toil, anxiety, and difficulty encountered in reaching it would have proved a [illegible] rence, had it not been for one delightful considera tion. Very dear friends had gone on before us to prepare, so far as they could, the way for us; [illegible] And when worn with the toils of the way, we at last approached as near to the city as to descry its [illegible] battlements and towers, and especially, when our dear friends came forth from the gates to meet us, and congratulate us, and accompany us, amid rejoicings, to the "place prepared" for us "within," we had, perhaps, the best illustration we could have of what is meant by a forerunner, and especially a forerunner to the heavenly Jerusalem. And it was with a meaning that looked beyond the now and the present, that [illegible] us, after escaping from the scenes of war and [illegible] were [illegible] as we entered the city-gates, "Peace be within thy walls and prosperity within thy [illegible] For my brethren's and companions' sakes I will now say, Peace be within you."

How delightful it is to the Christian pilgrim, amid the toils and [illegible] of his journey homeward, to know that a forerunner has gone before him on purpose to make preparation for his coming. "I go to prepare a place for you, that where I am there ye may be also." "Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the vail, whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus."

Jesus, our forerunner in heaven, is our forerunner on the way and through all the way that leads to heaven. We are prone to feel that, in some of our earthly experience, the path by which we go is one which has never before been trodden. But we are mistaken. Jesus is familiar with the path, and, so far as was best in the circumstances, he prepared and smoothed the way for us when he passed over it. This is especially true of the dark valley and shadow of death. If, after traversing the wilderness, he had leaped over Jordan's flood without descending into the valley; or if, like Elijah, he had ascended to heaven in a chariot of fire without dying, then indeed would he not be our forerunner in one essential respect. It might be well with us even then, if we did but once enter the gates of heaven. But, alas, we never should enter there. We should perish in our struggle with death at the very threshold. We should not envy, like Bunyan's Pilgrim, think of a road to cross the dark valley, but we should, on the contrary, dread it. But if, when we enter it, we find that Jesus has been there before us, and prepared the way, slaying its giants and changing them all to terror or despair; oh, how it will lift the cloud, and let in light even upon the gloomy [illegible] Then should we pass "within the vail," whither he has also gone, and where he waits to welcome us. He has gone before us to take possession of glory in our name, and in our behalf. From the moment of his entrance there, on his return from the victories of his earthly career, he raised the banners of his redeeming cross upon the battlements of heaven, as the signal of triumph and of welcome to his redeemed people who, on their way heavenward, might [illegible] from afar. Oh, should not they, who are called on for their forerunner, rejoice to be [illegible] And should they not press on [illegible] words the Lord [illegible] "whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus."

SPRING WORK.

At length, the long dreary winter is gone! Spring with its resurrection and life has come. All nature shows signs of renewed and exulting joy. Life glows in every sunbeam and waves in every breeze. Man catches the universal inspiration and his dwelling, garden and grounds, feel its reviving touch. Decay, deformity and death, disappear, and freshness, beauty, and purity, give to home and its surroundings the air and sweetness of spring. Even childhood lends its willing hand in the general renewal, too happy to bear the humblest part in this work of love.

When all nature puts on her beautiful garments, and the abode, even of the poorest, receives the touch alike of hammer and of brush, should not the sanctuary of the Christian share the common renewal? This is the proper season for the adornment of the sanctuary and the improvement of its sacred grounds. And yet, in how many places is this manifest duty neglected until spring and summer have passed away. Shame, that [illegible] christians, are content to [illegible] with broken windows, dingy walls, [illegible] roofs and most forbidding [illegible] they dwell in ceiled houses, and shrubbery and flowers must charm to [illegible] Verily, we might not go [illegible] call together [illegible] without delay attend [illegible] work, we add a few words [illegible]

2 One thing is greatly needed in many country and village churches. It is blinds for the [illegible] These [illegible] some hour his fervid rays [illegible] now mainly innocent of shades. Could not the [illegible] They can if they will. They will, if they are asked. Let them then by all means be [illegible] and in a short time this want will be supplied.

3 We come to the surroundings of [illegible] nary. If it stands bare and treeless, for sweet [illegible] sake, plant at once some fine shade trees. The locust, the maple, the linden, the pine, and the elm, are excellent varieties. Take young and vigorous trees with strong roots, and plant them deep with a [illegible] ground and they will seldom fail. Then, protect them with frames, that horses may not be tied to them nor cattle destroy them. Some sanctuaries are also surrounded by great banks of clay from the foundations. Let these be so graded that the water will be carried away from the building and [illegible] the whole be well raked and sodded or sown in grass. If the enclosure will permit, plant more shrubbery around the church. Train an ivy or prairie rose over the doorway and let the house of God, like your own dwelling, be "a thing of beauty" amid the beautiful works and wonders of God's hand.

5. The Cemetery, or "sleeping place" of the departed, should not longer be neglected. Let the briers be rooted out; the enclosure be repaired and the walks be nicely cleaned. To our mind, the most forbidding places on earth are the "graveyards" of some churches. They are Aceldamas, places of skulls, or more literally yards full of graves. Brambles and thorns are the only friendly plants they contain, for they, in some measure, at least, hide their deformity. The [illegible] places [illegible] certainly be made attractive to the living. Shrubbery and flowers—fit emblems of the resurrection, should grow and blossom amid the graves of the quiet sleepers. [illegible] where but little attention has been paid to the arrangement of the cemetery and the [illegible] are [illegible] buried, the present [illegible] appear [illegible] burying ground may be changed by the planting of a few trees and the laying out of some simple walks. Let this at least be done under the direction of the council, and an invitation be extended to all who have friends, to aid in this work. The grave will then be a favored spot not only to the dead, but to the living, who will go there to meditate and pray.

We have confined ourselves wholly to the outward business of the house of God, but mean not that the spiritual interests are of secondary importance. The very reverse is what we insist upon, and these outward things are mainly important because of their intimate connection with the higher ends of the Lord's house and of His worship. They are means to this end, and because of this, they ought not to be neglected. Let them, then, be vigorously prosecuted and the good effects will soon be manifest in many ways.

HINTS TO CONTRIBUTORS.

In the treatment of every contribution the real interests of editor and writer are absolutely the same, and any antagonism is merely traditional, like the supposed hostility between France and England, or between England and Slavery. No editor can ever afford the rejection of a good thing, and no author the publication of a bad one. The only difficulty lies in drawing the line. Were all offered manuscripts unequivocally good or bad, there would be no great trouble; it is the vast range of mediocrity which perplexes: the majority are too bad for blessing and too good for banning; so that no conceivable reason can be given for either fate, save that upon the destiny of any single one may hang that of a hundred others just like it. But whatever be the standard fixed, it is equally for the interest of all concerned that it be enforced without flinching.

Nor is there the slightest foundation for the supposed editorial prejudice against new or obscure contributors. On the contrary, every editor is always hungering and thirsting after novelties. To take the lead in bringing forward a new genius is as fascinating a privilege as that of the physician who boasted to Sir Henry Halford of having been the first man to discover the Asiatic cholera and to communicate it to the public.

Do not despise any honest propitiation, however small, in dealing with your editor. Look to the physical aspect of your manuscript, and prepare your pages as neatly that it shall allure instead of repelling. Use good pens, black ink, nice white paper, and plenty of it. Do not emulate "paper sparing Pope," whose chaotic manuscript of the "Iliad," written chiefly on the backs of old letters, remains in the British Museum. If your document be slovenly, the presumption is that its literary execution is the same. Pope to the contrary notwithstanding. An editor's eye becomes carnal, and is easily attracted by a comely outside. If you really wish to obtain his good will for your production, do not first tax his time for deciphering it, say more than in visiting a millionaire to solicit a loan you would begin by asking him to pay for the hire of the carriage which takes you to his door.

On the same principle, send your composition in such a shape that it shall not need the sight of a literary reason before printing. Many a bright production dies discarded which might have been made thoroughly presentable by a single day's labor of a competent scholar in simply smoothing, dovetailing and retrenching. The reason seems so slight an affair that the aspirant cannot conceive why there should be so much fuss about it.

"The piece, you think, is incorrect; why, take it.

I'm all submission: what you'd have it, make it."

But to discharge that friendly office no universal genius is enlarged, and for intellect in the rough there is no market.

CAPTAIN SMITH AND POCAHONTAS.

There is no doubt what the Muse of History ought to do, after the saving of Smith's life by Pocahontas, were she a dame of proper sensibilities: she would have Mr. John Smith married to Miss P. Powhatan as soon as a parson could be got from Jamestown. Were it a romance, this would be the result. As it is, we find Smith going off to England in two years, and living unmarried until his death; and Pocahontas married to the Englishman John Rolfe, for reasons of state, we fear,—a link of friendship between the Reds and the Whites being thought desirable. She was of course Christianized and baptized, as any one may see by Chapman's picture in the Rotunda at Washington, unless Zouave criticism has demolished it. Immediately she went with her husband to England. At Brentford, where she was staying, Captain John Smith went to visit her. Their meeting was significant and affecting. "After a modest salutation, without uttering a word, she turned away and hid her face as if displeased." She remained thus motionless for two or three hours. Who can know what struggles passed through the heart of the Indian bride at this moment,—emotions doubly unutterable to this untaught stranger? It seems that she had been deceived by Rolfe and his friends into thinking that Smith was dead, under the conviction that she could not be induced to marry him, if she thought Smith alive. After her long, sad silence, before mentioned, she came forward to Smith and touchingly reminded him [illegible] company, of the kindness she had shown him [illegible] her own country, saying, "You did promise Powhatan what was yours should be his and he like to you; you called him [illegible] reason so I must call you." After a pause during which she seemed to be under the influence of strong emotion, she said, "I am no more your Father, and you shall call me child [illegible] Then she added, slowly and with [illegible] "They did tell us alway you were dead. I have no other till I come to Plimouth." [illegible] after this interview that Pocahontas died [illegible]

THE CHRISTIAN FAMILY LIFE.

(From the German of Thiersch.)

BY REV. C. A. WENZEL.

The Creator has established laws and ordinances for the moral as well as for the natural world by which each is supported and within whose appointed limits each is developed. But whilst nature follows its appointed course by necessity, that pointed out by the moral law, is only to be entered upon and followed by freedom of choice. Yet they are as unalterably fixed in the one, as in the other, and assert their authority in spite of apparent hinderances. Unalterable as the course of the stars, is the Divine plan according to which mankind—the moral cosmos—must shape its course. The principles regulating it are as far from consisting in mere words, or dead letters, as are those forces which move the heavens and regulate the motions of the spheres. It is just when man imagines himself in a condition to dispense with moral laws, that he becomes conscious of their reality; they possess the power of protecting and conferring blessings upon those who obey, as well as of destroying and annihilating those who resist them.

As the creative word and the creative act—for both are one and the same—have continued to operate upon and uphold all things to this day, even so will the word and act which established human relationships continue to operate upon them for ever.

Of all such institutions, the family is the most ancient and comprehensive. Its fundamental laws, fidelity, love, devotion and obedience, form the strongest and most indestructible foundations of human happiness. Blessing and prosperity are inseparably connected with them, and it is only by holding fast to these, that moral development and an advancement towards perfection is possible. Man may indeed weaken the ministry ties that bind him here, but he can never rend them asunder; should he attempt it, he will, to his own hurt, discover their strength. He may mar and impair these relationships—yes, and indeed in the progress of human depravity every thing has been done to unsettle them, yet we find everywhere and at all times the original institution and appointment in force. It asserts and maintains its influence in a threefold manner; first, as a wonderful and lasting supporter of whatever is good, even in the worst of times; second, as a curse to whoever attempts to destroy it; and lastly, when after having for a long time been misunderstood and obscured, by reasserting its power, triumphing anew in the consciousness of man, reaching its fullest realization and even presenting a more sublime and glorious aspect than at first appeared.

Who does not know, that such is, in truth, the history of every Divine institution with which man has anciently been intrusted? They have been neglected, misunderstood, profaned. Yet nevertheless standing their indelible, sacred character was preserved, the possibility of their restoration remained, and God ultimately vindicates his own. What had been forgotten and appeared to be only destroyed, He will again bring to light and cause it to work more gloriously than before.

Such has also been the case with the marriage and the family institution. Its organization in paradise was followed by its decay, brought about by the darkness of heathenism and the hard-heartedness of the Jews; this was again followed by its restoration and high elevation in the Christian church. After this renewed organization it has been again disfigured and debased by man, but Christ's Spirit, who is ever present in the Christian church, is ever active in opposing this perversion, and in striving to bring about a perfect realization of this Divine moral ideal.

DOUBTING CHRISTIANS ENCOURAGED.

Remember, doubting Christian, the Lord's Supper [illegible] If your penitence for sin is not deep enough, this is the place to have it deepened. The more strikingly the sufferings of our Lord appear to us, the more awful does sin appear, which caused Him all that suffering. Deep sorrow for sin is an invariable effect of partaking of the Lord's Supper, except where it is done in a careless or indifferent spirit. If your faith is weak, what can strengthen it more than the ordinance that tells of blood [illegible] and shed for you, for the remission of sins? And are you in any Christian duty or ordinance, no matter what is the defect in your Christian character, this is one of the means appointed to have that deficiency supplied; and, therefore, the greater your wants, the more reason there is for you to be at the Lord's table.

In a word, there is but one course for a professing Christian to pursue in this matter. If you go there in the midst of your sins, impenitent and careless, you add to your sins by making an unholy use of a most holy ordinance. If you stay away because of your sins, in place of your sins occasioning your absence, your absence will only increase your sins. What then shall you do? Go; but go aright. You have taken hold of the plough, and you dare not look back. "The gifts and calling of God are without repentance." Confess your sins to God, and forsake them. Go on your knees to Jesus, and give yourself to Him. In the secret of your closet, swear your allegiance to Him anew, and thereby gain His friendship and love, and you may find at the coming communion, although you are the most unworthy of all servants, that you have become the beloved disciple who shall lean on his breast at the Supper.

CHRIST IN SCRIPTURE.

What more glorious truth can possibly remain concealed in the Scriptures, now that the seals have been broken, and the stone is rolled from the door of the sepulchre, and the transcendent mystery has gone forth,—Christ the Son of God became a man, God is Three in One, Christ has suffered for us, and will reign for us for ever and ever? Verily, these things are universally known and spread abroad. But take Christ from the Scriptures, and what will you find in them more?

Rev. [illegible], in charge

NOTICE

Protracted meeting, held at Zion Mission Church, by Stephen Smith, minister in charge, closed 14th instant after a gracious outpouring of the Spirit of Christ. Thirty-two professed to find an interest in the blood of Christ, and twenty-one attached themselves to said Church

Quarterly meeting will take place at said Church, on the 19th and 20th instants.

APPOINTMENTS

Sunday morning, thanksgiving sermon, minister in charge. Afternoon, Rev. Joshua Woodlin. At night, stranger from the West.

ADDRESS TO STEWARDS

The Stewards of each Circuit and Station in the Philadelphia and New England districts are recommended to meet at the close of the Conference year, for the purpose of furnishing the Annual Conference a correct account of the moneys collected during the year for the Preachers, Bishops, Book Concern, Conference, &c Otherwise, let them forward the different amounts collected in each circuit or in each station to the recording Steward, and he forward to the Annual Conference a condensed account of moneys and other matters that are of interest to the circuit or station. If such a course is adopted, it will give great satisfaction to the Annual Conference, and will be of benefit to the Circuits and stations in general. I hope this will be strictly attended to, both in the Philadelphia and New England districts

A MAN OF WORTH.

Our esteemed Editor and General Book Steward, Rev. E. Weaver, departed from his comfortable residence and interesting family, on Thursday, the 10th, for the Ohio Conferences. The weather was quite unfavorable, and the face of nature presented a Winter appearance. Many would have waited for the genial rays of the sun to carry off the immense quantity of frozen rain, which the heavens poured down on the previous Tuesday and Wednesday, but my brother's high regard to a faithful discharge of duty compelled him to pursue a long and tedious journey. We learn that he has suffered a slight affliction, doubtless the result of taking cold. I can truthfully say, that Brother Weaver seems to be one of the few ministers of Christ, who are willing to sacrifice time, money, health, and comforts of home upon the high altar of faithfulness to God and the church. May the Lord prosper his labors, and long preserve his life for future usefulness. Such men are of real worth. I am grateful for the expression of respect, or flattering compliment of being called upon to render my services during his absence to this well-conducted organ of the church; but deeply regret that I am inadequate for the task.

PROCLAMATION OF THE PRESIDENT ON THE RECENT VICTORIES

By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION

It has pleased Almighty God to vouchsafe signal victories to the land and naval forces engaged in suppressing an internal rebellion, and at the same time to avert from our country the dangers of foreign intervention and invasion.

It is, therefore, recommended to the people of the United States, that at their next weekly assemblages in their accustomed places of public worship, which shall occur after the notice of this proclamation shall have been received, they especially acknowledge and render thanks to our Heavenly Father for these inestimable blessings; that they then and there implore spiritual consolations in behalf of all who have been brought into affliction by the casualties and calamities of sedition and civil war, and that they reverently invoke the Divine guidance for our National councils, so that they may speedily result in the restoration of peace, harmony, and unity throughout our borders, and hasten the establishment of fraternal relations among all the countries of the earth.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the great seal of the United States to be affixed.

[L. S.] Done at the City of Washington, this, the 10th day of April, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty two, and of the Independence of the United States the eighty sixth

William H. Seward, Secretary of State.

GOOD FRIDAY AND EASTER

On the 18th and 20th inst., we have the return of two great days of festivity for the Christian church. The former called Good Friday, or the day on which the crucifixion and death of our Lord Jesus Christ is commemorated. The latter called Easter, which is held sacred by true Christians in commemoration of His resurrection. To understand the obligation Christians are under to observe these festivals, we have but to notice the great importance of the objects or events commemorated.

The first event—namely, the death of our Lord, is of vital importance to the world of mankind, and especially to believers in Christ, who partake of its benefits. Our Saviour, by His death, purchased redemption for the world. On that memorable Friday, eighteen centuries ago, He gave himself up willingly to be lifted on the cross, that He might draw all men unto Him.

"He was wounded for our transgressions. He was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was laid upon Him; and by His stripes" all that believe "are healed." He chose the wide world for His hospital, and all men for His patients: none are excluded from the benefits of His death, saving those who wilfully refuse it.

The second great event—namely, the resurrection of Christ, is of no less importance While the first laid the foundation, the second built the superstructure of that doctrine, which is the grand centre of the Christian system. The doctrine of Christ's resurrection is the grand pivot upon which the Christian religion is suspended; If the doctrine be true, Christianity rises, but if the doctrine be erroneous, Christianity falls. "If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain." But if Christ be risen, then they who believe in Him may enjoy peace and pardon, happiness and heaven.

Hence, our personal safety obligates us to keep in remembrance the death and resurrection of the "once crucified, dead and buried." but now arisen and ascended Saviour. "By which," saith Paul to the Corinthians, "ye are saved if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you, unless ye have believed in vain. For I delivered unto you first of all, that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures; and that He was buried, and that He rose again the third day according to the Scriptures," &c.

It is evident from Biblical authority, that festivals among the Jews to perpetuate the memory of great events were numerous, and the manner of their celebration or observance various. Among the chief, held yearly, was the Passover in memory of their departure out of Egypt; the feast of Pentecost in memory of the law given to Moses on Mt. Sinai, of which we cannot now particularly speak

We believe, however, that the most acceptable and profitable manner of observing the two great Christian Festivals is by true devotion to God, in the form of humiliation, fasting, and prayer on Good Friday, and by praise and thanksgiving on Easter Sunday.

TWO CENT MONEY.

We call the special attention of the brethren to page 219, New Discipline, in relation to the two-cent money, and especially to the 16th paragraph under the same page. We do hope that all of our brethren having charge of circuits and stations will obey the General Conference of our beloved Zion, and commence in time to collect their two-cent money; and if the brethren have so far obeyed the law by making a collection every month, or every two months, we are quite sure that there will be a change in matters pertaining to our financial department. Suppose that Bethel Church, of Philadelphia, with over twelve hundred members, (we will say twelve hundred, though there is said to be some fifteen hundred,) should comply with the request; twenty-five times twelve would be three hundred (dollars,)—and this, it will be remembered, is only twenty-five cents a head. At the very lowest estimate, this is what Bethel Church will owe us at our Annual Conference

The Union Church, placing the membership at two hundred, at twenty-five cents each, will be fifty dollars. Baltimore (Md.) Bethel Church has about twelve hundred members; suppose that she is exceedingly dicker duty [illegible] should feel it his duty to see that each member pays his or her twenty-five cents per year; there would be three hundred dollars due the Book Steward, to be appropriated as per Discipline. Ebenezer Church has at least two hundred members, and twenty-five times two hundred is fifty dollars.

Now here would be seven hundred dollars,—leaving out Washington, New York, Brooklyn, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Louisville, Indianapolis, Chicago, and St. Louis, and besides hundreds of churches on circuits, and other stations where brethren are. If brethren will only do what the regulations of the Church have demanded of them, all would be well. We believe that there is not a member in our Church but what would consider it a great insult to say that they were too poor to pay the small sum of twenty-five cents a year for the benefit of the Book Concern and of our brethren who have labored hard to carry the glad tidings of the gospel to the dying world.

ERRATA IN BISHOP PAYNE'S REJOINER

On the third column, eleven lines from the bottom, read "A righteous man sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not"

In the same column, four and five lines from the bottom, read, "To be born in America or England is accidental to manhood."

There is great difference between a religious man and a righteous man. A religious man may do many bad things; a righteous man will not do any. Then there is also great difference between manhood and mankind. All of Adam's children are mankind, but all of them do not possess manhood, in the technical or specific sense of the word, especially in the sense employed by [illegible]

ERRATA.

The article, entitled "Bishop Payne's rejoinder to Bishop Nazrey" found in the last [illegible] contains the following sentence:

"The second proof is the fact, that you are now, by one or more of your presbyters, using Bishop Greene for Episcopal jurisdiction in the M. E. Church." This sentence, as printed, I find is destitute of the meaning intended by the original. My pressing duties and brevity of [illegible] undetected, while examining the proof sheet. The word "using" should have been "suing"

FROM RAHWAY, N. J.

April 1st, 1862.

Rev. Sir: Allow me to mark the columns of the Recorder with matters in fine among our people in the Mount Paran A. M. E. Church, in this city, of the A. M. E. connexion in the United States of America. The good Lord is in mercy still visiting his people in spirit—convincing, convicting, converting, and building up in the faith of the gospel his people—and sinners are still inquiring the way to Zion; they are standing in the path to see, and are inquiring for the old way. [illegible] has been one of pleasure, amid trial, temptation and sorrow; but out of all the Lord has saved us thus far. We look forward to a better day Brethren, pray for us.

We have had a concert here for the benefit of the church on the night of the 31st of March, given by the choir of our church, which is, I believe, the best in the State that is amidst our Church now, and, with due attention to the arts of the musical world, and a continued onward [illegible] was bestowed upon me. They gave full satisfaction to the audience; the house was filled, and, in proof of their skill, they were much, very much, applauded; and, since, the great subject of the citizens is, of the able manner in which they performed. We were assisted by the citizens in the monetary direction. Mr. U. M. Osborn had published for us the placard of the concert—Mr. J. I. Woodruff furnished us with a melodeon—Mr. A. Peppenser presided at the melodeon very efficiently—Mr. Elias Brokaw, one of our young men, obtained for the occasion four flags; to them were sung the Star Spangled Banner with pleasantry. The audience, all together, joined in full chorus, then ending with claps, stamps, and laughter.

We realized quite a neat sum.

We have caught the thief at last that has run at large so long among us here. We sent officer Try in pursuit, who arrested him. We have court-martialled and arraigned him before Judges Necessity and Will. The counsel employed was Importance and Study. The counsel thought he ought to hang, but the Judge's decision is, that he go to jail, and there remain, looking out of his prison house's dark cell, and reflect during life

"IS OUR CHURCH EPISCOPAL?"

BY SACER.

An article, smooth in style, and lucid in expression, thus entitled, appears in the April number of the Repository. This article attempts to answer the question, "Is our Church Episcopal?" affirmatively and unqualifiedly. Want of space will not allow a systematic consideration and refutation of the arguments contained therein.

The real spirit, genius and tendency of Methodism—its nature and design, is certainly not taken cognizance of in this article; and is either not well understood by the writer, or is not considered important to his purpose. Our Church, the African A. M. E. Church, and the M. E. Church, are not Episcopal in a Roman Catholic sense, nor in a Protestant Episcopal sense. The very idea at which the article swells with "holy" indignation is the one which is carried out in the Methodist Episcopal Church form of government, i. e., uniting in one the Presbyterian and Episcopal economy, embracing the advantages of each, and rejecting that which is superfluous and detrimental—most especially that absurd humbug, "Apostolic Succession," which runs through the Protestant Episcopal Church to the Romish line, and thence back to St. Peter. This "succession" is too rotten for us to have any affinity with. The article, in imitation of the deep-toned mutterings of an affrighted English Archbishop, as he beholds the "audacity" of a dissenting preacher in preaching the gospel and converting souls to God, says: "The doctrine of co-existent equality of Bishops and Presbyters in a church Episcopally constituted is damnable." (Have some mercy.) We reply that ministerial parity of Bishops and Presbyters, or Elders, is the acknowledged doctrine of the A. M. E. and M. E. Churches, and of the Wesleyan Church in England; and upon the ground of this parity we have a "succession" as truly and scripturally as any other Episcopal Church on earth.

The article then goes on farther to give forth terrible warnings to those who travel the road of the "two (antagonistic?) systems"—i. e., Episcopal and Presbyterian. Well, as the writer would not be surprised at veterans of many a well-fought battle-field laughing at a recent West Point Graduate's [illegible] warnings about the exercise of certain military tactics they had chosen, he need not be surprised if his warnings against the votaries of Methodism, as generally received, should only give rise to a little mirth.

To use the language of the article, it is truly "palatable to the taste, and pleasing to the prospect of a disloyal and delinquent elder, that, besides Conference authority, there is no Episcopal jurisdiction to whom he is amenable, as his office as Elder is equal to that of Bishop." To use Elder Campbell's phrase, "that is the true state of the case." He is amenable for his moral, official and religious character to none on earth but the Annual Conference. The Bishop cannot reprove, suspend, or expel any preacher, except by and with the consent of the Annual Conference; outside of the meeting of that body, he can exercise no more authority over a preacher than a layman can, except in special cases made and provided by the proper judicatories of said Church. However great his moral power may be, his legal power, outside of the Conference, amounts to nothing.

This is palatable, not only to "disloyal and delinquent Elders," but to all men who desire to stand upon their own official merits: one man may err in judgment, but it is not so likely that a large number should be thus liable while acting in concert.

The admission of the doctrine of ministerial parity of Bishops and Elders does not, as the article states, "degrade every deacon to the rank of a layman" If a deacon be but a layman in the Presbyterian Church, does it follow that he is the same with us, because we regard Presbyters or Elders the highest order of ministry known in the New Testament? Not so! If I build one story of my house like my neighbor's, does it follow that I build all the stories like his?

With much apparent force, the question is asked in the article, "Whence the necessity of a [illegible]" He reply, there is no actual necessity for such consecration, and without a triple consecration there is power to ordain as [illegible] as the New Testament declares. The recognition of this third order, like all other corruptions and abuses, fastened itself upon the Church almost imperceptibly, and by slow degrees. The power to ordain is a delegated power, and, if granted to [illegible] depend. The importance of training the infant mind is gaining more and more attention; Infant schools have been established, teachers of liberal education and of enlarged views, who love the employment, are devoting their time and talent to the cause We have teachers among us who are fully competent and capable of imparting instruction to the uneducated, teachers who have made it their study to communicate knowledge in the most easy, natural, and endearing manner, and they endeavor to prepare their scholars for usefulness in this life, and for happiness and glory in the next. Alas! some parents are satisfied with [illegible] are complacent, and while they are anxious to provide these for their children, they too often neglect their immortal souls. In conclusion I will briefly remark, I have taught in the State of Pennsylvania, but for the last seven years my field of instruction has been in this State, New Jersey, viz.: Camden, Woodbury, Dutchtown, and Hushtown, Salem Co., which is quite a remote town. But intelligence brightly displays itself there The rising generation are improving rapidly, means are given to us, and are to be faithfully used by us. The success is all of God to bring forth fruit some thirty, some sixty, and some a hundred fold

W. T. S. VS. JAMES LYNCH.

Mr. Editor:—Over the initial signature of the plaintiff in your issue of April 12th, in an article charging "a distinguished clergyman of the A. M. E. Church" with plagiarism. That "distinguished clergyman" is the undersigned—James Lynch, of Georgetown, D. C. Being brought before the bar of public opinion, I want to have the indictment correct—with the right name; therefore, I would have inserted, James Lynch, instead of "distinguished clergyman." The defendant goes before the Philadelphia Literati, and the rest of creation, on the following plea: I do not now, nor did I ever own, or have for my use, any book entitled "Stephani's narrative." That I should think and express the same thoughts in the same way, is beyond a possibility.

The article written for the issue of the Recorder of September 21st, 1861 was sent off hastily. Rummaging among my compositions, essays, &c., prepared, read, and delivered in school-boy days, I found an essay prepared for the "Philadelphian" Society of K. W. A. Academy, in the state of New Hampshire, of which academy and society I was a member, between the ages of thirteen and sixteen years. Having but little confidence in myself at that time—the youngest student in the Academy, the youngest member of the society—I remember on two or three occasions, I did get a fellow student to prepare essays for me, when appointed by the society to write. He was in the habit of so doing for the students, and made money by it. His plan was to write it for you, allow you to copy it, and then retain the original himself, that there might be no positive evidence against him. That he drew largely upon rare works, considering the great number of essays he wrote, is not improbable.

I recopied this essay "Ancient Greece," written when I was but fourteen years old, which is nine years ago, and sent it to the Recorder last September, spending no thought about it at that time. Admitting the truth of the statement of W. T. S.—for we would not think him a falsifier—we trust this explanation will prove satisfactory. Why W. T. S. waited so long before he made the charge I cannot say. Of this, however, I will not complain. As for myself, I ask leniency and favor from no one. With charity commended to my race, and for any fate, I go before the world on the honesty of my intentions, and my own merit great or small.

While I do not choose for myself the lofty position of literary censor, where I will have nothing to do but find fault with others and their productions, I expect to think for the good of my race and to express [illegible] inviting the dissecting implements of criticism, and bidding defiance to any obstruction they may oppose.

Some men are like buzzards. This bird flies through the air, over a field. In this field may be the golden wheat ready for the scythe, the fruit trees laden with precious fruit, or any of nature's choicest gifts; the buzzard sees them not. But let a dead chicken or pig be in the fence corner, this bird will fly over this field most seven months, if necessary, until it could get a chance to fly up in the air with it, so that all might see it. That these buzzards are necessary evils we may admit, but we do not think their position enviable.

THE SUBJECT OF EDUCATION

Woodbury, N. J., Gloucester Co., March 12, 1862

There is yet room for discussion upon the subject, "How should a Christian mother educate her children;" much depends upon maternal education, for instance; Cornelia taking upon her the care of her family, and the education of her children, distinguished herself by her modesty, magnanimity, and maternal influence and affection. Her two sons she brought up with such care that though they were, without dispute, of the noblest family, and had the best natural dispositions of any of the Romans, yet they seemed to owe their eminent virtues more to their education than to their birth. I must here remark, the day-star of truth has risen upon our world, and opened to our view a standard of moral excellence such as heathens never dreamed of. A Christian mother instructs her family thus, that pride, the strongbold of a heathen's virtue, has been discovered to be a soul-destroying sin, the very sin that drove angels from heaven, and man from paradise. Do we act as consistently as heathens did, teaching them that all the attainments and all the knowledge in the world were a dear-bought purchase at the expense of one right feeling, of one solid Christian virtue? Let every one who reads this watch the movements of their own hearts, and judge of the fact; the nature of this seed is but too well proved by the harvest it produces. To the gifted we may say, make use, by assiduity, of what you possess, and to those who are less endowed make amends, la pars versare, for what you have not gained, and gradual culture must bring it to perfection. I ask a question; should parents, Christian [illegible] entirely out of their own hands—ought this to be the case? parents of pleasure, parents of fashion, I fear cannot do otherwise; parents will be held accountable for the education of their children, and they are bound to bring them up in the fear [illegible] bound to regard, because he is a party to such delegation of authority; it is a mere human arrangement. Bishops have no more Scriptural right to ordain their Elders—only, Elders enter into an arrangement by which the power of granting orders is delegated to some one or more of their number.

It is beyond a doubt that the terms, Elder and Bishop, are applied to the same person in the New Testament. The government of the Methodist Episcopal Church seems to have been framed for the rapid spread of our Saviour's Gospel. Its founders cared more for vital piety than for creeds; more for men's souls than splendid churches and lordly hierarchies. Therefore, the highest honor known to the Church—the highest office, is, that which results from the high commission, "Go ye into all the world and preach my Gospel"—not sit down and wait for a snug church and congregation, but go! to the burning shores of Africa!—to Asia!—the Isles of the Sea!—to California! regardless of self or friends.

W. T. S. VS. JAMES LYNCH.

Mr. Editor:—Over the initial signature of the plaintiff in your issue of April 12th, in an article charging "a distinguished clergyman of the A. M. E. Church" with plagiarism. That "distinguished clergyman" is the undersigned—James Lynch, of Georgetown, D. C. Being brought before the bar of public opinion, I want to have the indictment correct—with the right name; therefore, I would have inserted, James Lynch, instead of "distinguished clergyman." The defendant goes before the Philadelphia Literati, and the rest of creation, on the following plea: I do not now, nor did I ever own, or have for my use, any book entitled "Stephani's narrative." That I should think and express the same thoughts in the same way, is beyond a possibility.

The article written for the issue of the Recorder of September 21st, 1861 was sent off hastily. Rummaging among my compositions, essays, &c., prepared, read, and delivered in school-boy days, I found an essay prepared for the "Philadelphian" Society of K. W. A. Academy, in the state of New Hampshire, of which academy and society I was a member, between the ages of thirteen and sixteen years. Having but little confidence in myself at that time—the youngest student in the Academy, the youngest member of the society—I remember on two or three occasions, I did get a fellow student to prepare essays for me, when appointed by the society to write. He was in the habit of so doing for the students, and made money by it. His plan was to write it for you, allow you to copy it, and then retain the original himself, that there might be no positive evidence against him. That he drew largely upon rare works, considering the great number of essays he wrote, is not improbable.

I recopied this essay "Ancient Greece," written when I was but fourteen years old, which is nine years ago, and sent it to the Recorder last September, spending no thought about it at that time. The importance of training the infant mind is gaining more and more attention; Infant schools have been established, teachers of liberal education and of enlarged views, who love the employment, are devoting their time and talent to the cause We have teachers among us who are fully competent and capable of imparting instruction to the uneducated, teachers who have made it their study to communicate knowledge in the most easy, natural, and endearing manner, and they endeavor to prepare their scholars for usefulness in this life, and for happiness and glory in the next. Alas! some parents are satisfied with [illegible] are complacent, and while they are anxious to provide these for their children, they too often neglect their immortal souls. In conclusion I will briefly remark, I have taught in the State of Pennsylvania, but for the last seven years my field of instruction has been in this State, New Jersey, viz.: Camden, Woodbury, Dutchtown, and Hushtown, Salem Co., which is quite a remote town. But intelligence brightly displays itself there Ten rising generation are improving rapidly, means are given to us, and are to be faithfully used by us. THE BISHOP'S QUESTION

We think this question has been amply discussed on both sides, at least both sides have had a hearing in the columns of the Recorder, and the parties have arrived at no better understanding The farther agitation of the question in the public print can answer in no way any practical good. I think the editor of the Recorder would serve the best interests of the Church by refusing to publish any more articles on the subject, and I am certain in this he will be seconded by all the subscribers in Philadelphia, for we are heartily tired of hearing the question debated. The paper is losing subscribers by it.

LECTURES BY JOHN S. ROCK, ESQ

The citizens of Philadelphia have recently been favored with a visit from John S. Rock, Esq., the distinguished colored orator and lawyer, of Boston. During his short stay he gratified a wish long cherished by them to hear one or two of his popular lectures. Last week he spoke in the scientific library course of the Institute for colored youth, to a very full audience. His theme was, "The Character and Writings of Madame de Staël." The address itself was one befitting the place and the audience: it was chaste, accurate, scholarly, and marked with exceeding good taste But the address of this visit was given at Sansom St. Hall, on Monday evening. That large and fashionable Hall was quite well filled by an audience partly white and partly colored, among whom we noticed some of our best and most influential fellow-citizens. Dr. Rock's subject was, "A Plea for My Race." To say that the lecture was eloquent, conveys only an idea in the aggregate—it was something more than what is generally termed an eloquent discourse. It was full of meat for strong men, pith for rousing the sluggish, humor for the lively, and logic for the philosophical. Everything was in excellent taste. The manner, as well as the matter, was noticeable. Dr. Rock, tall and manly in form, his stern, dark eye flashing under an intellectual brow, did himself look the orator. There was no bluster, no empty rant and beating of the air, no mere clamoring after effect, no "hollow words of empty sound." His voice, smooth, pleasant, mellifluous, is exactly adapted to his calm and graceful action, and to his elegant diction.

We cannot say that we agree with the accomplished orator in some of his ethnological views. But in the hopeful and cheering view he took of the times, and of the relation of his race to this country in case of a foreign war, he struck a responsive chord in the hearts of his people. Upon this point he said most beautifully: "In such a war, if my race are treated like men, if they are guaranteed the recognition of their manhood, they will defend the country which has given birth to them and their fathers for over two hundred years; but if they cannot be thus recognized, they will not take up arms at all: they will not fight against their country."

But we will not attempt a report of this excellent and eloquent discourse. Altogether it was one of the most entertaining, instructive, and finished productions we ever listened to.

THE OLD VERSIONS OF THE ENGLISH BIBLE

The following interesting specimen of the various English translations of the Bible which preceded the one now in use, or as it is commonly called, the Authorised Version, is from a series of articles now passing through the columns of the [illegible] on the Internal History of our Authorized Version

MARKS.

It is necessary first to explain the marks which, for the sake of brevity and clearness, we employ.

I. The English translations on which our Authorised Version is based, are ranged chronologically with it, and marked with the letters from A to F, thus:

A Tyndale, Five Books of Moses, 1530, in the Matthews Bible, 1537.

B. Coverdale's Bible, 1535.

C. The Whitechurch or Cranmer Bible, 1539

D. The Geneva Bible 1560

E The Bishop's Bible, 1568.

F. King James' or Authorized Version, 1611.

II. First is given in each case Tyndale's rendering, marked A, and if the succeeding versions have adopted it, their letter is also affixed to it. Thus, A B C means that Tyndale, Coverdale and Cranmer have the reading which follows. Tyndale's renderings are printed in heavy black type, and the matter that lies between them from other versions, is in every case parallel with exactly the same amount of the original. As the other versions are marked by their letters, and follow chronologically, the reader sees at a glance with which one of them a reading originated, and by how many, if by any, of the others it was adopted. Where a dash lies between the letters, it means that all the [illegible] marked by those letters and the letters between have the reading so marked. Thus A—F means that Tyndale and the authorized, with all the versions between, have that reading. Where slight variations, purely verbal, occur, they are [illegible]

a t[illegible] omits that word, or with a t[illegible] that it there adds a word, or without either of those marks, where it substitutes a word. Where any of the marks affect more than one word, a line | indicates how far back the change extends. Where a version gives a marginal reading, its beginning and end are marked with [illegible]

The arrangement is such that the reader can reproduce, verbatim, any one of the versions. By simply reading, for instance, what is marked A, he has all of Tyndale. If, in any case, he is at all at a loss to trace the connexion, he can at once see it by reading one or more of the versions separately, or by comparing it with the text of our authorized version

Port Royal Contrabands—At a meeting held on Wednesday evening, at the Philadelphia Institute, by the Executive Committee of the Statistical Association of Colored People, of this city, the following resolutions were passed, which were read at the close of a concert by the Hutchinson Family last evening, given in aid of the escaped slaves at Port Royal:

Resolved, That the claims of the "Contrabands" in the vicinity of Port Royal and elsewhere call loudly upon the friends of humanity for material aid and sympathy.

Resolved, That while there is reason to regret that the Government has not more fully defined the status of these poor creatures, nevertheless it is clearly the duty of the Social, Civil and Statistical Association of the Colored People of Pennsylvania, not only to render aid as an organization, but also to commend these sufferers to the consideration of the various colored churches and societies of this city and State, that they may co-operate in the noble work of helping the Freemen's Association or other proper enterprises, which have undertaken to furnish food, clothing, and teachers, moral and religious, so much needed to relieve immediate distress and to inspire them with hopes of final deliverance.

Resolved, That we cannot lose sight of the Act of Congress, passed at its extra session, or of those proclamations emanating from the several Generals and Commanders of the Army, in which freedom has been declared to the slaves of all parties aiding directly or indirectly the rebellion.

Resolved, That in view of these acts, the slaves cannot (in our judgment) be considered other than FREEMEN.

MISSIONS IN MADAGASCAR.—The Directors of the London Missionary Society having lately received letters from the Rev. William Ellis, who was sent out to ascertain the state of things in Madagascar since the accession of the present King to the throne, say:—

"The following facts are now clearly ascertained:—The number of native Christians has not been exaggerated in the representations of their friends, but actually exceeds their largest calculation. Those who were imprisoned for their Christianity are all set free. They have returned to their homes, and, under the auspices of the new government, enjoy unrestricted religious liberty. They are now eagerly looking for the visit of Mr. Ellis to the capital, and, through him, they entreat the Society to send missionaries and teachers forthwith. With equal urgency, they beg for Bibles and other books from which they may acquire Scriptural and useful knowledge; and in all these measures they have the sanction and cordial concurrence of the new sovereign."

Six missionaries will embark for Madagascar at the end of March.

Domestic Items.

Island No 10.—Commodore Foote telegraphs to Secretary Wells that he has taken formal possession of Island No. 10, and the surrounding batteries, which were found to be constructed in the best engineering style, and were in a comparative sense, impregnable. The batteries mounted seventy guns, of the largest calibre, and they with their ammunition, were found to be in good condition. Four steamers, afloat, have fallen into our hands, and two others, with the rebel gunboat Grampus, were found sunk, but they may be easily raised. The floating battery, mounting sixteen heavy guns, is lying ashore near New Madrid, and it will, no doubt, fall into our hands. Secretary Welles has issued a general order, returning praise to Almighty God for the bloodless victory, and also complimenting Commodore Foote, and the officers and men under him, for their skill and bravery.

Monitor and Merrimac.—European Impressions.—The conflict between the Merrimac and Monitor, in Hampton Roads, has created a great sensation in Europe, and bids fair to revolutionize the whole naval system of Great Britain. All hands agree that wooden walls, even if defended with the heaviest artillery, stand a very poor chance of winning a victory when they are brought in competition with mail-clad vessels, and that the latter, if properly constructed, are almost invincible.

Tennessee.—The Nashville office of Mayor is vacant. The Mayor was under $10,000 bail to appear before the military authorities on the 7th instant.

A rumor prevails in Nashville that Colonel Corcoran has been foully dealt with. A newspaper, unconditionally for the Government, will shortly be established in Nashville. The Banner and Patriot both endeavour to preserve neutrality.

Every day brings us cheering intelligence from that city, with regard to the growing Union sentiment. The health of Governor Johnson, at last accounts, was good. The Hon. Horace Maynard is yet in Nashville, and may prolong his stay there several weeks. Men of all parties daily visit Governor Johnson, and assure him that loyalty to the United States Government is on the increase. He is also daily in receipt of letters from Tennessee prisoners, wherein they speak in the most grateful terms of their treatment in the North. The greater part of them desire to return to their allegiance. Three hundred men have already joined the First Tennessee regiment. The Governor's Guard, from the city, and a large number of recruits from the country, are shortly expected. The loyal Germans of Nashville are also endeavoring to get up a regiment, and one company is almost full.

Halleck and Siegel.—A despatch from St. Louis states that the rebels are withdrawing their forces from northwestern Arkansas, and concentrating them at Pocahontas, in the northeastern part of the State. General Halleck, in anticipation of this movement, had despatched General Steele with a sufficient force, to the Arkansas line, to check the movement of the rebel Generals. General Siegel has arrived at St. Louis, suffering from illness.

Rebel Forces on the Rappahannock—A New York journal has received a special despatch from the Rappahannock, stating that there are not five thousand rebels between Gordonsville and Richmond. The river is said to be very high.

Reports from Port Royal.—Exciting, if true, Intelligence comes to us from Port Royal. Our pickets are now within eight miles of Savannah, and the city is to be assaulted to-day. Other important events are promised us very shortly, in that vicinity.

Rebel Statements.—In the rebel accounts of the battle of Pittsburg Landing, no mention of Monday's struggle is made; and thus, what is really the greatest disaster yet sustained by the enemy, will be converted by their irresistible logic into a glorious victory, and will cause cheer after cheer of a general thanksgiving and jubilee in all the realms of the Southern Confederacy. Fort Macon is said to be provisioned for a six months' siege, and garrisoned by three hundred North Carolina troops. Twenty-four hundred Union troops were landed at Pass Christian, Mississippi, on the 4th instant, and shelled the town, which is but twenty-five miles west of Biloxi, and a short distance north-west of Ship Island. The rebel force of three hundred men appears to have escaped.

Yorktown.—Several slight skirmishes have taken place before Yorktown. In each case the rebels were the assailants, and in each case were they repulsed with loss. On the part of the Pennsylvanians engaged, however, two men were killed, and four wounded.

A balloon reconnaissance from the rebel lines was made [illegible] which formerly

Battle of Winchester—General Shields' official report of the late victory near Winchester has [illegible] Eighty-fourth, Tyler's Brigade, Ohio Fifth, Indiana [illegible] venth, and three companies of the Ohio Eighth. The killed, as reported, are one hundred and three, and among them we have to deplore the loss of the brave Colonel Murray, of the Eighty-fourth Pennsylvania Volunteers, who fell at the head of his regiment while gallantly leading it in the face of the enemy. The [illegible] them slightly, and the missing are twenty four. The enemy's loss is more difficult to ascertain than our own. Two hundred and seventy were found dead on the battle-field. Forty were buried by the inhabitants of the adjacent village, and, by a calculation made by the number of graves found on both sides of the valley road between here and Strasburg, their loss in killed must have been [illegible] and in wounded one thousand. The enemy admit a loss of between one thousand and one thousand five hundred killed and wounded. Our force, in infantry, [illegible] and artillery [illegible] hand. That of the enemy must have exceeded eleven thousand.

We have taken three hundred prisoners, two guns, four caissons, and a thousand stand of small arms. The report concludes with an acknowledgment of the services rendered by Colonels Kimball, Tyler, Sullivan, Carroll, and Daum, and with thanks to the entire division for its effective valor.

The Battle of Pittsburg Landing.—Every item of additional intelligence goes to prove that the battle of Pittsburg Landing in the exact reverse of our defeat at Manassas. At the latter, the Union troops marched forward, driving back the enemy from point to point, and McDowell not only announced their defeat on the field, but sent a despatch to that effect to General Scott, at Washington. Just at that moment came up the reserves of Johnston, and the tide turned.

Then came, not only the tidings of our great reverse, but a panic-struck mob, disorganized and demoralized, came pouring into the capital, declaring with wild alarm that all was lost. The enemy, indeed, sustained great losses, and was not in condition to pursue; but such was Manassas to us.

The tables are turned at Corinth. The despatches of Beauregard, written on Sunday night, "on Federal paper, in the enemy's camp," announced the entire defeat of the Union troops. Then came the reinforcements of BUELL and WALLACE; the battle of Monday, the desperate struggle, the successful charge, the panic, the flight, and the rebels found Bull Run reversed. We had gained the day.

SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE INQUIRER.

Cairo, April 12, Midnight.—I was taken prisoner at the late battle of Pittsburg Landing, but have succeeded in making my escape from the enemy. Acting Brigadier General Peabody, and Major Powell, of the Twenty-fifth Missouri Volunteers, with whom I was breakfasting at the time of the surprise, were both killed. The rebels robbed me of everything except my pantaloons and boots.

I have with me a full written account of the battle, but the telegraph has already given you the main features. Our loss is at least four thousand killed, and twelve thousand wounded; that of the enemy, one-third more. General Albert Sidney Johnston, of Kentucky, and General Beuford Johnson, of Tennessee, are both dead. The latter made his will before dying.

Bragg, Beauregard, and Breckinridge escaped. The battle lasted thirteen and a half hours on Sunday, and eight hours on Monday, when the enemy fled. We captured all their cannon, except two or three. Among the batteries captured is the famous Washington Light Artillery, of New Orleans.

H. B.

Alabama.—General Mitchell, commanding one of the divisions of Buell's army, after a forced march, had occupied Huntsville, Alabama, on the 11th instant. He surprised the rebel force in the town, and captured two hundred prisoners, fifteen locomotives, and a large amount of other necessary articles. Huntsville is on the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, about fifteen miles south of the Tennessee boundary, and forty-five miles east of Florence. By seizing Huntsville, General Mitchell has succeeded in severing the railroad connexion between Memphis and Charleston, and Memphis and Richmond.

The Merrimac.—The Merrimac, Jamestown, Yorktown, and several small tugs, came down the Roads on Friday, as if they intended to attack the Federal fleet. After manœuvring for some time, the Jamestown sailed towards two brigs and one schooner which were anchored near Newport News, and in less than half an hour she captured them, and was towing them towards Craney Island. The Merrimac came down later in the afternoon, and after exchanging shots with the Monitor, Naugatuck, and several gunboats, returned. As most of the shots fell short, no damage was done.

Emperor Napoleon.—A RUMOR.—A startling rumor comes to us from Washington. If the on dit can be believed, the Emperor Napoleon, in view of the fact that the stars and stripes float over the soil of every rebellious State but one, will reconsider his recognition of the rebels as belligerents, and perhaps extend to the Federal Government such aid and comfort in suppressing the rebellion as may be compatible with his position as the representative of a leading European power.

Beauregard—As was expected, General Beauregard has claimed the battle at Pittsburg Landing as a victory for the rebels. He has captured so he says, thirty-six pieces of artillery and eight thousand prisoners, and fallen back on Corinth, which he is "fully able to hold."

General Mitchell.—General Mitchell, by a most daring and successful coup, has severed the great rebel line of communication between the Atlantic and Mississippi, and now holds a hundred miles of the Memphis and Charleston railroad. This is one of the splendid results of the late battle at Pittsburg Landing.

Fort Pulaski—It is reported from rebel sources that Fort Pulaski has surrendered unconditionally.

General Herman Gansevoort, son of the late General Peter Gansevoort, the hero and defender of Fort Schuyler, in the Revolutionary War, recently died at his residence in Gansevoortville, Saratoga County, New York, in the eighty-fourth year of his age.

Dr. Isaac Hayes, the Arctic Explorer, has been appointed by the President, and confirmed by the Senate, Brigadier-Surgeon in the army.

W. L. Yancey, one of the Commissioners of the Southern Confederacy to Europe, has succeeded in reaching the South again, and is reported by the Richmond Enquirer to have arrived in that city and taken his seat in the Senate, after subscribing the usual oath of office.

Vine Hall the well-known and able captain of the steamship Great Eastern in her trip to this country, has gone to the South Seas, where he has been appointed Superintendent of the mail steam packet running between Australia and New Zealand.

Count Louskay, a Russian of distinguished character, for several years past Minister of the Interior, and a devoted friend of the Emperor's great scheme for emancipating the serfs, recently died at St. Petersburgh.

Abd-el-Kader, whose name has become well-known from his faithful services on behalf of the Christians during the terrible massacres in Syria in 1860, has received from the Prussian Government the insignia of the Order of the Red Eagle as a mark of the national gratitude for his conduct.

W. H. Russell, the well known correspondent of the London Times, and whose mirth in the United States has obtained for him no very enviable notoriety, either for truthfulness, propriety, or personal worth, has been recalled, and [illegible] the 7th inst., on board the steamship CHINA, from New York.

Judge Seymour, in a recent suit for assault and battery in the Superior Court for Fairfield County, Conn., decided that a school-teacher may use all reasonable means to have his commands respected and obeyed, and that it is his duty to the scholar, to the parents, to the good of the school, and to the community, to do so.

Major-General John Pope, commanding the United States troops in the recent brilliant taking of Island No. 10, is the son of Governor Nathaniel Pope, of Virginia, resided for some time in Kentucky, and afterwards in Illinois. He graduated at West Point in 1842, was in the Mexican War, and has acted a most noble part in the present struggle for the Constitution and the Union.

From the Rappahannock.—The National In[illegible] river, down to Wednesday morning, state that the Union forces occupy the north bank of the river, which is much swollen. The railroad is repaired up to Warrenton Junction.

Numerous refugees and contrabands are coming in daily, who report that the main body of the rebel army have fallen back to Richmond, doubtless with the intention of strengthening General Magruder. The rebel pickets are occasionally seen on the north bank of the Rappahannock, [illegible] be merely watching our movements.

Foreign Summary.

The times are changed from what they were when [illegible] dared to show that they had a will or wish of their own. Under date of March 8th, a correspondent of the London Daily News, writing from Malta, says: "There is to-day handed about Malta a very long [illegible] ples, and signed by about six thousand of the Roman Catholic clergy. Several chapters have affixed their official seal to it, and it is to be very like Protestantism—but they call it pure Roman Catholicism. It urges the Pope to abandon his temporal power, to purge the Church to its primitive state, and to remember that a great majority of his clergy are from the people. The document is admirably composed, and must have emanated from a very liberal mind. The Italians appear to approach nearer to the Reformed Church than we do in Malta."

The latest report in regard to the Pope is, that if he is compelled to leave Rome, he will return to Malta—and thus will be found virtually taking refuge under the flag of Protestant England.

[illegible] its utterances have often been regarded as little less than royal mandates. Its position has been one of great power; and in proportion to its exalted position, it seems to be sought for as the medium of notices to the public. Its issue for the 15th of March, alone, contained 1900 advertisements, and filled sixty columns.

The trouble from the INSURGENTS in China, painfully continues. The city of Ningpo has been taken, and given largely over to plunder and to massacre. The missionaries had retired to the suburbs, and were generally unmolested; but the masses of the people suffered every outrage at the hands of their countrymen. Shanghai, also one of the ports of entry for foreigners, according to the treaty made many years since, is threatened. In this state of things, and as the treaties have never been dissolved, the British government have sent out orders to the English authorities to employ both military and naval force, if necessary, to protect the city from any of these desolating attacks of the rebels. It is hoped this may put a stop to their terrible course.

An example of most munificent and useful giving, has just been given, in London, by the well known American, GEORGE PEABODY. Impressed with the oftentimes inconvenient, and thence vicious and unhappy dwellings in which the poor of that city frequently have to live, he has placed £150,000 (about $750,000,) at the disposal of Hon. C. F. Adams, the American Minister, Lord Stanley, Sir Emerson Tennent, and Messrs. Simpson & Morgan, as Trustees, for the purpose of ameliorating the condition of the poor. His leading idea, we believe, is to have neat and convenient, but not expensive houses erected in large numbers, to be let on proper conditions, and thus have a practical encouragement given to honesty, industry, and a virtuous life among the poor. It is, indeed, a noble charity.

The affairs of GREECE are in a very troubled state. Under a deep cherished desire, it is said, to be rid of the king who was obtained from Germany, there is a restless and even insurrectionary spirit painfully manifested. The effect is already disastrous. Athens looks as if in a state of siege. Business is largely suspended. The cafés, in numerous instances, are closed, as are also the University and the Gymnasia. And on the streets, the people shun each other, lest they should be suspected and arrested for plotting conspiracies and insurrections together.

It is said more than two hundred RAILROAD bills will be brought under the consideration of the British Parliament during the present session. Among these, will be one asking help from the Government in the construction of a Railway twenty miles long, from Dover, in England, to Calais, in France, by means of a submarine wrought iron tube. The estimate cost of the work, is £12,000,000, and if successful, it would bring London and Paris within seven or eight hours of each other.

Speaking of Railroads, the latest statistics show some colossal facts. Altogether, the Railways of Great Britain employ an army of 100,000 men, control a capital of £350,000,000, and receive an annual revenue of £28,000,000. The London and Northwestern Line, extending from London to Carlisle, from Peterborough to Cardiff, and from Leeds to Holyhead, includes 1000 miles of track, has a total capital of £36,756,660, and a working stock of 972 locomotives, 1,972 passenger cars, 1,048 guards breaks, horse boxes, travelling post-offices, &c., &c.; and the revenue is at the rate of £8,200 a week, £12,600 a day, £525 an hour, day and night, during all the seven days of the week. There are other Lines on the same scale.

The affairs of ITALY seem in a very disturbed state. Ricasoli, the candid, bold, and honest successor of the lamented Cavour, has resigned, and his place is filled by Ratazzi, who has the reputation of being the pliant tool of the French emperor. Prince Napoleon has, in several bold speeches in the French Senate, given the Pope a party much trouble. Among other things, he has demanded that the French troops should evacuate Rome, and, in the course of his speech, showed, by documentary evidence from as far back as 1669, that the temporal power of the Pope has always been deplorable.

A BILL has been before the British Parliament again, to legalize marriage with a deceased wife's sister. Last year, the Bill was defeated on the second reading, by a vote of 177 to 172. This year, after a dull debate, and in a thin house, it has passed by a vote of 144 to 123. It may be thrown out on the third reading, and, it is said, will not pass through the House of Lords. There seems to be great persistency in seeking the passage of this bill.

A WORK of interest is announced as in preparation from the press. It is lengthened and, no one can doubt, interesting reminiscences of the late Rev. Thomas Hartwell Horne. It is being arranged and brought out under the special supervision of his daughter, Mrs. Sarah Ann Cheyne.

The INTOLERANCE of the laws of Spain, in regard to all religious privileges outside of the Romish Church, is well known. In view of it, and the very great difficulty of enjoying such privileges either pleasantly or permanently, the Missionary Chaplain to the English, in Spain, thus writes to the Times:

"We ask for liberty to meet for united worship in consulates or private houses, liberty to have a resident chaplain and schoolmaster, liberty to import Bibles and Prayer-books in English, for our own use, liberty to bury our dead in our own cemeteries, with the service of our Church; and all this not on mere sufferance, but by the guarantee of international treaty. As the Spanish law at present stands, all these things are illegal. It is quite true that at Madrid and Malaga service is permitted, and I have myself frequently officiated in Barcelona, Valencia, Alicante, Denia, and other towns, in consulates and private houses, without molestation. But for this so-called toleration, there is no security. Service may [illegible] by the police, and all concerned imprisoned or summarily turned out of the country."

A striking movement is going on in PORTUGAL. Rome has had little less power in this country than in Spain. There, however, a bill has just been introduced into the Cortes, suppressing all religious societies and brotherhoods educating children, or nursing the sick. If successful, this will be the entering wedge to the overthrow of some of the vilest and worst features of the Romish system.

STRIKES seem more and more doomed every year. [illegible] Throughout these colonies, all slaves "will become free on the 1st of July, 1863, under the following conditions.—1. Compensation of 300 guilders for each slave man, woman, and child, to be paid to the owner. 2. Slaves to remain under apprentice[illegible]

PERRY & FITZGERALD'S

PREPARED FOR MAKING LIGHT MUFFINS, AND QUICK TEA BREAD, WITH OUT FERMENTATION

The new process of breadmaking invented by Perry & Fitzgerald, and patented in the United States, France, and Belgium, is rapidly superseding the old method of fermentation. The process consists in mixing the flour in a closed vessel with the combination of pure carbonic gas, under pressure, by which the dough made is made three times lighter, and ready to be [illegible] The "charge" is usually 200 pounds, and each machine [illegible] the operation, in all its details, from the putting in of the flour to the discharging of the dough in from twenty five to forty minutes.

The invention of Perry & Fitzgerald effects a revolution in the [illegible] of bread, by establishing a system of wholesome manufacture [illegible] not subject to the vicissitudes and perils of fermentation.

The application of pure carbonic acid gas, under pressure to a [illegible] dissolves as it were the particles of flour, and [illegible] a clear fermentable wing of the impurities of the artificial one of the [illegible] which [illegible] and [illegible] the dough the [illegible] of carbonic acid gas, [illegible] of animals, to be produced in this way, thus, as the sugar would [illegible] and prevent the bread would be so much the sweeter and [illegible]

What, in Dr. Ure, was evidently a scarcely comprehended theoretical truth has been practically developed by the brilliant invention of Perry & Fitzgerald, and we will need their names to grateful remembrance, as among the most eminent benefactors of mankind.

ITS SUPERIORITY.—The superb purity of unfermented bread is by no means new. Dr Cullen, who wrote more than seventy years ago, said:

"In Scotland, also both of the better class of people, and the greater part of the whole, live upon unfermented bread, and are accounted fairest in other parts, and there are not a more healthy people anywhere to be found. In the course of fifty years that I have practised among them, I have had occasion to know this, and have hardly met with the [illegible] I never [illegible]

At a later period, Professor Thompson, of Glasgow, in his work on the "Food of Animals," after alluding to the facts referred to above by Dr Cullen, and other kindred facts, observes:

"Such, then, being sufficient evidence in favor of the wholesomeness [illegible] it differs from fermented bread. The less [illegible] in this process (fermentation) may be considered to be merely the separation of the particles of which the flour is composed so as to render the mass more readily divisible by the preparatory organs of digestion. But, as the object is gained at a saving of the [illegible] IT BECOMES A MATTER OF INTEREST to ascertain the amount of the [illegible] sustained in the process.

The result of Professor Thompson's experiments showed a difference in favor of unfermented bread of nearly seven per cent, over that made by the ordinary process. In other words, there was given [illegible] one-eighteenth of the nutritive properties of the flour which, by the process of fermentation, was driven into the air and lost.

Were the most [illegible] particulars [illegible] the [illegible] of the Bread made without fermentation, or the use of chemical agents, over the bread made by these processes. Although from what has already been said this superiority appears in most vivid contrast, yet the public will be more satisfied to have the points stated specifically, for it only needs that the advantages secured by this method be clearly understood in order to its universal introduction in the manufacture of bread.

I. IN CLEANLINESS.—Instead of the dough being mixed by the naked hands to [illegible] the bread from the working of the flour to the completion of the baking, is not, and scarcely can be, touched by any one. "One dodecatyrian stabbed in its manufacture," says Dr Willard Parker, "is its entire annihilation." Says Dr Wardrop: "The process is not only purely scientific, but pre-eminently [illegible]

II. IN PRESERVATION OF ALL THE NUTRITIVE PROPERTIES OF THE FLOUR.—As the raising of the dough is by the mechanical interstices of pure carbonic acid gas, under pressure, in which the dough made is made three times light, and ready to be [illegible] the assortments of the flour remain wholly unchanged, while the process of raising by fermentable [illegible] is at the [illegible] [illegible] Bread made by the New Process is uniformly light, sweet, and wholesome. The [illegible] is not liable to variation. Yeast, or [illegible] produce bread of the same quality. It retains its moisture much longer than fermented bread, and may be eaten warm with impunity. The process also insures a perfect freedom from all [illegible]

"The objectionable consequences of fermentation being avoided, the nourishment of the flour are left [illegible] and unexhausted, the resulting loaf being absolutely pure."

IV. IN WHOLESOMENESS.—Being free from the dietetic objections which are the product of fermentation, or chemical restraint, by the old modes, the bread made by the New Process is easy of digestion, and agrees with the most delicate stomach. "Dyspepsia," says Dr Coe, [illegible] the N. Y. Medical College, "will [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] of the manufactured bread has been [illegible] to [illegible] as an article of diet." Says the London Medical Press and Gazette:

"Since the introduction of the new unfermented bread, there have already been remitted from members of the medical profession, who have recommended it to their patients, as [illegible] non-professional sources, accounts of the really astonishing results that have followed its use in cases of deranged digestion and assimilation. Many persons have reported their recovery to health after years of suffering and misery, by the simple use of the bread as a diet. Many cases have also been reported by medical men of position, in which certain distressing forms of dyspepsia, which had remained intractable under every kind of treatment, have yielded as if by magic, almost immediately after adopting the use of the unfermented bread.

"The [illegible] effects of the new bread are attributable to two causes. The one to the absence of the [illegible] matters imparted to ordinary bread by the process of fermentation; and the other to the presence in the bread [illegible] of the [illegible] which are the essential agents of digestion and assimilation."

The most eminent members of the medical profession, both in Great Britain and in the United States, not only speak in the highest terms of the same with which it is favored and of its rich, nourishing qualities, but especially of its peculiar palatableness, and wonderful keeping properties. The absence of acidity and other objectionable flavors, which, in a greater or less degree, are characteristic of fermented bread, renders the new bread peculiarly desirable to the taste.

V. IN ECONOMY AND ECONOMY.—By the use of mechanical means, instead of manual labor, a barrel of flour is converted into bread in forty-five minutes, whereas [illegible] the kneading process for five hours are required in the formation of the dough, and a further time in heating, raising, and baking the dough.

"The cheapness of the consumption of bread," says a correspondent out of the Journal of the Society of Arts, "renders it an article peculiarly suitable to be prepared and supplied by a public company. And since the new process removes all the intricacies of manufacture, and the expense of the machinery gives a comparative monopoly, the supply of bread by companies on the same economy with gas, water, or other articles of prime necessity."

WE WERE VERY POOR TOGETHER

[illegible] Mary
A wee small cot was mine.
Two cows alone were all thy dairy
In happy days lang syne.
[illegible]
To tread the mount and moor
At eve to clasp thee once again
When we were very poor.

Oft the castle in the [illegible] wang
With many a window bright.
And many a crystal cup was flowing
With ruby wine by night;
But on the heath our little cot
Sat hidden, dark and damp;
But I was happy with my lot,
For Mary was my lamp.

I have gained thee golden gear and sorrow
[illegible]
But on eve awaits me on the narrow
Like the one I used to know.
O give me back my wee wife,
My small cot on the moor,
For joy has left me lone in life
Since we were very poor.

THE LAW OF UMBRELLAS

A correspondent of the New York Knickerbocker says he wishes to lay down the moral law on the subject of umbrellas, which people should observe. Some who make great pretensions, have a slender appreciation of the meum and tuum in particular cases. The very judge who condemns a criminal to the penitentiary, if the law were rightly executed, which he expounds, is often himself a thief! Will he tell us in what code it is laid down that umbrellas are a thing in common?—that they may be seized upon and appropriated, wherever found, without consideration? This, then, O, honest man! is the Lex of Umbrellas:

"Sec. 1. If you are away from home, and caught suddenly in a shower, and you see an umbrella standing in some corner, for which there appears to be no owner, and, being much in need of it, to save you from a wet jacket, you take it without ceremony—that is stealing.

"Sec. 2. If you have a cotton umbrella, and in your haste to get away, or because the lights in the hall are dim, exchange it for a neat silk one—that is stealing.

"Sec. 3. If, in stress of weather, you borrow one from an obliging friend, who insists on your taking it, and does not impress it on your recollection to restore it to him the next day—that is stealing.

"Sec. 4. If you find a stray umbrella in your house, which has been accidentally left, and you give it house-room, without making any effort to find the bereaved owner—that is stealing."

THE HORSE HAIR WORM

A gentleman from Detroit had the kindness to send me one of those long thread-like worms (Gordius) found often in brooks, and called horse-hairs by the common people. When I first received it, it was coiled up in a close roll at the bottom of the bottle, filled with fresh water, that contained it, and looked more like a little tangle of black sewing silk than any thing else. Wishing to unwind it, that I might examine its entire length, I placed it in a large china basin filled with water, and proceeded very gently to disentangle its coils, when I perceived that the animal had twisted itself around a bundle of its eggs, holding them fast in a close embrace. In the process of unwinding, the eggs dropped away, and floated to a little distance. Having finally stretched it out to its full length, perhaps half a yard, I sat watching to see if this singular being, that looked like a long black thread in the water, would give any signs of life. Almost immediately it moved toward the bundle of eggs, and having reached it began to sew itself through and through the little white mass, passing one end of its body through it, and then returning to make another stitch, as it were, till the eggs were at last completely entangled as in an intricate network of coils. It seemed to me almost impossible that this care of offspring could be the result of any instinct of affection in a creature of so low an organization, and I again separated it from the eggs and placed them at a greater distance, when the same action was repeated. On trying the experiment a third time the bundle of eggs had become loosened, and a few of them dropped off singly into the water. The efforts which the animal then made to recover the missing ones, winding itself round and round them, but failing to bring them into the fold with the rest, because they were too small, and evading all efforts to secure them when once parted from the first little compact mass, convinced me that there was a definite purpose in its attempts.

VEGETABLE LIFE IN THE MOON

It was for a long time the common opinion among astronomers, that the moon was without an atmosphere, and destitute of water; and that, consequently, neither animal nor vegetable life could be supported on its surface. But several eminent modern astronomers have maintained that the moon has an atmosphere, though of very limited extent. And quite recently, Mr. Schwabe, a German astronomical Professor, thinks he has discovered signs of vegetation on the surface of our satellite.

It is well known that there are certain dark lines or scratches, as they appear, extending across the slopes of the highest mountains in the moon. These have been variously explained; some regarding them as the beds of dried-up streams, others, as the channels left by torrents of lava, and others, as having some other origin. But Professor Schwabe claims to have discovered in these lines a greenish color, which appears at a certain season, lasts a few months, and then disappears. He therefore regards these lines as belts of vegetation. If his observations should be decisively confirmed by those of other astronomers, it will settle the question that the moon has both air and water, and will therefore remove any presumption against the existence of animal life on its surface.

HOW TO SELECT POULTRY.

A young turkey has a smooth, dark, leg, feet supple and moist, and the end of the breast bone pliable, like gristle. If the head is on, the eyes will be full and bright if fresh killed.

Fowls, when young, have smooth combs and legs. In other respects, they are like young turkeys.

Young geese will have yellow bills and feet, and a pin-head may be forced through the skin of the breast. (It requires considerable pressure to thrust a pin through the breast of an old, tough goose.) If fresh, the feet will be pliable. The same rule applies to the selection of ducks.

As a general rule, all old birds have bony claws, that are not easily straightened. Young birds have pliant and easily-yielding claws. The spurs of old turkeys and roosters are hard, long and sharp. Of young ones but the first development is seen.

HEARING A GHOST

"Believing in ghosts! of course I do," said the widow Tough; "my poor husband appeared to me, just as plain—"

"Did you see him?" her hearers asked, in open-mouthed astonishment.

"No, I didn't see him," said the widow; "but I heard him. He went to the cup-board and took down the tea-pot and drank from it just as he used to, and then he went to work at the stove. I laid and heard it, but thought it was one of the boys."

"Who's there?" said I, but there was no answer.

"What are you doing there?"

"I take my business [illegible] I know to be my husband's, because he always spoke to that pleasant way. I got up, and there wasn't nobody there."

The teeth of her auditors chattered.

INSECTS ON FOWLS

There are several kinds that infest the hen. By attending to the following remedy, they will be kept entirely clear. First of all, if in confinement, in the dust corner of the poultry house, mix about [illegible] them free from parasites, and give the feathers a glossy appearance. If infested with the insects, dampen the skin under the feathers with a little water, then sprinkle a little black sulphur on the skin. Let a bird be covered with the insects, and they will disappear in the course of twelve hours. Also, previous to setting a hen, if the nest be slightly sprinkled with the sulphur, there is no [illegible] neither will the chickens be annoyed by them. Many a fine hatched brood pines away and dies through nothing else, and no one knows the cause. Having had an ostrich under my care, that was pining, I looked into his feathers, and observed thousands of parasites. I employed tobacco water, also lime water, under my then master's orders, to no effect. In his absence, I well dampened him and sprinkled him under the feathers with black sulphur, when next day they were examined with [illegible] and some macaws, also parrots, that were addicted to biting off their feathers, I employed the black sulphur by well syringing them with water, then sprinkling the sulphur over their skins. If tame, sponge the skins, then rub gently, with the points of the fingers, with the sulphur, every other day, for about a fortnight, when the parrot or macaw will cease to destroy his plumage. It is not a remedy which has not been proved; for I have used it these two years with success.

John Hamilton, in The Field.

INSANITY—RELIGION

Dr. Ray, in the report of the Butler Hospital for the insane in Rhode Island, says: "I believe—and it is in some measure the result of considerable observation of various psychological states—that in this age of fast living, nothing can be relied upon more surely for preserving the healthy balance of the mental faculties than an earnest, practical conviction of the great truths of Christianity."

MUCH MAY BE DONE WITH LITTLE.

"Here, my little one," said an Athenian to a little Hebrew boy, in a sportful way—"here is a penny; buy something for me with it. Let it be an article of such a kind that I may eat some myself, give some to a guest, and have some to take home with me for my family."

The witty boy went and bought salt.

"Salt!" exclaimed the Athenian; "I did not tell you to buy salt."

"Quite right," answered the boy, wittily; "but did you not tell me to buy some article of which you might eat yourself, have enough for a guest, and also some to take home for your family? This is the article that answers the purpose. You can eat your fill, give to another as much as he wishes to eat, and have a good supply left to take home for your family."—Hebrew Stories.

RAMBLES IN WESTERN CORNWALL, a new English publication, contains the following story about Oliver Cromwell: "There was an old Frenchman knighted named Barrois, an indefatigable animal-hunter as if he were a Western politician from Indiana or Illinois just arrived at Washington. One day he way-laid the Protector in St. James' Park to solicit his signature to a recommendation of his humble self to certain persons in power. Oliver told him he had no pen and ink. These Mr. Barlase produced on the spot. 'But I have no desk here or any convenience to write upon,' said the Protector. 'Write upon my back, then, please you, sir,' says Mr. Barlase. The petition was granted."

DIDN'T GO THAT WAY.—The Hudson Gazette says that the popular steamer Oregon was delayed on the river by a dense fog a few days since, and was compelled to "lay to" for several hours. An impatient passenger approached Captain King with the inquiry:—"I say, Mr. Pilot, sin't you going to start soon?"—"As soon as the fog clears up," blandly replied the captain.—"Well, but it's starlight overhead now," urged the passenger.—"Oh! yes," replied the captain, with a mischievous twinkle in the left eye, "but we are not going that way!"

WHAT is commonly called [illegible] has never been considered incompatible with the presence of a vigorous intellect. The late distinguished mathematician, Professor Hamilton, of Aberdeen, was notorious for his absence of mind. Emerging hastily one day from the arched gateway of King's College, he stumbled against a cow which happened to be passing. In the confusion of the moment, the Professor raised his hat, exclaiming: "I beg your pardon, madam!" Walking in Union street, a few days afterward, he did accidentally stumble against a lady who was walking in an opposite direction. In sudden recollection of his former adventure, he called out: "Is that you again, you brute?"

ALPHABETICAL CONSOLATION.—Why is the letter A like the meridian? Because it is the middle of day. Why is the letter B like hot fire? Because it makes oil boil. Why is the letter D like a fallen angel? Because by its association with evil, it becomes a devil. Why is the letter E like the end of time? Because it is the beginning of eternity. Why is the letter F like death? Because it makes all fall. Why is the letter G like wisdom? Because it is the beginning of greatness and goodness. Why is the letter G like the dying words of Adams? "This is the end of earth." Why is the letter J like the end of spring? Because it is the beginning of June.

Jones and Brown were talking lately of a young clergyman whose preaching they had heard that day. The sermon was like a certain man mentioned in a certain biography—"very poor and very pious." "What do you think of him?" asked Brown. "I think," said Jones, "he did much better two years ago." "Why, he didn't preach then," said Brown. "True," said Jones, "that is what I mean."

A VOLUNTEER who prides himself upon the domestic arts he has learned during camp life, writes home to advise the girls not to be in a hurry to marry, for the boys will return in a short time and the girls can then get good husbands who can cook, wash or iron, and do general housework, or work in the garden, or run errands for their wives.

A COUNTRY magistrate, noted for his love of the pleasure of the table, speaking one day to a friend, said—"We have just been eating a superb turkey; it was excellent, stuffed with truffles to the neck, tender, delicate, and of high flavor; we left only the bones." "How many of you were there?" said his friend. "Two," replied the magistrate. "Two!" "Yes; the turkey and myself!"

Lord Kames, in a conversation with his gardener one day, said: "George, the time will come when a man shall be able to carry all the money [illegible] pockets." "I believe it, sir," said the gardener, "but he will then be able to carry all the crop in the other."

THEY say that there is a man living in Edinburgh [illegible] attends church regularly, and sleeps [illegible] to sleep during prayer time that he can't get them [illegible]

EARTHQUAKE.—The first ask[illegible] Englishman [illegible] "Upon my word, I don't know," said the [illegible]; "but why would try!"

BREEDS AND SPECIES

A curious instance of the power of man, not only in developing the pliability of an animal's organization, but in adapting it to suit his own caprices, is that of the Golden Carp, so frequently seen in bowls and tanks as the ornament of drawing-rooms and gardens. Not only an infinite variety of spotted, striped, variegated colors has been produced in these fishes, but, especially among the Chinese, so famous for their morbid love of whatever is distorted and warped from its natural shape and appearance, all sorts of changes have been brought about in this single species. A book of Chinese paintings showing the Golden Carp in its various represents some as short and stout, others long and slender,—some with the ventral side swollen, others hunch-backed,—some with the mouth greatly enlarged, while in others the caudal fin, which is the normal condition of the [illegible] tail and is forked like those of other fishes, has become erected and arched, or is double, or crooked, or has swerved in some other way from its original pattern. But in all these variations there is nothing which recalls the characteristic specific differences among the representatives of the Carp Family, which in their wild state are very monotonous in their appearance all the world over.

Were it appropriate to accumulate evidence here upon this subject I could bring forward many more examples quite as striking as those above mentioned. The various breeds of our domesticated Horse present the same kind of irregularities, and do not differ from each other in the same way as the wild species differ from one another. Or take the Genus Dog: the differences between its wild species do not correspond in the least with the differences observed among the domesticated ones. Compare the differences between the various kinds of jackalls and wolves with those that exist between the bull-dog and greyhound, for instance, or between the St. Charles and the terrier, of between the Esquimaux and the Newfoundland dog. I need hardly add that what is true of the horses, the cattle, the dogs, is true also of the donkey, the goat, the sheep, the pig, the cat, the rabbit, the different kinds of barn-yard fowl—in short, of all those animals that are in domesticity the chosen companions of man.

In fact all the variability among domesticated species is due to the fostering care, or, in its more extravagant freaks, to the fancies of man, and it has never been observed in the wild species, where, on the contrary, everything shows the closest adherence to the distinct, well-defined, and invariable limits of the species. It surely does not follow that because the Chinese can, under abnormal conditions, produce a variety of fantastic shapes in the Golden Carp, therefore water, or the physical conditions established in the water, can create a fish, any more than it follows, that, because they can dwarf a tree, or alter its aspect by stunting its growth in one direction and forcing it in another, therefore the earth, or the physical conditions connected with their growth, can create a pine, an oak, a birch, or a maple.

Nature holds inviolable the stamp that God has set upon his creatures; and if man is able to influence their organization in some slight degree, it is because the Creator has given to his relations with the animals he has intended for his companions the same plasticity which he has allowed to every other order of his life. In virtue of which he may in some sort mould and shape it to his own ends, and be held responsible also for its results.

The common sense of a civilized community has already pointed out the true distinction in applying another word to the discrimination of the different kinds of domesticated animals. They are called breeds, and breeds among animals are the work of man;—species were created by God.

HINTS TO YOUNG FARMERS

It is a very easy and simple affair to keep a cash book, and yet how few farmers do it. Any person who can write can keep a book of this description, and many advantages accrue from it. On one page of your cash book set down every thing sold, and the sum received for it. On the other side put down all your outgoings or expenditures; and when it is begun, if the amount of cash on hand is put at the top of the column of receipts, at any time by adding up the two pages and taking the difference of them, will show [illegible] hand; and if there is any disagreement, there must be some error of entry, or there must be "a hole in the purse." A book of this kind accurately kept would show at the end of the year, or at any other time, the amount of wheat, corn, potatoes, butter, poultry, eggs, or any other article sold, and the sum received for them. It would do more—it would show all your outlaying for stock, seed, implements or husbandry, repairs, clothing, tea, coffee, sugar, salt, &c., &c., and also for wages, and would present a very curious and interesting document [illegible] the end of twelve months, and if there should be found to be "a hole in the purse," it would indicate the spot where repairs were most necessary. A farmer keeping a book of entry of this description would be [illegible] as a captain of a ship does when on the ocean, and he would be less likely to run on the shoals, or get among the breakers. As it is not very usual among farmers to take receipts when money is paid on ordinary occasions, and not in very large sums, and as the memories of many people are very frail, such a book of entries as has been referred to would be of essential service as a record of payment where no other evidence of it existed, and might prevent litigation and trouble [illegible] of the parties.

On the death of the head of a family who has kept no regular records of his receipts and payments, much difficulty, and sometimes heavy losses, have occurred, besides a good deal of trouble and anxiety to those who were obliged to grope in darkness settling the estate. It is well known that very many intelligent, worthy farmers, are careful to preserve an accurate statement [illegible] in proper form, and such rarely find "a hole in the purse." But there are many others who would at once plead guilty, or, if they did not, could readily be convicted on responsible testimony of totally neglecting to keep an intelligent series of entries in a book, of their outgoings and incomings, and these are the persons who often complain of "a hole in the purse," and yet they are not careful to have it repaired in due season.

WALKING.

Of all forms of exercise, walking is the most useful, as it brings into play the greatest number of muscles, without unnatural strain upon any. It also leaves free scope to the external senses, while allowing of simultaneous occupation of the mind. Another advantage is, that it admits of complete regulation, both in degree and duration, according to the strength, time, or wishes of each individual. Those who have weak lungs, or heart, must be satisfied with gentle walking, and [illegible] vital activity, it is often advisable to keep the mind free from severe or sustained thought when walking. Hence the advantage of a companion with whom cheerful conversation can be kept up, or observing surrounding objects, whether in town or country, so as to divert the mind from study and care. The pursuits of natural history are good in this way, and hence, also, the chief hygienic of shooting and field sports, excitement and diversion of mind accompanying the actual exercise. Those who are engaged in business, [illegible] at a distance from their place of residence, ought to walk at least part of the way, both in the morning [illegible] to walk more than they generally do. The time is [illegible] well [illegible] ye be received to [illegible] brain will do at much work in one hour, when there is a fine glow of pure oxygenated blood, as in double time, when the nervous system is exhausted, and the veins congested with dark blood. Artificial stimulants may quicken thought for a time, but their effect diminishing by habit, the [illegible] has to be increased, and more is done to the system.

Family Circle.

SUBDUE YOUR CHILD'S WILL.

How seldom do we see a person whose will was not restrained in childhood, becoming a Christian! "A child left to himself" not only "bringeth his mother to shame," but almost surely brings ruin upon himself. The parent who neglects, with love and firmness, to subdue his child, in the language of the wise man, "hateth his own soul; but he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes."

The son of pious, but [illegible] parents left home and ran into evil courses. His father and mother were almost heart broken, but wrote continually letters overflowing with affection and earnest entreaties to leave his sinful ways.

A friend was in his room when one of these home-letters came. He read it seriously, and evidently with a troubled conscience, then sat a few moments lost in thought; when, suddenly rising, he dashed the letter in the fire, exclaiming, "There, let them warn, write letters, pray and whine; it is of no use. A good whipping ten years ago, would have done more to save me."

Submission to parental authority is a preparative for submission to God's will, while continual self-indulgence fosters the evil passions of the heart, and strengthens its natural enmity to God.

The mother [illegible] a little girl who was always delicate, and subject to fits on any excitement, was told by physicians to keep her as quiet as possible and never let her be crossed. But, instead of producing the desired effect, this course made her peevish, irritable and stubborn. After making it a subject of earnest prayer, the mother decided to govern her as she did the other children. Taking the little one upon her knee, she told her of the error of the course she had pursued, and that henceforth she must obey, or be punished.

Presently some duty was required, but the child paid no heed to it. Punishment followed, but still the little will held out. It was repeated, with no better success. Again was the trial made, the mother's heart crying to God for strength and guidance. At last the little offender was completely subdued, and became a most obedient, loving child. Once at midnight she waked her mother with the entreaty, "O, mother, pray for me, I am such a great sinner!" It was not long before she gave good evidence that she was "born again." That mother lived to hear her say, with pallid lips, "I thank you, mamma, for punishing me that day. If you had not, I would have died in my sins and gone to hell; but now I feel that my sins are forgiven, and I am going to Jesus."

Parent! will you not heed the lesson? But never punish a child when you cannot pray at the same time for God to bless the chastisement. A punishment given in anger, will do more harm than good.

American Messenger

WHIP ME, BUT DON'T CRY.

A pious father had devoted great attention to the education of his son, who had maintained an unblemished reputation until the age of fourteen, when he was detected in a deliberate falsehood.

The father's grief was great, and he determined to punish the offender severely. He made the subject one of prayer, for it was too important in his esteem to be passed over as a common occurrence of the day. He then called his son, and prepared to inflict the punishment. But the fountain of the father's heart was broken up. He wept aloud. For a moment the lad seemed confused. He saw the struggle between love and justice in his parent's bosom, and broke out with all his usual ingenuousness, "Father, father, whip me as much as you please, but don't cry."

The point was gained. The father saw that the lad's character was sensibly affected by this incident. He grew up, and became one of the most distinguished Christian ministers in America.

ONE OF GOD'S BIRDIES.

You would love little May Warren, if you knew her, I am sure. She is such a sweet little thing, that I believe I speak the truth in saying that everybody loves her who has had the pleasure of looking into her bright face.

"Please, mother, let me go to school with cousin Willie this morning," said she, one day, running into the room where her mother sat with her baby brother; "please do, mother, I will be real good."

"Let you go to school, dear!" answered her mother, kissing the rosy lips held up to her; "and where is Willie?"

"Here, auntie," said he, coming in at the open door, with [illegible] black eyes sparkling with mischief, as usual, and his cheeks glowing like the roses that peeped in at the open window.

"Yes, little May may go to school this morning, if she will be very good, and mind Willie, and promise to take care of her."

"Oh! you are so good," said May, throwing her arms around her mother's neck, and giving a half-dozen kisses; then she danced off for her sun bonnet, and soon she and Willie were racing down the broad gravelled path to the gate.

It was a [illegible] morning. The dew drops sparkled on the grass and trees by the roadside, and the dandelions and buttercups in the meadow looked up to the blue sky with a bright smile on their [illegible] while the birds were doing their best to put their happiness to music.

Just as the children came to the bridge over the little brook that went dancing merrily along in the golden sunlight, Willie's bright eyes caught a glimpse of a robin, hopping along by the road side with a bit of dried grass in his bill—probably building-material for his nest.

"Keep still, May," whispered Willie, quickly. "Don't say a word," and he stopped to pick up a stone that lay at his feet. But May caught hold of his arm just as he raised it to throw.

"Don't, Willie!" she cried; "it's one of God's birdies. Don't hurt it, please."

Willie stopped, and looked at her a moment in astonishment, and said:—

"What a queer girl you are, May! Well, I won't hit him now, just to please you; and I couldn't any way, for see! he has flown away," and the children hurried on to school.

A day or two after, Willie was going on an errand for his mother, when he saw a little kitten running along the road, and his first thought was to look for a stone to throw; but his next one was:—

"I suppose May would say that was one of God's kitties. What a funny girl she is!" and the kitten was not hurt that time.

Willie is a big boy now, but when he is tempted to hurt any innocent animal, he always thinks of little May's words, "one of God's creatures," and they are never harmed by him.—Child at Home.

WHO CAN DELINEATE A GENTLEMAN?

Shakespeare is able to delineate a gentleman—one, that is, who, while nobly and profoundly a man, is so delicately individualized, that the impression of him, however vigorous and commanding, cannot be harsh: Shakespeare is equal to this task, but even so very able a painter as Fielding is not. His Squire Western and Parson Adams are exquisite, his Allworthy [illegible] tan Colonel Esmond of Thackeray is not to be [illegible] in the rough, sparkle better than

Messrs. Baugh & Sons: Gentlemen,—I have been using your article of Super Phosphate on wheat and corn for several seasons, and am well satisfied of its value as an active and "paying" fertilizer. I have applied it on wheat at the rate of 300 pounds per acre, alongside of a heavy coat of barn-yard manure, kept dry and under cover, and the result was, that by harvest the wheat where the Phosphate was put, was ready for better handled and heavier, while the grass was taken more strongly than on the other portion of the field. I have also used the Phosphate by the side of Peruvian Guano, each to the same quantity, and in regard to both grain and grass, the latter is [illegible] manure. I [illegible] by my own, my experience in its use has been the [illegible] money laid out.
Yours respectfully, ISAAC T. LEWIS.
Western Branch, Delaware Co., Pa., July 23d, 1860.
Messrs. Baugh & Sons:—Being anxious last season to test some prepared manures offered for sale, I was induced by your agent to [illegible] your [illegible] Super Phosphate, and used them on three acres of [illegible] side, in the same field. I purchased Peruvian Guano and Super [illegible] New Bone Super Phosphate, and used them on three acres of [illegible] Peruvian Guano, as well as the gathering of the crop, the last resulted well [illegible] in favor of the latter.
But whether it is from the seeds and sets in preparing, or in the [illegible] [illegible] I cheerfully award you the result of my trials, thinking that others may be induced to make similar experiments, and in my opinion, greatly to the pecuniary and national interests of the whole country.
Yours, &c., JAMES DUNWOODY.

[illegible] having your Super Phosphate, brought of John W. Christman, at the Montgomery Ch. Agricultural Store, on the 4th inst., I [illegible] with pleasure recommend it. The effect it produced was so manifest, that it greatly increased [illegible] to the value of your Fertilizer. Where it was applied to the wheat, there did it [illegible] the greatest [illegible], [illegible] and [illegible] was fully equal to the [illegible], which had a heavy coat of barn-yard manure. Where it was applied to the corn, I am satisfied the yield [illegible]

This superior Regulator and Economizer of gas is so simple and practically effective in its operation that it at once recommended itself to the [illegible] public. The great advantages of this invention over all others is, that its operative principle, a central spring which accommodates motion to the street pressure, being surrounded within a brass tube, it is fully protected from the corrosive and impure gases of the gas, and, therefore, be not liable to get out of order. Its working is very perfect, securing to the consumer a saving of gas, from 20 to 50 per cent. with a clearer, more pleasant and steady light, free from all sooting, flaring, or other irregularity of the flame affording a soft, mellow light, far less harmful, and more agreeable to the sight.

INDEPENDENCE BELL.

BY REV H SHERIDAN.

Thou cherished relic of the time
That nerved our fathers' hearts and hands,
To execute the deeds sublime
Whose fame has rung through distant lands,
Though we, the children, never may
Thy tones, now long suspended, hear,
As on our Freedom's natal day
They chim'd like music on the ear;
We yet with double interest turn
Thy form to honor and admire,
As freedom now is onward borne
To be baptized with blood and fire,
To take a higher, purer stand
Before the face of every land.

Philadelphia, April 5, 1862

IN MEMORIAM.

Another little form asleep,
And a little spirit gone;
Another little voice is hushed,
And a little angel born.
Two little feet have gone the way
To the home beyond the skies,
And our hearts are like the void that comes
When a strain of music dies.

A pair of little baby shoes,
And a look of golden hair;
The toy our little darling loved,
And the dress she used to wear;
The little grave in the shady nook
Where the flowers love to grow
And those are all of the little hope
That came three years ago.

The birds sit on the branch above,
And sing a requiem
To the beautiful little sleeping form
That used to sing to them.
But never again will the little lips
To their songs of love reply;
For that silvery voice is blended with
The minstrelsy on high.

Selections.

MOB LAW.

The papers which think that Mr. Wendell Phillips was served right when he was mobbed in Cincinnati are the same papers that thought the speech of Mr Yancey at the Cooper Institute, just before the election of 1860, a very eloquent oration, and profoundly worth public attention. In that speech Mr. Yancey told us that slavery was a grand thing, and if we undertook to censure it by electing Mr. Lincoln slavery could not think of submitting to such an indignity, and must necessarily break up the Union. There was no report of rotten eggs or rioting upon the occasion. It was simply a part of the effort to carry the election under threat of revolution.

When treason was struggling to make good what Mr. Yancey had said, Mr. Phillips declared in Cincinnatti that he was an abolitionist and a Union man (the telegraph said disunionist, but that was the very thing Mr. Phillips repudiated)—and he was mobbed for saying so. "Served him right," cry the papers that had so tender a heart and quick an ear for Mr Yancey.

Now let us have a fair understanding of this matter. Mr. Yancey was an open disunionist, so was Mr. Phillips. Mr. Yancey was for disunion because the dominance of slavery in the Government was threatened. Mr. Phillips because he thought the Government hopelessly committed to the protection of slavery. One thought that the Government was going to be just, therefore he was its enemy. The other thought that it was unjust, therefore he opposed it.

The mob in Cincinnati was an effort to solace treason. It was engineered doubtless by men who would betray that city to Jeff Davis to-morrow if they could. It is applauded by men who applauded Yancey—by men so utterly lost to manhood that a man who would destroy this Government for the sake of slavery is a more tolerable character than he who would have destroyed it for the sake of liberty. And the men and papers that commend this riot and anarchy, during which the foundations of society are imperilled, are the newspapers and the politicians who claim to be especially conservative and law-and-order-loving citizens! To save and favor slavery, which is the direct and personal enemy of every laboring man in the country, they applaud anarchy. They are as blind as they are vicious.

WASHINGTON'S VIEWS ON SLAVERY

Washington, while faithful still in his duties to his God, was not unconcerned in regard to the welfare of his country. Especially be manifested his true patriotism, as well as his unrestricted philanthropy, by his solicitude for that unhappy class whose wrongs and woes a retributive Providence sooner or later must avenge, if not redressed. At this crisis in our country's life, it is gratifying indeed to find that Washington was no friend to slavery. He thus expresses himself on this subject in a letter to Lafayette, who, inspired with the true principles of liberty, had made arrangements to emancipate the slaves on an estate in one of the French colonies: "The benevolence of your heart," he says, "my dear Marquis, is so conspicuous on all occasions, that I never wonder at fresh proofs of it; but your late purchase of an estate in the colony of Cayenne, with a view of emancipating the slaves, is a generous and noble proof of your humanity. Would to God a like spirit might diffuse itself generally in the minds of the people of this country." At another time he says to Robert Morris: "I hope it will not be conceived that it is my wish to hold the unhappy people who are the subject of this letter, in slavery. I can only say there is not a man living who wishes more sincerely than I do, to see a plan adopted for the abolition of it." In a letter to General Mercer, he says: "It is among my first wishes to see a plan adopted by which slavery in this country may be abolished by law." In his will he provides for the emancipation of all the slaves whom he held in his own right.

Hon Theo Frelinghuysen, President of Rutgers College New Brunswick, N. J., and one of the most honorable men of the country, died at his residence in Newark, N. J., in the 76th year of his age.

SKETCHES FROM WASHINGTON

What now? How do things look from this political stand point? I was in Maryland, New Jersey on the Atlantic, to Oregon and California on the Pacific, and within all that mighty belt of free states and territories, there is not a spot where the rebels have dared to advance an army, or unfurl a flag. And yet their boast was, that the battle-fields should not be on their own "sacred soil," but among the homes of the cowards of the North. Vain boasters! The war has lasted a year, and their feet have not touched our limits, except to enter our prisons! Again,—I look upon the border states, from Delaware to Missouri. They belonged to the South, and no power on earth could prevent their secession. But, lo! Delaware, Maryland, Western Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri, are virtually free, and destined to remain so forever! Eastern Virginia, North Carolina, and Tennessee, are fast coming into the same position. And again,—when I look at the cotton states, full of the finest soldiers in the world, who were to chase the Yankees and Hessians as the hurricane chases the flying leaves of the stricken frost bitten! Arkansas, Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, South Carolina, and Georgia, are trembling within their circle of fire, setting the torches to their dwellings, warehouses, and bridges, and so, like the Indians on the flaming prairies, fighting fire with fire. Alas for them! No pleasure have I in their sorrows, any more than in those which they have so wickedly brought upon us. But, so it is—they have sowed the wind, and are now, with a vengeance, reaping the whirlwind. O who could have anticipated such a conspiracy of iniquity, with such consequences of woe!

Meantime, here in Washington, the hoof of Providence stamps on the head of the serpent—the serpent in our political Eden,—the accursed corrupter of those who once bore the image of God, but seem now to have lost it, almost utterly, if not forever. No wonder, the head being thus trampled under foot, that the loosened and squirming coils of the monster, writhing through all the South, manifest so strongly the spreading pangs of death. All hail the day of emancipation here! All hail the day of prospective emancipation everywhere! Aha! thou rattle-snake, slavery! and art thou at last humbled in the dust? Would thou couldst suffer as thy victims, both white and black, have suffered!

Yet, after all, and always, I cannot give much credit to human agency in this matter. I cannot but think that men have sadly mismanaged the whole slavery agitation. How the abolitionists denounced the colonizationists, more bitterly than they did the slave-holders themselves, and more to their faces, as being among them. And how, in like manner, the colonizationists opposed the abolitionists. And now, what is the Providential solution? Emancipation and colonization both! Not compulsory colonization, Senator DOOLITTLE says. Very well; that is right. And I might say, in Hebrew style, not compulsory emancipation either. Are there not some slaves who would prefer to remain as they are, in good hands, with kind masters, and in their native land? Why not lead such to the door-posts and bore their ears? And then again, may it not be said, no compulsory exclusion of them from any State? Is not such exclusion cruel? Besides, is it not needless? Providence will rightly determine this, as every thing else. As I regard the whole development, "It is the Lord's doing;" and in view of its suddenness and majesty, may well be "marvellous in our eyes." Every day I am more and more prompted to exclaim, in hearing of the President and his Cabinet, and of Congress, and of the army and navy—FOLLOW IN SILENCE! Don't try to forestall Providence. Our trust now is, that after all human mismanagement, infinite Wisdom is about to vindicate its own honor in the best possible settlement of the case. O, for grace to be docile and obedient!

Yesterday, and I suppose to-day also, the detention of General STONE, without charge or trial, was before the Senate, on a motion of inquiry by Mr. MCDOUGALL, of California. Mr. WADE, of Ohio, replied to Mr. MCDOUGALL quite sharply; and it would seem that we must still exercise confidence in the simple assurance, that the authorities have acted on sufficient evidence. Certainly, let who may be responsible for it, the Ball's Bluff sacrifice was one of the greatest blunders of the war—if not gross treason. My own mind has rested on these three faults: 1. Shelling the woods on the Virginia shore, from the Maryland shore, Sabbath afternoon, as if to give the enemy a signal for preparation. It will be remembered no reply was made. 2. The want of transports. 3. The failure to furnish reinforcements.

By the way, do you not see how the Sabbath is still providentially vindicated? The march for Big Bethel, if I mistake not, started on Sabbath night. Ball's Run, Ball's Bluff, Somerset, Winchester, and Pittsburgh Landing, have all shown the same result of Sabbath unrest. It is a serious vindication; but the Sabbath is of sufficient importance to justify even more impressive judgments. Strange, that men cannot see its utility, beauty, and glory—its universal and perpetual adaptation to the whole work of redemption; and the absolute indispensableness of maintaining its divine authority and sanctity!

FREEDOM—ALL HAIL!

All hail the sixteenth day of April, 1862!—the first day of freedom in the District of Columbia, in the Capital of our Republic! All hail, with thanksgiving to God, and gratulations to mankind! All hail, with special gratulations to those who now stand up, "redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled!"

"Thus shines the morning star!"

Sunrise is not far behind. If, taking "the wings of the morning," you can poise yourself in the shadowy rim of the horizon, and look over and downward a little, you will start back, dazzled by the near approach of the greater glory. O, thou King of glory! soon must all be day every soul! Amen. So be it, a thousand times over! Let the angels of history and prophecy sit down side by side, and each make her record. HISTORY, thus:—"April 16th, 1862. President LINCOLN announced to Congress that he had signed the bill for the immediate emancipation of slaves in the District of Columbia. Blessed be the name of the Lord forever!" PROPHECY, thus:—"——, 18——. President —— will announce to Congress, that, by co-operation of each of the Slave States with the United States Government in whole, the great and glorious work of emancipation has been consummated, and the entire territory of the Union made free forever. 'For ye shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace; the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands. Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle-tree; and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off."

Great is my daily rejoicing in the assurance that God has had his eyes on the dark and grievous iniquities of the slave conspiracy, and that He has suffered them to reach their present development only that, by overruling evil with good, He may accomplish deliverance for the slaves, and a just retribution to the traitors and rebels who have plotted so much wrong and promised so much suffering. Whatever credit may be due to good, wise, and brave men, as the instruments of Providence in this magnificent achievement, I am not at all disposed to withhold; but still my heart, and mind, and hands, and voice all tend heavenward with the preliminary acknowledgment,—forecasting yet greater things:—"Alleluia! for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth!"

Every advance, even though political, in the work of redemption, is cheering. Surely the time will come when the hopes of the ages will be realized in complete redemption; physical, mental, moral, political, and religious; in a word, all kinds of redemption.

"Come then, and added to Thy many crowns,
Receive one more,—the [illegible] of all the earth,
Thine own immortal wreath."

Christian's Pen.

GOD'S GOODNESS.

We see this everywhere. It shines all around us. We must shut our eyes or behold it. Sometimes men think they see in nature's laws evidences of tyranny, instead of goodness. But this arises from ignorance. We would notice, at present, one provision for managing the affairs of this world, which exhibits goodness in a very striking manner. It is seen in one of the very common things of life.

It is a law of heat that it expands all bodies with which it comes in contact. They consequently occupy a greater amount of space. Cold or a decrease of heat causes bodies to contract, and consequently occupy a less amount of space. There is just as much exactness to the law, and that exactness exhibits God's goodness as clearly that we would be left without a doubt was there no other evidence of that goodness.

Water freezes at a certain temperature, and becomes ice. That temperature is 32°. Now, water exhibits the same law as other bodies, viz., heat expands it and cold contracts it, except at a certain degree of temperature, when the law is reversed. And it is in the reversing of a natural law that we see God's goodness.

Take a stream of water at a temperature of 60 degrees. Apply cold to the top of it, and it will be contracted just like any other body. Being contracted, the same amount of it will occupy a less space. Hence, its specific gravity is increased, that is, it becomes heavier. And, as the particles of water move freely among each other, as a natural consequence, that part on the top, becoming the heaviest, will sink to the bottom, and the warmer, and consequently lighter portion, will arise to the top. Thus, the whole mass is cooled down. Now, if the law of heat and cold should hold true with reference to water as it does with reference to all other bodies, so far as known to men, the result would be, that the colder, and consequently heavier portion would continue to sink to the bottom, and the warmer would rise to the top, until the whole mass of water in the stream would be cooled down to the freezing point. The result would be, the whole would at once be converted into ice. But we find, that in fact, this is not the case. Ice, we know, forms on the top of the stream, and never to a very great thickness. How account for this? By remembering the simple fact, that this universal law of heat, is, by the goodness of God, reversed in the case of water, at a certain temperature.

We have supposed the temperature of the water to be 60 degrees. Now, as it cools down from that point, the cooler portion continues to contract, become heavier, and sink to the bottom, until it reaches a temperature of 40 degrees. But as it cools down from 40 to 32 degrees, (the latter being the freezing point,) the law of expansion and contraction, which holds good in all other cases, is reversed. Between 40 and 32 degrees, an increase of cold, instead of contracting water, expands it. Hence, it does not become heavier, as before, and sink to the bottom but lighter, and remains upon the top. The coldest portion of the water now being the lightest, and remaining upon the top, soon forms into ice, on the top of the stream, while the lower portion is not frozen. Ice being a very poor conductor of heat, the water below it, cools very slowly, and freezes but little. Hence, the ice does not, even during the continued cold of a severe winter, become very thick.

Now, see God's goodness in this arrangement. If it was not for his reversing this law, universal in all other cases, all our rivers and lakes would, as soon as the cold should become sufficiently intense to freeze water, become great masses of ice. As a natural consequence, all life in them would become extinct. The heat of the longest summer would do nothing more than melt these great masses a little on the top. See what loss; see what suffering must happen to men as the consequence. And then, see the goodness of God, in preventing it. Well may man exclaim; "The earth is full of the goodness of the Lord."

FREEDOM IN THE NATIONAL CAPITAL

A burning shame has been at length removed by law. The slave-master, slave-breeder, and slave-dealer are henceforth outlaws in the city of Washington. The act entitled, "An act for the release of certain persons held to service in the District of Columbia," has been signed by the President, and is consequently now a law. Thus, a great reproach has been finally wiped away. The nation will now breathe a little more freely. It can hold up its head in the presence of the civilized world, as it could not heretofore, while the old burden rested upon the national shoulders.

It seems strange that this deed, so becoming a great nation, was not performed long ago. Perhaps every statesman, like Mr. Lincoln, has never doubted the constitutional authority of Congress, to abolish slavery in the District, and certainly every lover of liberty desired, like the President, to see the National Capital freed from the institution in some satisfactory way. Why, then, was it not accomplished long ago? Simply because the spirit that at last broke out into open rebellion was the controlling power in the Capital. But when its "vaulting ambition o'erleaped itself," when, the better to secure the institution, rebellion was inaugurated, the oligarchy undesignedly gave slavery its death-blow. There is no reason whatever to suppose that slavery would have been abolished in Washington to-day, if the rebellious states had submitted quietly to lawful authority. The old financial, political, and social or "salaam" props would have been as pillars of iron to the institution. Now, however, these are chiefly taken away, and the love of freedom begins to appear.

There is another reason for the change. War, while it engenders many of the worst feelings, calls out also much that is praiseworthy. It makes men earnest, and forces them to fall back on the first principles of justice and freedom. All, even the most careless, feel that when the hosts are going forth to the battle, it is a time to put away sin. It is when men are in the fire, that their souls conceive and execute great deeds. Our revolutionary history illustrates this. When Jefferson poured "the soul of a continent" into the Declaration of Independence, he was the spokesman of men who had made their appeal to the bar of God, and felt that their only hope was in the righteousness of their cause. So now, the nation feels, as one expressed it in Congress, that it is always wise to be just.

Every Christian, every patriot ought to be thankful for the passage of this act of emancipation. It is a great moral victory—worth more than a dozen bloody triumphs on the field. It does not take away the stigma of the past, but it does gild the future with hope. It denationalizes slavery, takes away much of its prestige, and makes the capital worthy of the twenty millions of free men, who revere it as the centre of their national life.

Rev. Dr. K. WARNER, an able Missionary [illegible] in India, arrived with his family, in New York, on the 4th inst., having been compelled by the long illness of his wife to leave his field of labor.

DO YOU PRAY IN THE MORNING?

As you leave your bed in your very first act to kneel by your humble, and give your heavenly Father thanks for your protection during the night? Surely hours of sound sleep, the health enabling you to rise, the protection of your family from sickness and of your property from fire, with numberless other things we cannot mention, are things for which to be thankful. They are certainly worth thanking God for, if they are worth anything at all. When some of your household have been very sick, you have been but too thankful to obtain their recovery by nights of weary watching and by expensive fees of physicians. Is it worth less to have them and yourself kept entirely from sickness? For keeping you from pain and calamity, all that God asks of you is thankfulness and prayer—thankfulness for what He has done, prayer that the same divine good will be continued. If you were raised from the dead, you would think it but a small return to thank God for such a mercy. But your rising from sleep every morning is an act of less kindness on the part of God, and less importance to yourself only because it is so common and familiar. It is no less deserving of gratitude. And there is pleasure in expressing our thankfulness—no pleasure more delightful to the right kind of heart. It keeps open the springs of noble feelings and gives a high and generous tone to all the other affections.

At once bracing everything is favorable for a suitable and profitable approach to God. The very great mercies just mentioned fit us to come to Him with a deep sense of our obligations and of our dependence on Him as the author of our spiritual no less than our natural being. The passions of the soul, like serpents yet sleeping in their lair, have not been roused; the affections like morning flowers, are open to drink in from the Spirit of holiness the dews of Hermon and the dews that descend on the mountains of Zion. The sun of business has not yet risen with its scorching heat to wither up the pious feelings, and make them hang like wilted flowers on their stems. The tide of worldliness is out, and you can now walk along the strand to gather those shells in which lie truths more priceless than pearls, and where He who was so often found at morning's dawn on the shore at the sea of Galilee, may still be found by those who seek Him early. Like Mary, go very early in the morning to the tomb of Jesus by prayer, and like Mary you will still meet there with angels. It was when the dew lay round about the camp that Israel found the manna; here under the morning's dawn may we find every blade of scripture truth rich with the hidden manna, and the Spirit's heavenly dews.

The scholar knows that the morning is the best time for study, then the mind is clearer and the powers more vigorous. The Christian knows that the morning is the best time for prayer; then the faculties are clearer and the affections more ready than to control them to their meditations. The thoughts are less wandering; the emotions are calm and less broken. In coming to Jesus at that hour, we can run without weariness, with faculties fresh from repose, and have not to make our way through a thronging crowd of worldly passions and disturbing agitations. All nature, too, the brightening dawn, the glorious sun, the quietness yet hardly broken by the awakening hum of business, all are in harmony with the spirit of devotion, and seem waiting as though to give us time to pay our worship before the agitation be allowed to have arisen. And how much does this communion with Jesus add to our enjoyment of all these surrounding blessings and beauties! Of our meeting with Jesus, the Beloved, in morning prayer, we may say—

"Sweet is the breath of morn, her rising sweet,
With charm of earliest birds; pleasant the sun,
His orient beams on herb, tree, fruit, and flower,
Glistering with dew, fragrant the fertile earth
After soft showers; and sweet the coming on
Of grateful evening mild; then silent night
With this her solemn bird and this fair moon,
And these the gems of heaven, her starry train:
But neither breath of morn when she ascends
With charm of earliest birds, nor rising sun
On this delightful land, nor herb, fruit, flower,
Glistering with dew, nor fragrance after showers,
Nor grateful evening mild, nor silent night
With this her solemn bird, nor walk by moon,
Or glittering starlight, without Thee is sweet.
Jesus, my soul's Beloved, Lord of all."

All the beauties of nature, thus in unison with the spirit of devotion, are for drawing us to the throne of grace in thankfulness and prayer. And when we think of the dangers to which we must be exposed during the day, of the duties to be [illegible], of the temptations which no sagacity can foresee, against which no forethought can provide, and which no human strength unaided can resist; we [illegible] Lord at the mercy seat, to renew our strength and secure his guiding and guarding providence in our behalf. If as the day advances, you find yourself forgetting your Saviour and his love, becoming the prey of your irritable passions and the dupe of the tempter, neglecting pious duties and active only in the gain of ungodliness, ask yourself, Did I pray in secret this morning?

REVIEW OF THE PAST YEAR.

The year that has just closed has witnessed not only the commencement, the completed organization, the rapid and confident progress, the partial triumphs and incipient recognition abroad of the Southern rebellion; not only the trials of the National cause, the peril of a foreign war, the horrors of a prolonged period of seeming inaction, the loss of valuable lives, and in two or three instances of national prestige, but it has witnessed, too, the culmination, decline and inevitable swift approaches of the final overthrow of the Rebellion. For three months past, or during the entire period of renewed activity of the National forces, it has suffered—with the exception of the naval success of the Merrimac—an unbroken series of reverses [illegible] and overwhelming character. In strategy, it has been out-generalled, in forces it has been outnumbered. It has been driven from [illegible] it has been driven from [illegible] Kentucky, [illegible] Tennessee, [illegible] Missouri, [illegible] Arkansas have been captured, and its [illegible] have been thrown back,—[illegible] strength and lavish armaments, on the Potomac at Manassas Junction, at Forts Donelson and Henry, at Bowling Green, Columbus, and Island No. 10, has fallen into our hands. We cannot better represent to our readers the progress of our arms than by the following tabular view of the [illegible] tions which have taken place since the middle of January last:

Date.	Name.	Pieces of Artillery taken.
[illegible] 19.	Mill Spring,	[illegible]
[illegible]	Fort Henry,	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
" 8.	Elizabeth City,	[illegible]
" 16	Fort Donelson,	65
March [illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
" 1	New Madrid,	[illegible]
" 14.	Newbern,	60
" 25.	Winchester,	[illegible]
April 7.	Island No. 10,	[illegible]
" 7.	Eutonville,	150
" [illegible]	Pittsburgh Land'g	10

We have named only the scenes of [illegible] engagement and retreat before the advance of our forces [illegible] of the latter are of [illegible] ding Bowling Green, Columbus, with 40 cannon, Nashville, with 1600 sick and wounded rebel [illegible]diers, Winchester, Manassas [illegible] on the Potomac, with the small arms captured, of which 20,000 were reported taken at Fort Donelson alone.

These, then are the grand and sufficient reasons for the President's call for a Thanksgiving service on first Sabbath, in all the churches of our land. What a kind and gracious Providence is that which gives to the first year of the war of rebellion a close so suspicious to the cause of the Nation! which seems about to secure us against a second year of its awful ravages, and to settle our National existence on a stronger and better foundation than ever.

HOW A WOMAN'S PERSEVERANCE SECURED A FINE HOMESTEAD

The following is copied from a recent letter to the American Agriculturist, from one of its German subscribers in Tipton county, Ind., and is but an imperfect picture of what has occurred, and is still occurring, in many western localities:—"About twenty years ago a young couple came here, and built their house. Though the prairie was low, the purchase money nearly exhausted their means. They began with hard labor to build for themselves a future home here, and the wife, a rich, educated German girl, who never had a care, was at the side of her husband, and encouraged him to persevere. One day when they were trying to tell one of the big oak trees the man exhausted and discouraged, said: 'I think we had better give up, and try some other business, where we have not to work so hard.' The young wife looked up, and said: 'No, my husband, don't be discouraged. Only persevere a little longer, and I am sure we shall succeed.' Her husband was so easily discouraged. 'Oh, but away!' she said, 'we will conquer these trees by and by, and make a home here.' Now, in fact, they have a beautiful farm of 200 acres. They are well off as people say. At the county fair the woman received premiums for her fine apples and grapes. The daughter had good needlework there, and the father [illegible] horses and mules. He has a thousand bushels of corn in his crib. He reads the Agriculturist; and procures good books for his wife and children to study. The husband often relates the story to a circle of friends, and says that he would not have had this farm and independent homestead, but for the perseverance and encouragement of his wife on that day."

DISCEDE. MORATOR

The excavations at the buried cities of Pompeii, Herculaneum, Pæstum and Capua are bringing to light numerous [illegible], under the [illegible] of appropriation of money by the government from the Neapolitan treasury. At present Naples has the work under its exclusive care and control. At Pompeii now [illegible] have been discovered, and there is [illegible] on the wall of what was probably a workshop of some kind, as [illegible] "Otiosis hic locus non est. Discede, Morator." This phrase is not for the lazy. Loosely translated, "This place is not for the lazy. Leave, delayer." The inscription is as good for industrious establishments [illegible] as in ancient times, as it was for those of ancient Pompeii. Its discovery is interesting from the fact that it shows that human nature was the same eighteen centuries ago in Italy as it now is in America; that there were lazy folks and loafers who would intrude into workshops, and waste the time or divert the attention of the workmen; and that it became necessary to put up inscriptions, giving a general warning to all such to "get!"

SHAVING AND BEARDS

It is a great saving of time to allow the beard to grow. Shaving is really a daily nuisance. A modern writer thus enumerates not the loss of time only, but, also, the loss of patience. "Perhaps, there is no ill to which male flesh supposes itself to be heir to, which it does not submit with better grace than the daily nuisance of shaving. The [illegible] dullness of the razor, and the abnormal grit of the strop—the over heat, or over coldness of the water—the unfeasability of the soap—the sleight slip that draws claret that will drip, drip, with bloody perseverance, until court-plaster beautifies the chin—the impossibility of shaving without a glass, and the possibility of shaving very miserably with one—the demand upon valise room when packing for a journey,"—these and many such like annoyances, who does not remember, that has ever been enslaved to the razor despotism?

But we spoke of the time spent in shaving. Southey says, "the poet Campbell asserted that every man who shaves himself, (and we think it would take much longer if he had to wait in a barber's shop,) every day, from the time his beard begins to grow, to the age of three score and ten, gains by that operation as much time as [illegible] to learn seven languages." Southey then proceeds to verify the calculations, and from experiment of the time consumed in the act of shaving, he finds that there would [illegible] seven languages, but fourteen, and this so thoroughly that he could read, write, and speak them sufficiently well for all ordinary purposes. He goes still farther, and concludes that, considering the [illegible] with the labor of acquiring, and the knowledge of [illegible] languages, would give for acquiring another, any one of remarkable aptitude could learn all the languages in which there are books to be preserved. In all this, he allows but ten minutes a-day. The opinion of such a man as Southey is surely entitled to some consideration.—Dr Campbell's Lectures on Homiletics.

MARRIAGE

From the German of [illegible]

BY REV. A. W. [illegible]

The nature of marriage is as many-sided and various as that of man himself. Like him it has a natural, a moral, and a religious aspect, and these three aspects are necessary to the realization of its idea. The natural is subordinate to the spiritual, but is not extinguished and annihilated by it. As, in general, it is not the business of man to ignore nature, but rather to bring it into the service of an enlightened and sanctified spirit, [illegible] it in this particular relation. [illegible] the natural [illegible] and [illegible] on this account that the marriage relation has indeed one chief design, but as it has more aims than one, any definition which assigns to it no more is unsatisfactory. The several definitions given to it vary in correctness accordingly as they either approach or depart from its religious or moral signification. The diversity of opinion in regard to it is owing to the different degrees of moral culture to which men have been raised; and so intimate [illegible] moral worth of a man may with certainty be formed from the views he entertains concerning the marriage [illegible].

Marriage may by virtue of its institution, already [illegible] of the human race, not only a natural, but a moral relation. It is [illegible] fact, namely, that it has gradually been elevated from [illegible] rism to a state of moral dignity. As little as man has gradually worked himself up from a brute to a state of humanity, just so little can this have been the case with the most important of all human [illegible]. Marriage [illegible] afterwards defiled, yea, in its [illegible] to exhibited the deepest degradation of man. "But in the beginning it was not so," says Christ; and the [illegible] turned by the laws and customs of the most ancient nations. Not only among the ancient Germans was marriage regarded as a sacred and indissoluble tie, but the history of the Roman empire, during the first few centuries, does not furnish a single instance of adultery; and the original laws of the ancient Greeks were [illegible] and rigorous, as was the custom obtaining among the ancient Germans. Even down to the close of ancient history, when all else was threatened to be swallowed up in dissolution and ruin, Plutarch preserves in his "Precepts for the married," a remnant of genuine moral principles, compared with which even much that has been written by Christian theologians appears pale and worthless.

But the [illegible] contradictions in reference to the moral signification of the marriage relation, met with in the lives and views of the heathen world, are not to be regarded as the origins [illegible] but as a sinful [illegible] of which [illegible] under the [illegible] patriarchs and the Mosaic laws presenting [illegible] not to be regarded as primitive, but as a necessary preparatory step towards Christian marriage, but only as exceptions, and are to be accounted for on the ground of Divine [illegible] with a great degeneracy of men. For we are [illegible] not only by Christ, but even in the Old Testament [illegible] appointed by God, and [illegible] to their ways is acceptable to [illegible] Woman Abraham took Hagar as a second wife, and [illegible] Jacob had [illegible] wives, and [illegible] [illegible]

INTERESTING ITEMS.

We call the special attention of our readers to our "District of Columbia Correspondence," in another column of the paper, which contains, among other items of interest, the two following: 1. "President Lincoln and Bishop Payne's Interview." This conference will doubtless be profitable to our people in the future. As wise and great men seek to improve such opportunities as may be presented for acquiring knowledge, the Chief of this great American Nation, having in his presence an ecclesiastical representative of the colored people of these United States, without doubt sought to make himself more thoroughly acquainted with the wants and capacities of that portion of his much despised but loyal subjects. And all who are acquainted with the mental ability of Bishop Payne and his zeal for his race, are satisfied that by this interview the President was favorably impressed.

2. This article or correspondence also informs us that a question relative to the call of a General Conference at an early date is under consideration in the Baltimore Conference. It must be conceded by all who are acquainted with the present state of the Church, that such a call is necessary; and as it requires the advice or consent of all the Annual Conference, per Discipline, it is hoped that all of our Conferences will follow the same example of the Baltimore Conference, and may our unhappy differences and discussions relative to the Episcopal question be brought to a close, and the peace and harmony of the Church preserved.

P. S.—We have in our possession an article from Bishop Nazrey, attempting to expose the fallacy of "Bishop Payne's Rejoinder." The brevity of our time did not allow us to get it in press for this number of the Recorder; it will appear in our next.

WESTERN TOUR.

Stopping on the way—Arrival in the city of Zanesville, Ohio, (where the Conference is held,)—Opening of Conference.

We left home on the 10th inst., at half-past 11 o'clock, A. M., on the Pittsburgh and Philadelphia Railroad,—a Road distinguished of late, and the only one, too, under the Union Star Spangled Banner, that crowd all the colored people, who cannot pass for white, and all the drunken Irish, and others, into the front car, one-half of which is used for smokers, making no difference as to how well raised and refined a lady may be; she, also, even if she is travelling alone, must go in among them, and stand or sit, as the case may be. My sister-in-law informed me that, when on her way from Washington city, with two little children, at Harrisburgh, Pa., they would not let her get into any other car than the front one, and who, had she worn a veil, might have passed; she was the only female in the car. Shame! shame! on such treatment.

But we must speak of our visits. We stopped at Harrisburgh on the following night that we left home, with Rev. R. P. Gibbs, the minister, and had a meeting, per arrangement; at the close of our discourse, brother Gibbs had a collection taken up for the missionary cause, &c. We had some thirty papers, or more, and they all went off in a short time. We also disposed of several Hymn-books. There is a living people here, who deserve much credit. Their preacher is a gentleman and a Christian, and we hope he will be returned to them for another year. At 8 o'clock, the next morning, after having taken the cars, we arrived in Pittsburgh, where we found many of my wife's old friends glad to see me. Sabbath morning, April 13th, we preached twice, in Allen Chapel and Wiley Church. Monday, 2 o'clock, P. M., left Pittsburgh in company with Revs. Watts, Hartwell, Jackson, and Gross, and arrived in Zanesville, Ohio, the seat of the Conference, at 11 o'clock, P. M., and stopped with brother William Fielding. We found Rev. James Shorter, father Fielding, and Rev. J. Divine, waiting at the depot for us. We also found Rev. C. H. Graham, our room mate, at our stopping-place. Tuesday morning, April 15th,—fine morning. Conference met at 9 o'clock, A. M. Bishop Rev. W P Quinn in the chair. Conference was opened, by Rev. L. Gross, by reading the 14th chapter of Luke, and singing, by the use of the hymn on page 289,—"Try us, O God, and search the ground of every sinful heart,"—and by prayer. The members of Conference were called by Rev. W. Watts, after which, on motion of Rev. S. Davis, brother Watts was elected Secretary of the Conference. On motion of Rev. J. Shorter, it was resolved that the chairman appoint all the Standing Committees, unless otherwise ordered. On motion of Rev. J. W. Divine, the bounds of Conference were fixed three cents from the altar in front, straight across the house. Conference decided to sit with open doors. On motion, Conference resolved to meet at 9 A. M., and adjourn at 12 M.; and meet at 2 P. M., and adjourn at 5 P. M. The Bishop then gave some wholesome instruction to the brethren, on the importance of punctual attendance on all occasions. The Bishop then proceeded to the Disciplinary questions, page 62, New Discipline, on finance, &c. The hour of adjournment having arrived, Conference adjourned till 2 o'clock. Two o'clock, P. M., Conference met, per adjournment. Bishop Quinn in the chair. Conference proceeded to the financial reports of the brethren, &c. The brethren are still coming in, and all are looking finely. The Conference members in attendance, seems to be large We must say that we had the pleasure of shaking hands with many of our old friends. In relation to the financial affairs, the brethren seem to come up generally pretty well

In order to catch the mail, we will close by saying that the Rev. Levin Gross was appointed to preach the Conference sermon. Text,—Genesis, xxviii. 12: "And he dreamed, and behold, a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven," &c. We forgot to say we are to meet to-morrow morning, at 9 o'clock, A. M. We shall endeavor to keep our readers posted on the doings of the Conference. E. WEAVER, Editor.

Wednesday morning, April 16th, 1862.—Conference met 9 o'clock, P. M. Bishop Quinn in the chair. Conference was opened by Rev. Charles Peters, by reading the 5th chapter of Thessalonians, and the offering up prayer to the Almighty. The roll was called, Minutes read and approved with some correction. Rev. J. A. Warren and S. Shorter objected to the word editor being applied to the present Book Steward. E Weaver arose and stated that, as the agent of the A. M. E. Book Concern and papers, that he, at the proper time and place, was prepared to meet the issue, squarely and fairly, &c. Conference adjourned 2 o'clock, P. M. The Conference then proceeded to the unfinished business on finances, &c. The examination of the brethren was then entered into by the Bishop, and all were found to stand fair except a few, which were disposed of per Discipline. Two o'clock, P. M. Conference met per adjournment, Bishop Quinn in the chair. Conference proceeded to the unfinished business. Bishop Quinn, by resolution of Conference, arose and reprimanded some of the brethren who were complained of. The hour of adjournment having arrived, the Rev. G. H. Graham was appointed to preach. Conference adjourned by singing and benediction.

Thursday morning, April 17th, 1862.—Conference met per adjournment. Bp Quinn in the chair. Conference was opened by Rev. S. T. Jones, by reading, singing, and addressing the throne of grace. The roll was called—Minutes read and approved. Rev. J. Shorter arose and read the approval by the President, of the Emancipation Bill in the District of Columbia, from the Ohio State Journal; when, on motion of Rev. J. A. Warren, a Committee of three were appointed to draw up a resolution expressive of the Conference. The Bishop then proceeded to the filling out of the Committees by motion. The Committee on letters and petitions report the hour of adjournment. Conference adjourned to meet at 2 o'clock, P. M. Conference met per adjournment. Conference, through Rev. James Shorter, moved that the CHRISTIAN RECORDER by me was fraught with much, &c., &c. Conference adjourned.

Friday morning, April the 18th, 1862.—Conference met per adjournment. Bp. Quinn in the chair. Conference was opened by singing and prayer. Minutes read; and, when on motion to approve, objections were made on the ground that the resolution offered by Brother I. Shorter in relation to the CHRISTIAN RECORDER, which was not strictly true. The Minutes were adopted with the understanding, tha a motion would be made for a re-consideration of the whole matter. Conference proceeded to hear and receive petitions for admission into the Conference Conference adjourned to meet at 2 o'clock, P. M. Conference met per adjournment. Bishop Quinn in the chair; and proceeded to the Disciplinary Questions. The 16th question was asked, &c. Conference adjourned to meet Saturday morning at 9 o'clock, A. M.

Saturday morning, April the 19th, 1862—Conference met. Bishop Quinn in the chair. Conference was opened by reading and prayer. Minutes read and approved. Conference proceeded to unfinished business, and to hear committee's report, &c. Conference adjourned to meet at 2 o'clock, P. M. Conference met, per adjournment. Bishop Quinn in the chair. Conference proceeded to the despatch of business A resolution was offered by Rev. James Shorter, that no man shall become a member of the itinerant after he is forty years old: the motion did not prevail. Conference adjourned to meet Monday morning, 9 o'clock, A. M.

Sabbath day preaching.—We preached at half-past 10 o'clock—at 3 o'clock by Rev. John A. Warren—and at 7½ o'clock by Rev. William Watts. Monday morning, 9 o'clock, A. M. Bishop Quinn in the chair. Minutes read and approved—some of the Committees reported. After which the General Book Steward and Editor made his report. The report was received; when, on motion of Rev. John Peck, That whereas resolutions were offered by Rev. James Shorter, blaming the General Book Steward for having assumed a position as Editor in violation of the law of the General Conference be rescinded, as it was not true. Carried,—14 for it, 8 against. After that another resolution was offered, that the General Conference did not intend to blend the two together. The vote stood—13, that the General Conference did not intend to, and 11 voted that the law governing the case put the two offices into one. The written Statute Law on page 215, chapter conclusive, which blends these two offices into one, which is as plain as two and two make four. Conference adjourned to meet at 2 o'clock, P. M. Two o'clock, P. M. Conference met, per adjournment. Bishop Quinn in the chair. Bishop A. R. Green was acknowledged by the Ohio Conference to be the Bishop of the British Methodist Episcopal Church, and took his seat upon the platform. The Conference proceed to the unfinished business. Conference elected Rev. James Shorter and John Tibb to meet in counsel with the Bishops in Philadelphia. Conference adjourned to meet on Tuesday morning, April the 22d. Conference met—Bishop Quinn in the chair.—Conference was opened by singing and prayer—roll was called—minutes read and approved. Conference proceeded to the unfinished business, &c. The case of Rev. James A. Reese, for some act of immorality came up; by a motion he was expelled from all official standing, until he meet a Committee, who shall have power to restore or expel him, &c. Conference adjourned to meet at 2 o'clock, P. M.

Two o'clock, P. M.—Conference met, per adjournment. Some several brethren joined Conference,—took in several in the itinerant service, and also Conference membership. Rev. John Tibb, preached the ordination sermon from Exodus xiv. 13. Then the Bishop proceeded to the ordination of some three or four deacons and three elders. It being five o'clock and we were to leave in the six o'clock train, we bade farewell to the brethren and friends, and made for the depot on our way to the Baltimore Conference. Many of the Brethren were at the depot to see us off. May the good Lord bless Rev. Brother Stanford, for his willingness to conduct the paper in our absence.

WEAVER

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. EDITOR:—Conference being in session, I have but little time to write news letters. Last Sabbath a week ago was a day of great interest in Georgetown, being the day set apart (by a resolution of the colored pastors of D. C.) for thanksgiving and prayer in view of emancipation in the D. C. An able sermon was preached in the morning by Bishop Payne; it was a sermon, indeed, full of wisdom lucidly and beautifully expressed; the advice it contained cannot fail to have a salutary effect upon those who heard it. As this sermon was prepared by the Bishop for the occasion above alluded to, it would be well for every one interested in the condition of the colored people to procure a copy, when it has passed through the hands of the publishers. In the afternoon a conversational and general love-feast meeting was held—the house was crowded to its utmost capacity. Many of the emancipated being present, the expression of gratitude by words, looks, and motions, going up to heaven's throne on this occasion, beyond all description. We venture to say a more heart-felt and earnest rejoicing was never beheld than was here.

Bishop Payne had quite a long and profitable interview with President Lincoln on Monday night last; the interview was not strictly private, Carl Schurz and Hon. E. Washburne coming in at the same time: the topic of conversation was the crisis through which the nation was passing. Bishop Payne assured his Excellency, "That he had the prayers of the colored people; and since the booming of rebel cannon in Charleston harbor, first broke the stillness of morn, as the shot fell on Sumter's walls, he had prayed that God would stand behind the Government at Washington, as he stood behind the throne of David, and the Government at Richmond might wax weaker and weaker." Mr. Lincoln replied, assuring the Bishop of his reliance on Divine Providence—expressing a hearty wish for the welfare of the colored race. The Bishop left the White House most favorably impressed.

The quiet, still, joyful manner in which the colored people received their freedom here, challenges admiration. I trust that Congressmen and others have seen enough of the colored people recently freed to convince them that they can and will take care of themselves—of the many contrabands who have recently been "turned loose" from time to time, I venture to say no one has seen them begging or loafing. There exists the greatest demand for their labor, and they are anxious to supply the demand. They are kept at Government quarters till employed—they do not have to wait long for this. I have often visited them, and spoken words of cheer, and see the kindling of aspiration—the development of manhood, as the prospect of freedom passed in review before them.

The Baltimore Annual Conference of A M E Church met on the 17th instant at Israel Church. Bishop Payne enjoys good health Most of the members were present at the opening of the session, looking well. I give you a synopsis of proceedings up to date. James Lynch was elected Secretary. Rev. H. M. Turner, assistant. Rev. A. W. Wayman, reporter for the press: our proceedings are published daily in the Washington Star and National Republican. The usual committees were appointed. Reports heard. The reports from the different circuits were very good, indeed, and proved that brethren were learning how to manage business—teaching the people their duty—and thus getting a proper support. Most of the circuits and stations have been visited with a gracious outpouring of the Holy Spirit.

Resolutions deploring the unhappy difficulties about the bishopric, and recommending the call of a General Conference at an early day, were offered by Rev. A. W. Wayman. Rev. J. M Brown moved to lay them on the table. Lost. Rev. J. M. Brown moved to postpone till the next day. Lost. A discussion upon the propriety of calling a General Conference then ensued—which discussion is now pending. The speedy passage of these resolutions are necessary to their efficacy, that they might reach the Ohio Conference before its adjournment; therefore, as Elder Brown appeared not to be in a hurry, James Lynch moved the previous question, which the Bishop (while he acknowledged it was in order according to parliamentary usage) refused to put, claiming that, in an ecclesiastical body, such usage was not binding.

I forgot to mention that the annual sermon was preached by Rev. J. J. Hurbert; it abounded in solemn truth; was full of glowing, religious feeling, and went to our hearts with power. It was pronounced to be an able effort.

The number of applications for admission into the itinerant work is large. The young men, with one exception, promise to be of great use in our field of labor.

Rev. Nicholson, one of these candidates, has proved one thing, that he is willing to suffer for his people. SAGES.

For the Christian Recorder.

The Committee of Bethel Church, appointed to superintend the making of garments for the Port Royal Contrabands, completed their labors on Thursday evening, the 17th inst. They have, in the course of two weeks, cut and made up two hundred and eighty-four garments, which have been delivered to the Receiving Committee of this city, and consigned to the agent at Port Royal Great praise is due to the ladies of Bethel Church, for the promptness with which they responded to the call of humanity. They have shown in this, that they need only directing to objects, on which to bestow Christian benevolence, and they are ready for the work. The thanks of the Committee are due to the ladies of St. Thomas' Episcopal Church, and also to the ladies of the Presbyterian churches, for the aid they so nobly afforded in completing the work. We trust, in some way, we shall be able to reciprocate the favor. We like the disposition that makes denominations no bar to Christian duty; it is truly the spirit of our fathers

For the Christian Recorder.

MR. EDITOR:—Dear Sir—I am glad to inform you that we, the people of Westchester, feel that we need a new church in this place, not only now, but have needed for some time past. We have striven for some time, but in vain. But we think that we can go ahead now. The young man that our Right Rev. Bishop sent us, is the very man we want. He has not been with us long, but has done much in the time. We have about two hundred young people here, some of whom do not go to church at all. Many of them called upon him, and agreed to be formed into a Society, to be styled the "Young Gentlemen and Ladies' Building Society," which was accordingly formed, and now they are going to give a grand supper, for the purpose of raising money to assist in building a new A. M. E. church in town, near the new school-house. Our young brother has great energy. He has called to see some of the most prominent people in Westchester. They say, all we have to do, is to commence, and they will help us. We have got the promise of ten dollars from one, ten from another, fifty from another, and eighteen from another. I am glad to see that the people are willing to help us. The supper will be given on the 30th of April. We hope to have a good time, and that many may patronize us. And if our brother Stevenson is re-appointed, may he succeed in building a church for us. H. SPENCE.

Westchester, April 22, 1862.

TWO CENT MONEY.

We call the special attention of the brethren to page 219, New Discipline, in relation to the two-cent money, and especially to the 16th paragraph under the same page. We do hope that all of our brethren having charge of circuits and stations will obey the General Conference of our beloved Zion, and commence in time to collect their two-cent money; and if the brethren have so far obeyed the law by making a collection every month, or every two months, we are quite sure that there will be a change in matters pertaining to our financial department. Suppose that Bethel Church, of Philadelphia, with over twelve hundred members, (we will say twelve hundred, though there is said to be some fifteen hundred,) should comply with the request; twenty-five times twelve would be three hundred (dollars,)—and this, it will be remembered, is only twenty-five cents a head. At the very lowest estimate, this is what Bethel Church will owe us at our Annual Conference.

The Union Church, placing the membership at two hundred, at twenty-five cents each, will be fifty dollars. Baltimore (Md.) Bethel Church has about twelve hundred members; suppose that she is caused to do her duty—that the minister should feel it his duty to see that each member pays his or her twenty-five cents per year; there would be three hundred dollars due the Book Steward, to be appropriated as per Discipline. Ebenezer Church has at least two hundred members, and twenty-five times two hundred is fifty dollars.

Now here would be seven hundred dollars,—leaving out Washington, New York, Brooklyn, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Louisville, Indianapolis, Chicago, and St. Louis, and besides hundreds of churches on circuits, and other stations where brethren are. If brethren will only do what the regulations of the Churchshave demanded of them, all would be well. We believe that there is not a member in our Church but what would consider it a great insult to say that they were too poor to pay the small sum of twenty-five cents a year for the benefit of the Book Concern and of our brethren who have labored hard to carry the glad tidings of the gospel to the dying world.

RELIGIOUS MEETING.

The Baltimore Annual Conference of the African M. E. Church assembled on Thursday morning in Israel Church, South Capitol Street, and was called to order by Bishop Payne, who conducted the religious services. The roll was called by J. M. Brown, Secretary of the last Conference.

On motion of A. W. Wayman, James Lynch was elected Secretary, and H. M. Turner, Assistant. A. W. Wayman was appointed Reporter

The usual standing committees were then appointed, viz.:

On public worship—D. Smith, D. W. Moore, J. Lynch On examination of candidates for orders—S. L Hammond, J. M. Brown, M. F Sluby, A. W. Wayman. On finance—D. W. Moore, D. Smith, James Lynch, A. W. Wayman. On missions—H. M. Turner, William H Hopkins, H. J. Rhodes. Memoirs—J J. Herbert, S. P. Hyard, William H. Waters. Education—M. F. Sluby, R. P. Gibbs, J. M. Brown, James Lynch. To publish the annual minutes—James Lynch, H. M. Turner. Memorials—J. M. Brown, W H Williams, R F. Wayman Post Office—Gilbert Waters. Book Concern—S. L. Hammond, J. R Henry, Alex. Johnson. Temperance—D. Redout, R F Wayman, J. Mills. On the wishes and wants of the churches—J. M. Brown, A. W. Wayman, J. J. Herbert.

The conference fixed their hour for meeting at nine o'clock, A. M., and adjournment at one o'clock.

A. W. Wayman presented a preamble and resolutions respecting the calling of an extra session of the General Conference to settle some Episcopal arrangement.

J. M. Brown moved to lay the resolution on the table.

D. W. Moore moved to amend by postponing the subject, and making it a special order for Friday morning at 11 o'clock.

The remainder of the session was occupied in financial business.

SECOND DAY—FRIDAY, 18.

Assembled at nine o'clock, Bishop Payne in the chair.

Religious services were conducted by Rev. S. L. Hammond, and the proceedings of the previous session were read and approved.

Rev. Mr. Shear, of the Presbyterian Church, and Rev. Mr Lambeth, of the M E Church, were introduced to the Conference by Bishop Payne.

The members completed their Financial Reports.

Richard A. Hall and Jacob Nicholson, formerly of the M. E. Church, were introduced to the Conference. They will be presented for membership during the session.

The hour of eleven having arrived, the order of the day was taken up, viz.: the preamble and resolutions offered by A. W. Wayman respecting the calling of an extra session of the General Conference. They were read by the Secretary.

A. W. Wayman rose and addressed the Conference for an hour in support of the resolutions

John M. Brown spoke in opposition to them till the hour of adjournment

The Conference reassembled at four o'clock to hear the annual sermon. The services were opened by singing and prayer. Rev. John J. Herbert announced as his text 120th Psalm, 6th verse—"He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him." His theme was the labors of the Christian minister and his reward.

After the close of the sermon, the Sacrament was administered to all the members of the Conference.

The appointments for preaching on Sabbath were then made

SUNDAY, 20

The several clergymen in attendance on the Conference preached in the various African churches, by appointment.

Israel Church—11 o'clock, R. W. Cain; 8 o'clock, William H. Williams; 7½ o'clock, John M Brown

K Street—11 o'clock, William Hopkins; 8 o'clock, W. H. Russell; 7½ o'clock, Richard A. Hall

Union Bethel—11 o'clock, John M Brown; 8 o'clock, H M Turner. 7½ o'clock, M F Sluby

Ebenezer, Georgetown—11 o'clock, J R Henry; 3 o'clock, A W Wayman; 7½ o'clock; R F Wayman.

Mount Zion Georgetown—11 o'clock, Daniel Ridout, 7½ o'clock, H J Rhoads

Allen's Chapel—11 o'clock, James Owen; 3 o'clock, Alex. Johnson; 7½ o'clock, Jacob Nicholson.

Asbury Chapel—11 o'clock, S. L. Hammond; 7½ o'clock, A W. Wayman.

Fifteenth St Presb Church—11 o'clock, H. M. Turner; 3 o'clock, R. H. Cain.

HABIT OF EXAGGERATION.

"I will skin you alive if you do that again," exclaimed a mother to a naughty child. It was a sort of hyperbolical expression that has crept into frequent use, with a multitude of other expressions of similar character. She did not mean that she should proceed to flay her little one as butchers would a calf or lamb. The execution of her threat would fill her own soul with excessive horror. She would not have strength to make much progress in the very barbarous work of skinning her child alive. It would not be motherly.

"I will whip you within an inch of your life," said a father to his erring son. This would be a terrible whipping indeed Coming so near to death's door with the rod would be revolting. But he did not mean this. He only meant that he would administer a very severe chastisement. No one would be more careful than he not to jeopardize the life of his son. His expression was only a form of exaggeration which society seems to tolerate.

How many precisely such speeches are made in almost every circle. "It was done quick as lightning." "He is as slow as a snail." "It is hot as an oven" "It is as cold as Greenland" There is no end to such expressions, and they indicate that the habit of exaggeration is very strong in the human family. Human nature seems inclined "to stretch the truth." That is the reason that such strange stories are told, often becoming magnified to such an extent, after having passed through several hands "A story loses nothing by travelling," is an old saying. It often grows like a ball of snow which school-fellows roll. Every tongue that repeats it gives it an additional turning over, by which it accumulates. Yet none mean to exaggerate.

It is a fault, however, is it not? May it not be a sin? It is certainly deceptive to tell a child that you will skin him alive, when you have no idea of perpetrating the infernal deed. Should we not talk as we mean? Let our yea be yea and nay nay. At least, this should be done to children.

CHRISTIAN PARENTS' CONFORMITY TO THE WORLD.

As I grow older as a parent, my views are changing fast to the degree of conformity to the world which we should allow to our children. I am horror-struck to count up the profligate children of pious persons, and even ministers. The door at which those influences enter which countervail parental instruction and example, I am persuaded, is yielding to the ways of good society. By dress, books, and amusements, an atmosphere is formed which is not that of Christianity. More than ever do I feel that our families must stand in a kind but determined opposition to the fashions of the world, breasting the waves, like the Eddystone lighthouse. And I have found nothing yet which requires more courage and independence than to rise even a little, but decidedly, above the par of the religious world around us. Surely the way in which we commonly go on is not that way of self-denial and sacrifice and cross-bearing which the New Testament talks of. Then is the offence of the Cross ceased. Our slender influence on the circle of our friends is often to be traced to our leaving so little between us.

Rev. Dr Jas. W. Alexander's Letters.

BIG AND LITTLE TROUBLES.

The sting of a wasp or the prick of a pin often gives more acute pain than the gash inflicted by a lancet. So, as we pass through life, our minor sorrows are frequently harder to bear than our great afflictions Very heavy troubles either deaden our sense of suffering by the violence of the shock, or else excite an unwonted, unnatural strength, which enables us to stand firm against the blow. But the minor evils of life annoy us—irritate us; we chafe against them, and can neither patiently endure, nor manfully fight against them And thus it is that we often see those whom we have most reverenced for having nobly borne great trials, the first to sink under lesser ones.

A CHRONICLE FOR THE EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN SYNOD OF VIRGINIA.

[The following piece of present church history of a sister denomination presents statements of facts that are worthy of perusal by all.]

The Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Virginia, at its convention, held at Mount Tabor, Augusta county, Va, October 18–22, 1861, felt itself called on, amid the terrible agitations of our times, to give expression in various ways to its judgments and its sympathies touching our civil strife.

The retiring President, Rev J. P. Kline, in his Report, given:—

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE PRESENT WAR.

It is as follows:—"Twelve of the Southern States have seceded from the United States Government. As that Government is attempting to bring back said States into the Union, a civil war has ensued which has convulsed our whole land; has already cost many valuable lives, and brought distress into numerous families." On this Committee, No. 1 reported: "that we are fully persuaded that the present defensive war, maintained by us against an invading foe, is just and righteous. We heartily approve of the conduct of our brethren serving in our Confederate Army." This Report was adopted The Executive Committee on Home Missions speak of this, "unhappy war which has been forced upon the South for the preservation of its liberties and rights, nay, for its very existence." In deep sorrow that any part of a Church so pre-eminently loyal as the Lutheran Church, should sully its fair character by such statements and resolves, we wish to submit a brief chronicle of a few facts, which will show how utterly without warrant the Virginia Synod has cast its lot with insurrection, rebellion and treason.

The Richmond Inquirer, of December 24th, 1860, announced that Mr Lincoln would be forced to [illegible] Washington, and suggested the prompt interference of Maryland and Virginia to prevent his inauguration at Washington by taking possession of the capital without delay It was asserted as a fact well known, that previous to the close of 1860, "military companies had been [illegible] and drilled for months in Maryland and Virginia, and that the distinct object of their organization was to aid in the seizure of Washington city in the interest of the disunionists, or the prevention, by force, of Lincoln's inauguration. Some of the less prudent of these leaders boasted, in private circles, that they had five thousand men ready to strike the blow upon the concerted signal being given."

On April 12th, 1861, in reply to a deputation from General Beauregard, Major Anderson declared that he would evacuate Fort Sumter on the 15th, if not previously ordered or not supplied, and that he would not, in the meantime, open his fire unless compelled by some hostile act against his fort or the flag of his Government. At half past three, the officers who received the answer, notified Major Anderson that the batteries under the command of General Beauregard would open on Fort Sumter in one hour. The result was that Sumter fell. On that very day the Virginia Commissioners waited on President Lincoln to ask him to communicate the policy he intended to pursue to the Confederate States. The President, in his reply, repeated, as the best expression he could give to his purposes, the words of his inaugural: "Beyond what is necessary for these objects, (to hold, occupy, and possess property and places belonging to the Government) there will be no invasion, no using of force against, or among the people any where" "I shall not attempt to collect the duties and imports by any armed invasion of any part of the country" On the very day that President Lincoln uttered these words, perhaps the mildest that ever came from merely human lips under such extreme provocation, the Richmond Inquirer said: "Attention, volunteers! Nothing is more probable than that President Davis will soon march an army through North Carolina and Virginia to Washington. Those of our volunteers who desire to join the Southern Army as it passes through our borders had better organize at once."

On April 16th, Virginia being still, even by the confession of secessionists, in the Union, her governor returned an insulting reply to the call of the President; and, on the 17th, that same insolent functionary took it upon himself to recognise, in a proclamation, the independence of the Confederate States, which recognition, even on the Southern theory of States' rights, was an act of high treason. On the same day, the State Convention passed an ordinance of secession, to be submitted to the people, and to take effect only "when ratified by a majority of the votes of the people at a poll to be taken thereon the fourth Thursday of May next." That same day the harbor of Norfolk was obstructed by the sinking of boats by order of Governor Letcher.

The next day, Lieutenant Jones, in command of Harper's Ferry, under advice that a large force had been ordered by Governor Letcher to take his post, prepared to destroy the Government property he could no longer defend. When his picket guard gave the alarm that 600 Virginians were approaching by the Winchester Road, his men retreated. The people fired upon the soldiers, killing two of them. The first blood shed in this fearful war was shed in the Valley of Virginia, in the bounds of the Virginia Synod, Virginia herself yet being in the Union, the blood, not of invaders, but of innocent men in flight.

April 20th, Virginia being still in the Union, Gosport Navy Yard was destroyed to prevent its falling into the hands of the Secessionists, who occupied Norfolk and Portsmouth in force under General Taliafero.

On April 23d, the First South Carolina Regiment of volunteers left Charleston for the Potomac. What was the spirit of the secession part of Virginia, we are told by the Richmond Examiner of the same day. It says: "The capture of Washington city is perfectly within the power of Virginia and Maryland, if Virginia will only make the proper effort by her constituted authorities; nor is there a single moment to lose, the entire population past for the onset; there never was half the unanimity among the people before, nor a tithe of the zeal upon any subject that is now manifested to take Washington, and drive from it every Black Republican who is a dweller there. From the mountain tops and valleys to the shores of the sea there is one wild shout of fierce resolve to capture Washington city at all and every human hazard. The filthy cage of unclean birds must and will assuredly be purified by fire. The people are determined upon it, and are clamorous for a leader to conduct them to the onslaught. That leader will assuredly arise, and that right speedily."

On the 25th of April, Governor Letcher issued a proclamation, announcing the transfer of the State to the government of the Southern Confederacy. A. H. Stephens in his speech at Atlanta, Ga., April 30th, says: "I have just returned from a mission to Old Virginia. It will be gratifying to you to state, that she is not only out of the Union, but she is a member of the Southern Confederacy, and has sent delegates to our Congress now assembled."

Within the bounds of the Synod of Virginia, at Winchester, May 10th, just one week before the election to decide on secession, Senator Mason wrote, for the Winchester Virginian, a letter in which he assumes that Virginia was at that time both out of the Union and in it. He says: "The ordinance of secession withdrew the State of Virginia from the Union, with all the consequences resulting from the separation. It annulled the Constitution and the laws of the United States within the limits of the State, and absolved the citizens of Virginia from all obligations and obedience to them." That would seem to settle it, that Virginia was out. But with a logic whose inspiration must have found its spring under a cork, this noble senator pursues his argument thus: "Hence it follows, if this ordinance be rejected by the people, the State of Virginia will remain in the Union, and the people of the State will remain bound by the Constitution of the United States." That seems to make it equally clear that Virginia was in; and as Mr. Mason's "hence" seems to make it, was in because she was out.

Mr Mason, in that letter declares of Virginia, that as "a member of the Union all her resources of men and money will be at the command of the Government of the Union." In the next paragraph he states, "We have now at Harper's Ferry and at Norfolk, in face of the common foe, several thousand of the gallant sons of South Carolina, &c."—and says furthermore: "Treason against the United States consists as well 'in adhering to its enemies and giving them aid,' as in levying war." Then comes a sentence, which, for malignant impudence, beats everything in the record of human language: "If it be asked what are those to do, who, in their consciences, cannot vote to separate Virginia from the United States—the answer is simple and plain: honor and duty alike require that they should not vote on the question; if they retain such opinions, they never leave the State"—and under the pressure of such sentiments, one of the best beloved, and most prudent members of the Virginia Synod, among many others, did leave the State.

We take it for granted that Mr. Mason presented what was considered the most satisfactory line of argument by secessionists. How does it look? It was presented

Port Royal Contrabands.—At a meeting held on Wednesday evening, at the Philadelphia Institute, by the Executive Committee of the Statistical Association of Colored People, of this city, the following resolutions were passed, which were read at the close of a concert by the Hutchinson Family last evening, given in aid of the escaped slaves at Port Royal:

Resolved, That the claims of the "Contrabands" in the vicinity of Port Royal and elsewhere call loudly upon the friends of humanity for material aid and sympathy.

Resolved, That while there is reason to regret that the Government has not more fully defined the status of these poor creatures, nevertheless it is clearly the duty of the Social, Civil and Statistical Association of the Colored People of Pennsylvania, not only to render aid as an organization, but also to commend these sufferers to the consideration of the various colored churches and societies of this city and State, that they may co-operate in the noble work of helping the Freedmen's Association or other proper enterprises, which have undertaken to furnish food, clothing, and teachers, moral and religious, so much needed to relieve immediate distress and to inspire them with hopes of final deliverance.

Resolved, That we cannot lose sight of the Act of Congress, passed at its extra session, or of those proclamations emanating from the several Generals and Commanders of the Army, in which freedom has been declared to the slaves of all parties aiding directly or indirectly the rebellion.

Resolved, That in view of these acts, the slaves cannot (in our judgment) be considered other than FREEMEN.

LETTER FROM A LUTHERAN CHAPLAIN.

Fort Saratoga, Head Quarters 112th Reg., P. V., April 15th, 1862.

Dear Bro. Krauth:—After a brief visit to my family, I am again at my post, and, encouraged by your great kindness, will venture another communication upon your editorial consideration. Let me give you an account of my position and its duties; it will, however, first be necessary to refer to the disposition made of our regiment, and to give you a sketch of

OUR LOCATION.

This is a delightful spot. From our elevated site we have, on all sides, a succession of splendid views. Almost as far as the eye can reach, the landscape stretches out before us dotted with pleasant groves, peach orchards just budding into bloom, comfortable farm-houses, and not a few very fine residences. Upon our west, we see a splendid mansion, embowered in shrubbery, a noble monument of national benevolence and justice, the noted Soldier's Home. A little south-east of us, upon a commanding site is a beautiful grove of cedar, which obstructs our view of the capitol, stands, in sad loneliness, suggestive of solemn thoughts, an ancient, dilapidated Catholic church, deserted since the rebellion, and bearing evidences of the destructive dispositions of some rude, thoughtless soldiers. In the valley to the south-east runs the railroad between Baltimore and Washington, suggesting, with every passing train, thoughts of home and loved ones; and, away off beyond, we see the Potomac rolling its sluggish way to the ocean.

All around us we see the ravages of this unhappy war, in the destruction of fences, the mangling of graves, and the injury done to fields and houses. In almost all directions we can see the traces of former camps, the occupants of which have gone, some to eternity, some to pine away and die amid the gloomy surroundings of the hospital, and the remainder to participate in the painful "pomp and circumstance of glorious war."

The land here is rolling and well watered, the soil seems of good quality, and this, so near our national capital, might, and should, be a garden spot of our great country. But it seems generally neglected and in a poor state of cultivation.

Our regiment has possession of six forts, built upon the hills which stretch along the north-eastern boundary of the District of Columbia, and command the approaches to Washington from Maryland. They are strong earthworks, mounting each from four to twelve heavy guns, and are named respectively Forts Saratoga, Thayer, Lincoln, Bunker Hill, Stevens and Totten. The distance from the extreme right to the extreme left of our forts is about seven miles, which considerably scatters my charge, in reason my labors, and prevents me from accomplishing as much as I had hoped. In four of the forts we have two companies each; the other two are each garrisoned by one company. With this account of our locality, and the disposition of our regiment, you can better understand the nature and extent of

MY OFFICE AND ITS DUTIES.

Distributed, as our regiment is, between so many different posts, of course my labors are proportionally increased. My office requires me to promote the moral, social and spiritual welfare of the regiment, and my conscience prompts me to do this in the best way circumstances will permit. I cannot but feel the burden of my charge, and my utter inability to accomplish the vast work assigned to me. If there are any laborers in the Lord's vineyard who especially need the earnest prayers of God's people, they are the chaplains in our armies. Now, that our vast armies have been mustered, and are going on from victory to victory, a weighty anxiety forces itself upon the thoughtful mind, as to how we shall send our soldiers back from the demoralizing influences of the camp to the peaceful pursuits of civil life? Much, doubtless, depends upon the moral influence exerted by our chaplains, but therefore, the prayers of God's people ascend in our behalf, that the warmth of spiritual life may continue increasing ly to animate our own hearts, and that we may receive the divine aid in the discharge of our duties.

I have in charge about one thousand men of widely different tastes and temperaments; of various peculiarities, passions and prejudices; some trained beneath the blessed influences of the Christian hope, others permitted to grow up in the native wildness of our depraved nature; some having a decided interest in religion, others a manifest respect for it, while some are utterly indifferent to its claims, and others hold its very name in derision. We have here perhaps "young America," ranging from sixty years down to about sixteen, commingled, in beautiful confusion, with the sons of England, France, Germany, Ireland and Denmark. In my book I find the professors of almost every shade of Christian faith, and the professed disbelievers in the Bible and the entire Christian system.

To this singular combination of human elements, I content myself preaching the plainer truths of the gospel in the most practical style possible. My sermons—they are rather exhortations—are generally about twenty-five minutes long, and preached from a store-box, or anything convenient, in the open air. All our officers treat me with great respect, and kindly render me all the assistance in their power. Some, it is true, do not set as good an example to their men to attend service as they might. I have, however, but little occasion or disposition to complain, in this respect, as our general attendance is good, and the men are always respectfully attentive to the truth. We hold divine service at three of our forts each Sabbath, and thus alternate, which gives service to each fort every two weeks. At one of our forts, where two German companies are stationed, I have, from necessity and a desire to meet their wants, been regularly preaching in the German language. This is a new business for me, never having attempted to speak publicly in German before we came here; but, since my connexion with this regiment, I have felt the necessity of using all the German I knew, and diligently studying it, that I might be able to meet the wants of my charge. I have been highly commended by the officers on my success in German preaching, and I cheerfully recur for the increased labor it requires, by the gratification manifested by the men, and the permanent advantage it will be to me when I again return to the pulpit.

A principal part of my labor is the distribution of tracts and other religious literature among the men, with which I have been generously provided by Christian friends. Any kind of reading matter is received with much gratitude by the men, and I think, generally read. The men are prompted to read to pass away the time, and will read religious literature as readily as any other kind. We are hopefully sow important seed, and, in the ... [illegible] ... able conversation with the men. The hospital is an important part of our field. In it we can also ... [illegible] ... from a respectful hearing and kindly words of sympathy. There is nothing like affection to bring some sense to their senses, and to lead their minds to serious thoughts. A camp hospital is always a solemn although gloomy place; but we go to it with more encouragement than any other part of our field, and are generally received kindly and gratefully received. My visits are almost exclusively to the hospitals, and I spend late at night in the interval, and a part of the day with those unfortunate men. In it is my sad lot to see the ravages of disease and death. We have very little sickness in the regiment, and none whatever that is serious, and I have, of course, special calls to the hospital, but visit it to comfort and instruct its inmates, as often as circumstances permit.

I have been amazed at the crude, undigested notions, or rather the absolute ignorance of a large number of persons of the plainest truths of the gospel. One would hardly imagine that persons raised beneath the light of the Christian age and in the land where Christian truth is so widely disseminated, could be as ignorant of Christianity as some seem to be. But they have been neglected. They have grown up without culture. Has the Church done her whole duty? Have Christians been faithful? Let us ask and answer these questions in the fear of God. Let our noble Lutheran custom of catechisation be earnestly and vigorously attended to. It is one great hope of the Church and the world.

I am truly yours, &c., J. W. Haseltn,
Chaplain 112th Reg., P. V.

Chaplains in the Army.—From a letter of the Secretary of War to the House of Representatives, giving a list of the chaplains in the service, we find that there are four hundred and seventy two chaplains in the army. Of these New York has ninety seven, Pennsylvania, sixty-four, Massachusetts, nineteen, Maine, eleven; New Hampshire, six, Vermont, seven, Rhode Island, four; Connecticut, seven, New Jersey, eleven, Delaware, two, Maryland, three, Virginia, four; Kentucky, sixteen, Ohio, forty-four, Indiana, thirty, Illinois, forty six, Missouri, nine, Kansas, four; Iowa, twelve, Wisconsin, eleven, Michigan, thirteen; Minnesota, two.

American Bible Society.—The stated meeting of the Managers was held at the Bible House, Astor Place, on the 4th inst. One new auxiliary in Indiana was recognized. Communications were received from Agents and others in regard to the home work, especially stating the supply of soldiers and also of prisoners of war: from Rev. Ludwig S. Jacoby, Hermsu, sending annual account with this Society, and also stating the completion of stereotype-plates for a pocket reference German Bible, and showing increased openings for the spread of the Scriptures in Southern Russia and the German cantons in Switzerland; from Rev. J. J. Hoch, Moravian Missionary at Corn Island, Mosquito Coast, in regard to distribution of Scriptures granted by the Board, and requesting more; from the Rev. Pablo Sanchez, Gibraltar, returning thanks for a grant of books for Spain, and in regard to their distribution; from Rev. D. Kapelje, Amoy, sending financial account with this Society, and a statement with regard to the work in China; from Rev. Andrew Muir, St. Petersburg, in regard to Revel-Esthonian editions of the Scriptures, and the translation into Modern Russ now in progress; from Rev. W. Tracy, Madura, sending account with this Society, with a statement of the Bible-work as the Mission, and asking further aid, which was granted.

Grants of books were made to American and Foreign Christian Union, in Spanish, for Carthagenas; 154 volumes in Spanish, French, Italian and Portuguese to captains of vessels sailing to foreign ports; with various grants of smaller amount; and 9573 volumes for soldiers at Wisconsin, Missouri, South Carolina and elsewhere. To the Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church, $2400 were granted, and $800 to the Mission at Madura, referred to above.

Information having been received of the death of Horace Holden, Esq., a valued member of this Board, appropriate notice, which was adopted and ordered to be entered on the Journal, was presented by Rev. Dr. Spring, who delivered a deserved and eloquent tribute to the memory of the deceased.

Commodore Foote.—Commodore Foote is a progressive spirit. On his appointment to the command of the Western fleet—when, in reality, there was no fleet—he set about building his present gunboats, and in an incredibly short space of time he had a navy afloat and ready for service. The smoke of Fort Henry's bombardment had scarcely rolled away when he stood before the walls of Donelson, thundering at that stronghold. In consequence of severe injuries to his gunboats during this engagement, some of us feared they would not again be serviceable; but the gallant Commodore was equal to the emergency, and, before the people had done exulting over the Donelson affair, we found Commodore Foote knocking at Island No. 10, to unlock the Mississippi for his boats.

Monitor and Merrimac.—The combat between the Monitor and Merrimac, in Hampton Roads, was something more than a mere battle to embellish history. It was the first grand experiment that has shown to the world the comparative impregnability of iron-clad war-ships. It was a triumph of science and inventive genius, in which Americans should feel a pride.

A debate upon the merits of iron-clad ships and land batteries took place in the British Parliament on the 30th ult.

We learn that the House of Commons has decided to suspend work on the Spithead Fortifications, and is considering the expediency of using the money thus saved for the construction of armor-clad ships of war.

Magnanimity.—The rebels are as magnanimous as brave, and the two virtues are generally conjoined. The last illustration of this metaphysical truth comes all the way from Norfolk. The Day Book of that city, in consideration of the rather questionable fact that the battle of Shiloh was a victory for Beauregard, asks with a perfectly serious countenance: "Is it not a favorable time for the Confederate Government to propose to the Government at Washington a cessation of the fierce and unnatural strife?" The Day Book grows ecstatic as it meditates upon the ineffable sublimity that would mark such an overture.

Fortification Bill.—It is considered almost certain that the fortification bill now before Congress will be abandoned, and that the money intended to be appropriated for that object will be devoted to the building of more Monitors and armored vessels-of-war.

Fort Lowry.—Several of our gunboats have made a reconnoissance up the Rappahannock river, and captured Fort Lowry, mounting nine guns, together with a large amount of spoils.

Brownlow.—Parson Brownlow, the patriotic exile, arrived in Philadelphia at a late hour on Thursday evening.

General McClellan's Army.—The rebels attacked General Smith's division on Thursday evening, with the purpose of capturing his guns, but they were handsomely repulsed, and a number of prisoners taken. The Third Vermont Regiment had an engagement with the rebels on Wednesday, in which they lost thirty-two killed, and ninety wounded.

Report of the Senate Committee.—The select committee of the Senate, appointed in July last to inquire into the circumstances attending the surrender of the navy yard at Pensacola, the destruction of the property of the United States at Norfolk navy yard, and the armory at Harper's Ferry, and the abandoning of the same by the Federal forces, have made a report, in which they visit censure upon every one who can in any way be proved responsible for these disgraceful and ill advised movements.

Fredericksburg, Va.—General McDowell's division has advanced across the Rappahannock and occupied Fredericksburg. Before entering that place a skirmish took place, the Union loss amounting to five killed and fifteen wounded. Fredericksburg was the headquarters of General Johnston immediately after the evacuation of Manassas, but was in turn abandoned when General McClellan's army was transported to Fortress Monroe.

Banks.—General Banks still moves on; his army has entered Rockingham county. Ashby's cavalry endeavored to obstruct his advance, but were quickly dispersed. It is stated that General Jackson has a large army at Staunton, and as General Banks is gradually approaching him, a battle may not be far distant.

Fort Wright.—The bombardment of that place still continues, and the dates from that place up to Friday evening state that the garrison were making a stubborn resistance. The rebels have forty guns in position, and the forces are commanded by Gen. Bragg.

Pulaski.—Our brave seamen were permitted to take a part in the bombardment. Under the command of Captain Rodgers, of the Wabash, they manned one of the best Federal batteries, whose aim [illegible] had a powerful effect upon the rebels, and he paid great care to continue them that the only target was surrender.

The Rebels Leaving the Valley of Virginia.—The War Department has information of the evacuation [illegible] of the valley of Virginia by the rebels, they retreating on Charlottesville.

Mr Charles A. Dana, for many years acting chief editor of the New York Tribune, has retired from that paper, not leaving entirely with the policy which it has been determined that paper shall pursue.

Ex Senator Gwynn of California, is said to be in Richmond, Va., and, it may be supposed, in strong sympathy with the Southern Rebellion.

Major General John E. Wool, commanding at ... [illegible] ... on the 19th inst., on the fifty-first year of his active service in the Army of the United States.

Hon. Charles Sumner and Wm D. Kelley presented, the former to the United States Senate, and the latter to the House of Representatives, a petition signed by over 10,000 married women, and over 200 men long, asking for action that would result in the extinction of slavery throughout the entire country.

Henry Clay, whose father fell fighting gloriously at Buena Vista in the Mexican War, and whose grandfather was a man whom the American people will never forget, telegraphs from Pittsburgh Landing, April 10th, saying, "We have won a great battle. The Second Division is famous. I am safe." He was aid of General Johnson, in Brigadier-General McCall's Division.

Nicholas S. Vedder, the last of the soldiers of the Revolution in Schenectady County, New York, died on the 7th instant, aged one hundred years and three months, closing his days within two miles of the place of his birth, and having never lived at a greater distance from it.

Bayard Taylor, the well-known traveller, writer and lecturer, has been appointed Secretary of Legation to St. Petersburgh, under Hon. Simon Cameron, the United States Minister to Russia.

Foreign Summary.

The affairs of Liberia seem in a steadily progressing state for good every way. Every year makes its interest to the colored man more and more manifest. On the 23d of January last, the College of Liberia, at Monrovia, was opened under very gratifying auspices. The President of Liberia, his Cabinet, and the members of the Legislature, attended. The Hon. B. J. Drayton delivered an able oration, and ex-President J. J. Roberts, and Rev. E. W. Bryden, Professor in the College, followed with inaugural addresses. These are all colored men, many of whom were once slaves in the United States.

Not long since, quite a sensation was produced by a book of African Explorations, from the pen of M. de Chaillé. Its veracity was called in question by several persons abroad, and now the African traders, who are familiar with the country and the distances over which he professes to have travelled, say that in his first tour at Camma he overrates his farthest point by more than double the distance. If he mistakes or exaggerates in a simple statement like this, little confidence can be placed in his statement of other things.

The number of Jews in Paris is well known to be very large; and it is not a little singular they have ever had but one place of worship; that is in the Rue Notre Dame de Nazareth. Two more synagogues, however, are now about to be erected—one in the Rue de la Victoire, and the other in the Marais. The cost for ground and building is estimated to be three million francs—about six hundred thousand dollars.

Rebellions are no new or uncommon things, if we may judge from the recorded facts of English History. No less than thirty-seven are detailed at length as occurring between the time of William the Conqueror, A. D. 1069, and the Irish outbreak in 1853. Surely, one well-defined rebellion in the history of the United States ought not to be a marvel.

A peculiarly untrue and foolish story is going the rounds of some of the papers of a secret, and consequently, by the laws of England, unlawful marriage of the Prince of Wales to a young lady not far from the Military Training School at the Curragh of Kildare, Ireland. It is no new thing for such reports to be put in circulation respecting young Princes—and time will probably show that this is like many a similar story, the real solution of which lies in the fact that the wish is the father of the thought.

Large expectations are formed of the attendants upon the approaching great Exhibition. Royalty, especially, is looked for. The Emperor of the French, the King of the Belgians, the Viceroy of Egypt, and the King and Crown Prince of Prussia, are reported as expecting to be present. A commission is appointed to open it.

The prospects of the Wheat Crop in Great Britain are spoken of as much more favorable than last year. The importations of wheat and flour there amounted to one hundred and fifty millions of dollars, some fifty millions of which were expended in the United States.

Much has been said about the Postal arrangements of Great Britain. Those for London are striking and very extensive. The City Delivery employs fifteen hundred letter-carriers, twenty mail men, with horse and cart, and six hundred sub-postmasters. Hourly deliveries are made of letters in all the ten districts in which the city is divided. No removals of employees ever take place, except for cause, and the utmost punctuality is observed.

One meets, in his reading, occasionally, with a reference to the Sacred College at Rome. It is composed of seventy Cardinals. The oldest one at the present time is in his ninety-second year, and the youngest is but forty-five, while ten are seventy-five and upwards. Fifty of them were born in Italy, nine in France, three in Spain, four in Germany, and one each in Belgium, Hungary, and England. It is from the ranks of the Sacred College the new Pope is always elected. Hence, to be a Cardinal is possibly to be on the way to the Papedom.

The rewards of Editorial labour are occasionally large in Great Britain. In conducting the Cornhill Magazine, Thackeray received a salary of twenty thousand dollars a year.

The late Chevalier Bunsen occupied a prominent place in his day. Since his decease, his wife has been diligently engaged in preparing a work, which she is about to issue from the press, under the title of, "The Memoir and Correspondence of My Husband." It will no doubt be a work of interest.

Retrenchmen seems the order of the day. The Emperor of France, in order to lighten the burdens of the Treasury, has ordered a reduction of thirty-two thousand men in the effective strength of the army. He has disbanded the 101st and 102d Regiments of Infantry, and ordered the sale of twenty-two hundred horses.

The long-talked of Canal, connecting the waters of the Mediterranean and Red Seas, across the Isthmus of Suez, is steadily progressing. Water is now let in as far as the centre of the Isthmus. Reservoirs are built at distances of two hundred metres along the whole line, capable of containing water for the use of fifty thousand men. M. de Lesseps is the engineer and manager of the enterprise.

PERRY & FITZGERALD'S

PROCESS FOR MAKING LIGHT, NUTRITIOUS, AND UNADULTERATED BREAD, WITHOUT FERMENTATION.

The new process of bread making, patented by Perry & Fitzgerald, removes all the objections which have hitherto rendered it impossible to manufacture perfectly pure, sweet, and nutritious bread. The entire process is performed by mechanical means, and is eminently cleanly.

The process consists in mixing the flour in a closed vessel, and the application of pure carbonic gas, under pressure, by which the dough, mass or made three times the bulk and ready to be discharged into pans for making into loaves—and of dough or bread, mixed. The change is produced in a few seconds, and each machine completes the operation, in all its details, from the putting in of the flour to the discharging of the dough, in from twenty five to forty minutes.

The invention of Perry & Fitzgerald effects a revolution in the preparation of bread, by establishing a system of wholesale manufacture not subject to the vicissitudes and evils of fermentation, but exact and certain in its results—I. Because, by the substitution of mechanical for manual labor, and in the superior value of the article produced, it yields large profits on the capital employed. 2. Because such employment of capital, as well as the protection afforded by the patent, gives adequate security against competition. But whilst preventing undue competition, it produces none of the evils of a monopoly, inasmuch it leaves the convenience of all classes in possession of the former means of supply, to be remodelled to, adapted the more quick income proportioned.

The application of pure carbonic acid gas, under pressure, to a previously kneaded dough mass, as in the invention of Perry & Fitzgerald, did not occur to Dr. Cre; though he seems to have had a clear foreshadowing of the importance of the artificial use of the gas, since he states, hypothetically, that "if water, highly impregnated with carbonic acid gas, be used for kneading the dough, the resulting bread will be somewhat spongy. Could a light article," he continues, "be produced in this way, then, as the sugar would remain undecomposed, the bread would be so much the sweeter and more nourishing."

What, to Dr. Cre, was evidently a clearly comprehended chemical truth, has been practically developed by the brilliant invention of Perry & Fitzgerald. Posterity will hold their names in grateful remembrance as among the most eminent benefactors of mankind.

ITS SUPERIORITY.—The superiority of unfermented bread is by no means new. Dr. Cullen, who wrote more than seventy years ago, says:

"In Scotland, nine tenths of the lower class of people, and that is the greater part of the whole, live upon unfermented bread, and it is universal in that country in other forms; and there are not a more healthy people anywhere to be found. In the course of fifty years, that I have practised among them, I have had occasion to know this, and have hardly met with a disease, of any consequence, that could happen to the use of unfermented farinaceous."

At a later period, Professor Thompson, of Glasgow, in his work on the "Food of Animals," after alluding to the facts referred to above by Dr. Cullen, and other kindred facts, observes:—

"Such, then, being sufficient evidence in favor of the wholesomeness of unfermented bread (it becomes important to discover in what respects it differs from fermented bread. The result gained by the process (fermentation) may be considered to be merely the expenditure of the portion of which the heat is composed, so as to render the mass more readily divisible by the preparatory organs of digestion. But, as this object is gained at a sacrifice of the nutriment of the flour, it becomes a matter of interest to ascertain the amount of the loss sustained in the process."

The result of Professor Thompson's experiments showed a difference in favor of unfermented bread of nearly seven per cent. over that made by the ordinary process. In other words, there was a loss of very one-fifteenth of the nutritive properties of the flour, which, by the process of fermentation, was driven into the air and lost.

We come now to a more particular consideration of the superiority of the Bread made without fermentation, or the use of chemical agents, over the Bread made by these processes. Although from what has already been said, this superiority appears in most striking contrast, yet the public will be better satisfied if we have the points stated specifically. For it really needs that the advantages owned by this method be clearly understood in order to its universal introduction in the manufacture of Bread.

I. Its Cleanliness.—Instead of the dough being mixed by the naked hands or feet, the bread, from the wetting of the flour to the completion of the baking, is not, and scarcely can be, touched by any one. "One deodorizing attained in its manufacture," says Dr Willard Parker, "is its entire cleanliness." Says Dr Waterbury "The process is not only purely scientific, but pre-eminently cleanly."

II. Its Preservation of all the Nutrient Principles of the Flour.—At the raising of the dough is by the mechanical introduction of pure carbonic acid gas under pressure, in a closed vessel, no exception, it takes a portion particular to every texture. All the constituents of the flour remain wholly unchanged, while the process of raising bread by fermentation inevitably destroys some of them, as has been already shown.

III. Its Uniform Character.—Bread made by the New Process is uniformly light, sweet, and nutritious. The combinations being simple, are not liable to variation, as follows can occur in always producing bread of the same quality. It retains its moisture much longer than fermented bread, and may be eaten sweet with impunity. The process also insures a perfect freedom from alum and acidity, even in the hottest weather. Says the London Times:—

"The objectionable consequences of fermentation being excluded, the constituents of the flour are left both unchanged and unneutralized, the resulting loaf being absolutely pure."

IV. Its Wholesomeness.—Being free from the deleterious substances which are the product of fermentation, or chemical reactions, the old maxim, "the bread made by the New Process is easy of digestion, and agrees with the most delicate stomach," "by dyspepties," says Dr Cre, (late of the N. Y. Medical College,) "it will be invaluable, as they will be able to use it when the fermented unadulterated bread has been found to have signally failed as an article of diet." Says the London Medical Times and Gazette:—

"Since the introduction of the new unfermented bread, there have already been received from members of the medical profession, who have recommended it in their practice, as well as from non-professional persons, accounts of the really astonishing results that have followed its use in cases of deranged digestion and constipation. Many persons have reported their recovery to health, after years of suffering and misery, by the simple use of the bread as a diet. Many cases have also been reported by medical men of positive, in which certain distressing forms of dyspepsia, which had resisted fortunately under every kind of treatment, have yielded as if by magic, almost immediately after adopting the use of the unfermented bread."

"The beneficial effects of the new bread are attributable in two manner. The one to the absence of the prejudicial matters imparted to ordinary bread by the process of fermentation; and the other to the preservation in the bread, unchanged, of those elements which are the essential agents of digestion and assimilation."

The most eminent members of the medical profession, both in Great Britain and in the United States, not only speak in the highest terms of the case with which it is digested, and of its rich, nourishing qualities, but especially of its gentle palatableness, and wonderful keeping properties. The absence of acidity and other strong flavors, which, in a greater or less degree, are characteristic of fermented bread, renders the new bread peculiarly delicate to the taste.

Y. Its Economy and Economy.—By the use of mechanical means, instead of manual labor, a barrel of flour is converted into bread—here in forty-five minutes, whereas, by the ordinary process, four or five hours are occupied in the formation of the "sponge," and a further time in kneading, raising, and baking the dough.

"The steadiness of the consumption of bread," says a correspondent of the Journal of the Society of Arts, "renders it an article peculiarly suitable to be prepared and supplied by a public company. And since the new process removes all the vicissitudes of manufacture, and the expense of the machinery gives a comparative monopoly the supply of bread is placed as much in the same category with gas, water, or other articles of prime necessity."

IMPROVEMENTS made in the machinery for manufacturing Gold Pens, and secured to the subscriber by Letters Patent, have enabled him to overcome the many imperfections hitherto unavoidable in their production, and also to bring their cost within the reach of all. The writing public should know the following facts:—

Constant writing for six months is done cheaper with Gold Pens than with steel; therefore, it is economy to use Gold Pens.

The Gold Pen remains unchanged by years of continued use, while the Steel Pen is ever changed by corrosion and wear; therefore, perfect uniformity of writing is obtained only by the use of the Gold pens.

The Gold Pen is always ready and reliable, while the steel Pen must be often cast aside and a new one selected, therefore there is great saving of time in the use of the Gold Pen.

Gold is capable of receiving any degree of elasticity, so that the Gold Pen is exactly adapted to the hand of the writer; therefore, the nerves of the hand and the arm are not injured, as is known to be the case by the use of Steel Pens.

He is now selling Gold Pens at prices varying from 25 cents to $1, according to size, the average wear of every one of which will far outlast a gross of the best Steel Pens.

Sold by all dealers in the line throughout the country. Wholesale and retail at the store No. 25 Maiden Lane, where all orders, enclosing cash or post-stamps, will receive prompt attention, and a Pen or Pens corresponding to value, and selected according to description, will immediately be sent by mail or otherwise, as directed.

THE CHILD IN THE GRAVE.

BY HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN.

THERE was sorrow in the house—there was sorrow in the heart, for the youngest child, a little boy of four years of age, the only son, his parents' present joy and future hope, was dead. Two daughters they had, indeed, older than their boy—the eldest was almost old enough to be confirmed—amiable, sweet girls they both were; but the lost child is always the dearest, and he was the youngest and a son. It was a heavy trial. The sisters sorrowed as young hearts sorrow, and were much afflicted by their parents' grief; the father was weighed down by the affliction; but the mother was quite overwhelmed by the terrible blow. By night and by day she devoted herself to her sick child, watched him, lifted him up, carried him about, did everything for him herself. She had felt as if he were a part of herself. She could not bring herself to believe that he was dead—that he should be laid in a coffin and concealed in the grave. God would not take the child from her, oh no! And when he was taken, and she would no longer refuse to believe the truth, she exclaimed in her wild grief:—"God has not ordained this! He has heartless agents here on earth! They do what they list—they hearken not to a mother's prayers!"

She dared, in her woe, to arraign the Most High; and then came dark thoughts—the thoughts of death—everlasting death—that human beings returned as earth to earth, and then all was over. Amid thoughts morbid and impious as these, there could be nothing to console her, and she sank into the deepest depths of despair.

In these hours of deepest distress she could not weep. She thought of the young daughters who were left to her; husband's tears fell on her brow, but she did not look up at him—her thoughts were with her dead child; her whole heart and soul were wrapped up in recalling every reminiscence of the lost one, every syllable of his infantile prattle.

The day of the funeral came. She had not slept the night before, but toward morning she was overcome by fatigue, and sank for a short time into repose. During that time the coffin was removed into another apartment, and the cover was screwed down with as little noise as possible.

When she awoke she arose and wished to see her child. Then her husband, with tears in his eyes, told her, "We have closed the coffin: it had to be done."

"When the Almighty is so hard on me," she exclaimed, "why should human beings be kinder?" and she burst into tears.

The coffin was carried to the grave. The inconsolable mother sat with her young daughters. She looked at them, but she did not see them; her thoughts had nothing more to do with home; she gave herself up to wretchedness, and it tossed her about as the sea tosses the ship which has lost its helmsman and its rudder. Thus passed the day of the funeral, and several days followed amid the same uniform, heavy grief. With tearful eyes and melancholy looks her afflicted family gazed at her. She did not care for what comforted them. What could they say to change the current of her mournful thoughts?

It seemed as if sleep had fled from her forever; if sleep would be her best friend, strengthen her frame, and recall peace to her mind. Her family persuaded her to keep her bed, and she lay there as still as if buried in sleep. One night her husband had listened to her breathing, and believing from it that she had at length found repose and relief, he clasped his hands, prayed for her, and for them all, then sank into a peaceful slumber. While sleeping soundly he did not perceive that she arose, dressed herself, and softly left the room and the house; to go—whither her thoughts wandered by day and by night—to the grave that hid her child. She passed quietly through the garden, out to the fields, beyond which the road led outside the town to the churchyard. No one saw her, and she saw no one.

It was a fine night; the stars were shining brightly, and the air was mild, although it was the 1st of September. She entered the churchyard, and went to the little grave; it looked like one great bouquet of sweet-scented flowers. She threw herself down and bowed her head over the grave, as if she could through the solid earth behold her little boy, whose smile she remembered so vividly. The affectionate expression of his eyes, even upon his sick bed, was never, never to be forgotten.

How speaking had not his glance been when she had bent over him, and taken the little hand he was himself too weak to raise. As she had sat by his couch, so now she sat by his grave; that her tears might flow freely over the sod that covered him.

"Wouldst thou descend to thy child?" said a voice close by.

It sounded so clear, so deep, its tones went to her heart. She looked, and near her stood a man wrapped in a large mourning cloak, with a hood drawn over the head; but she could not see the countenance under this. It was severe, yet encouraging; his eyes were bright as those of youth.

"Descend to my child!" she repeated; and there was the agony of despair in her voice.

"Darest thou follow me?" asked the figure, "I am Death!"

She bowed her assent. Then it seemed all at once as if every star in the heavens above shone with the light of the moon—She saw the many colored flowers on the surface of the grave move like a fluttering garment. She sank, and the figure threw his dark cloak around her. It became night—the night of death. She sank deeper than the spade could reach. The churchyard lay like a roof above her head.

The cloak that enveloped her, gilded to one side. She stood in an immense hall, whose extremities were lost in the distance. It was dusk around her; but before her stood, and in one moment was changed to her heart, her child, who smiled on her in beauty far surpassing what he had possessed before. She uttered a cry, though it was scarcely audible, as close by and then far away, and afterwards near again, came delightful music. Never before had such glorious, such blessed sounds reached her ears. They rang from the other side of the thick curtain—black as night—that separated the hall from the boundless space of eternity.

"My sweet mother! my own mother!" she heard her child exclaim. It was his well known, most beloved voice; and kiss followed kiss in rapturous joy. At length the child pointed to the sable curtain.

"There is nothing so charming up yonder on earth, mother. Look, mother! look at them all! That is felicity!"

The mother saw nothing—nothing in the direction to which the child pointed, except darkness like that of night. She saw with earthly eyes She did not see as did the child whom God had called to himself. She heard, indeed, sounds—music; but she did not understand the words that were conveyed in these exquisite tones.

"I can fly now," said the child; "I can fly with all the other happy children, away, even into the presence of God. I wish so much to go; but if you cry on as you are crying now, I cannot leave you, and yet I should be so glad to go. May I not? You will come back soon, will you not, dear mother?"

"Oh, stay! Oh, stay!" she cried, "only one moment more! Let me gaze on you one moment more! Let me kiss you, and hold you a moment longer in my arms!"

And she kissed him and held him fast.—Then her name was called from above—the tones were those of piercing grief. What could they be.

"Hark!" said the child, "it is my father calling on you."

And again, in a few seconds, deep sobs were heard, as of children weeping

"These are my sisters' voices," said the child. "Mother, you have not surely forgotten them."

Then she remembered those who were left behind. A deep feeling of anxiety pervaded her mind: she gazed intently before her, and spectres seemed to hover around her. she fancied she knew some of them; they floated through the hall of death, towards the dark curtain, and here they vanished. Would her husband, her daughter, appear there? No; their lamentations were still to be heard from above. She had nearly forgotten them for the dead.

"Mother, the bells of heaven are ringing," said the child; "now the sun of heaven is about to rise."

And an overwhelming, blinding light streamed around her. The child was gone, and she felt herself lifted up. She raised her head, and saw she was lying in the churchyard, upon the grave of her child.—But in her dream, God had become a prop for her feet and a light for her mind. She threw herself upon her knees and prayed:

"Forgive me, O Lord, my God, that I wished to detain so everlasting soul from its flight into eternity, and that I forgot my duties to the living them hastily sparred to me!"

And as she uttered this prayer, it appeared as if her heart felt lightened of the burden that crushed it. Then the sun broke forth in all its splendor, a little bird sang over her head, and all the church bells began to ring the matin chimes. All seemed holy around her; her heart seemed to have drunk in faith and holiness; she acknowledged the might and mercy of God; she remembered her duties, and felt a longing to return again to her home. She hurried thither, and, leaning over her still sleeping husband, she awoke him with the touch of her warm lips on his cheek. Her words were those of love and consolation, and in a tone of mild resignation, she exclaimed, "God's will is the best!"

Her husband and her daughters were astonished at the change in her, and her husband asked her,

"Where did you so suddenly acquire this strength—this pious resignation?"

And she smiled on him and her daughters, as she replied,

"I derived it from God, by the grave of my child."

THE LITTLE TEACHER.

"Girls," said Joseph, "I am not going to tell you much more about Aunt Lizzie's instruction to me, for she has invited me to come and spend two weeks with her, and then I know she will tell you many more things, and in much better style than I can."

"We are to go in three or four days from now, and then, heigh-ho! for the good little pies and cakes Aunt Lizzie will bake us Girls, I tell you what it is, there is nobody in the whole world like Aunt Lizzie—I don't believe. She knows everything, and she knows something about everything. She makes the best little johnny-cake, ginger-cakes, turn-over-pies (all edged with sugar plums and candies, and a host of other little cookies, which I forget the names of,) that you ever eat; indeed, it makes my mouth water when I think of them, and how good they are."

"But, Joseph," said Alice, "you must be mistaken when you say Aunt Lizzie knows everything; for I heard papa say, the other day, that if we would study and read every useful and good book that ever was printed, and live to be a hundred years old, there would still be something new for us to learn yet: for, said he, old things are passing away, and new things, both plain and mysterious, are constantly coming to light."

"Well, that is true, I know," said Joseph; "but then I think Aunt Lizzie knows everything, or something about everything that has ever taken place, up to this time, and she will be likely to know something about everything that happens while she lives; for she reads so many papers, letters, and magazines, besides a great large book, which she says is the Book of books. She says everything is contained in that book, which we need in this life to make us happy here, and it also tells us how to live here that we may be happy in the next world."

"Why, Joseph, how you talk!" said Mary. "There is but one world, and you say, 'the next world;' and how could we go from one world to another, if there was another, unless it would come banging up against us—I would like to hear you tell!"

"Does little sister Mary forget that we must die—that this world is not our home?" asked Joseph.

"Oh! no, brother, I have not forgot that," said she; "but I always thought we went to heaven, and that heaven was a large and beautiful garden right above us some place, and fast to this earth or world. Is it not so?"

"No, dear sister; I think heaven is not connected to this world in that way at all," said Joseph, "but is far, far away, above us; no one can rightly tell just where heaven is, Aunt Lizzie says. But before we go on any further with the subject, I wish to tell you that there are a great many worlds besides ours. Aunt Lizzie says this earth of ours is a planet."

"What does that mean, Joseph?" said Alice.

"A planet is a dark body that moves around the sun, and receives light and heat from it. Alice, that is what it means," said Joseph. "And this world of ours is one of a number of them that revolve around the sun. And they are said to be inhabited, too. Our earth has one moon, that shines at night, (you girls have often seen it.) Well, some of the other planets have more than one. One of them has seven moons."

"Oh! how very beautiful their evenings must be," said Mary, "if they all shine at once"

"Yes, beautiful indeed," said Joseph; "and yet you must remember they all receive their light from the sun."

"From the sun!" exclaimed Alice; "how can that be, when the moon and stars shine at night, after we are turned away from the sun? I think you will be puzzled to answer that question, brother."

"Not puzzled so greatly, perhaps, as you may think, Alice," said he. "If I can only think and arrange in my stupid memory what Aunt Lizzie taught me. You girls just close the window-shutters, put down the curtains, to make the room dark, while I light the lamp, and I will show you something. Now, we will place the lamp so that its light will fall directly on this looking glass, and we will place ourselves here in this dark closet, where, by leaving the door open, we can see the looking-glass, but cannot see the lamp Now, girls, tell me, does the glass look dark or light?"

"O, light, light!" exclaimed they both. "It shines brightly. What do you suppose makes it look so bright?"

"It is the light of the lamp falling on it," said Joseph; "and it is just so with the moon. We cannot see the sun when the moon shines, but it is its light that the moon reflects to the earth The moon, like the earth, is a dark body, but I cannot tell if it is as cold or not; for our earth is a very cold body."

"Why, brother," said Mary, "I do not think it cold at all; for the weather now is warmer, I think, than ever I felt it. Only yesterday. Bridget made Alice and me, each one, a nice little butter swan, for churning the butter for her; they were very nice indeed, and when she had them finished, she put them on the shelf in the pantry, and forgot to take them to the cellar, and when we went to get them, to-day, for dinner, they were all melted up, and we could not tell they had ever been shaped like swans, for there they lay all in a heap of melted butter."

"Yes, Mary, the weather, now, is unusually warm and sultry; but it is the warm sun shining on the earth, that makes it so. In the winter, just see how cold it gets. The sun's influence on us, in short then, for the days are much shorter then than they are now; consequently, the sun cannot warm the earth as much then as in summer.

"Well," said Alice, "if the sun is such a hot body as that, I am glad we do not have to travel towards it; for, surely, we would take fire and burn up."

"Not at all," said Joseph. "There are people who sail in the air in balloons, and they say the farther they go up, the colder it gets, and some places where there are very high mountains, the snow does not melt off their tops in the warmest summer days Yes, girls, God has very mysteriously and wisely created this earth, and everything else. The sun's bright rays seem to contain no warmth in themselves, Aunt Lizzie says, until they embrace the earth But, indeed, girls, I did not intend to teach this time at all. I was going to tell you a nice little story, which, indeed, is a beautiful one, if I could only narrate it as Aunt Lizzie does; but I see we have not time to talk any longer to-day."

"But, brother," exclaimed both little girls at once, "you forgot you were going to tell us about 'the other world,' we are so anxious to know what Aunt Lizzie says about heaven, and what kind of a place it is. We do hope there are plenty of china-dolls and baby-houses, with a beautiful garden of pretty flowers, and a nice white kitty just like ours, to run and play with us."

"Oh, girls!" said their brother, looking very grave and sad, "you must not speak so trifling and lightly of heaven; it is a very sacred place, and none but bright and happy people inhabit it. God is a very great, wise, holy, kind, and terrible Being, and we should be very grateful to him if he notices us at all; for we are weak, sinful creatures, sinning every day of our lives. For the present, I can say no more. To-morrow I will tell you about the beautiful heaven, which I hope, one day, we all will inhabit." SYLVIA.

THE HUMP-BACKED GIRL.

The little cripple passed along
The quiet village street,
The clothes she wore were patched and old,
Yet very clean and neat.
Though she was sickly and deform'd,
Her face was sweetly fair,
And the glossy curls around her brow
Proclaim'd a mother's care.

Ere long she passed the village school,
As, from the open door,
A train of boys came shouting forth,
Glad that their tasks were o'er:
A few more boisterous than the rest,
Themselves erect and strong,
Began to mock the hump-backed girl,
Who quickly walked along.

Once, Jenny utter'd sharp retorts,
When jests like these she heard;
But now, that grace had changed her heart,
She answer'd not a word;
Only the blush that dyed her cheek,
And the tear that down it stole,
Show'd that the coarse unfeeling taunts
Had sunk into her soul.

Arrived at home poor Jenny sought
Her chamber, small and bare—
Methinks these thoughtless lads had kept
If they had seen her there:
Beside her lowly bed she knelt
And cast this prayer to heaven—
"O Father, help me to forgive
As I have been forgiven!"

Dear children, 'tis from God above
Health, strength, and beauty come;
And He, in wisdom, has withheld
These precious gifts from some;
Be kind to such, and learn to keep
The golden rule in view,
Nor ever let a cripple hear
A cruel taunt from you.

BAILY'S "FESTUS."

We fully agree with the following criticism of this poem by Dr. John Brown, of Edinburgh, who is a man of rare taste and critical judgement. He says in one of his humorous passages:—

"We have made repeated attempts, but we cannot get through this poem. It beats us. We must want the Festus sense. Some of our best friends, with whom we generally agree on such matters, are distressed for us, and repeat long passages with great energy and apparent intelligence and satisfaction. Meanwhile, having read the six pages of public opinion at the end of the third and people's edition, we take it for granted that it is a great performance—that, to use one of the author's own words, there is a mighty somethingness about it, and we can entirely acquiesce in the quotation from the Sunday Times that they "read it with astonishment and closed it with bewilderment." It would appear from these opinions, which, from their intensity, variety and number (upwards of five hundred,) are curious signs of the times, that Mr Baily has not so much improved on, as happily superseded, the authors of Job and Ecclesiastes, of the Divine Comedy, of Paradise Lost and Regained, of Dr. Faustus, Hamlet, and Faust, of Don Juan, the Course of Time, St. Leon, the Jolly Beggars, and the Loves of the Angels.

"He is more sublime and simple than Job—more perpetually witty and wise, more to the quick and the point than Solomon—more picturesque, more intense, more pathetic than Dante—more Miltonic (we have no other word) than Milton—more dreadful, more curiously blasphemous, more sonorous than Marlowe—more worldly-wise, and clever, and intellectually sweet than Goethe—more passionate, more impudent, more elegant than Byron—more orthodox, more edifying, more precocious than Pollok—more absorptive and invetereate than Godwin; and more hearty and tender, more of love and manhood all compact than Burns—more gay than Moore—more myriad-minded than Shakespeare.

"It may be so. We have made repeated and resolute incursions in various directions into his torrid zone, but have always come out greatly scorched, and stunned, and affronted. Never before did we come across such an amount of energetic and tremendous words, going sounding on their dim and perilous way like a cataract at midnight—not flowing like a stream, nor leaping like a waterfall, but always among breakers, roaring, and tearing, and trampeting with a sort of transcendental din; and then what power of energising, and speaking, and philosophising, and preaching, and laughing, and joking, and love-making, in excelsis! As far as we can judge, and as far as we can keep our senses in such a region, it seems to us not a poem at all, hardly even poetical—but rather the materials of a poem, made up of science, religion and love, the very raw materials of a structure—as if the bricks and mortar, and lath, and plaster, and furniture, and fire, and fuel, and meat, and drink, and inhabitants, male and female, of a house, were all mixed through other, in one enormous imbroglio. It is a sort of firmust, out of which poetry, like a star, might by curdling, condensation, crystallization, have been developed, after much purging, refining, and cooling, and much time and pains."

YARDING AND STABLING CATTLE.

A writer in the Country Gentleman, reviewing previous numbers of that paper, makes the following sensible remarks upon a subject important to all:

A great many words are expended on this subject. It need not be difficult to understand Warmth and cleanliness should be combined. The great advantage of a shed, only, is in saving labor in attending to the animals. Cleaning out and littering the stalls twice a day, and keeping the hide curried, are obviated by the use of a shed. This suits most American farmers, who like to have as nearly as possible, a self-running machine. The disadvantages of the shed are, more room is required, and it cannot be kept so warm. It will be found by weighing the animals weekly, that more food is required for a pound of flesh in the shed than in a good stable. The animals may thrive as well. Very few sheds are properly made. If the wind blows through crevices, they are of little use. And they must be protected from wind on every one of the four points of the compass. John Johnston says his sheds open to the south; but here, some of our worst winds blow from the south, and unless a board fence as high as a shed fronts it, the animals will suffer. Very few stables are properly made or managed. A foul air and a foul floor are too common These are the abuses of the thing. Use as much straw in stables having stanchions as a shed requires, and the animals will be clean and comfortable. I do not think John Johnston should compare animals with men Is would be torture for man to be confined to a cell ten feet square, even if every luxury were provided him; but a cow would enjoy herself hugely in a ten feet box, if she only had plenty of hay and carrots. Animals care nothing for liberty if they can have bodily comforts.

THE PROSPECT FOR FRUIT.

The accounts which reach us indicate a good crop of fruit this year. On this subject the Newark (N. J.) Journal speaks as follows:

Under the usual operations of nature, there is a prospect of a good crop of apples, pears, plums and peaches the coming season. As a general thing, the fruit buds are backward, and will not therefore be so liable to be nipped by late frosts The buds, so far as at present developed, are in excellent condition, there having been no severe frosts during the winter to injure the trees. Cherries having been a total failure in this section last year, horticulturists are sanguine of a large crop of that excellent fruit. In fact, there seems to be a general belief that there will be an abundance of all kinds of fruit in the coming summer

CHARCOAL TO PRESERVE HAMS.

The Springfield (Mass.) Republican states that Rev. Dr Osgood, of that place, accidentally left a smoked ham in charcoal dust eight years, and when taken out it was found sweet and fresh as if it had been cured the past winter. This is pretty conclusive as to the value of charcoal in preserving hams.

BAUGH'S RAW BONE SUPER-PHOSPHATE OF LIME,
MANUFACTURED FROM UNBURNED BONES
BY BAUGH & SONS,
Wholesale office and Store, 20 S. Wharves, between Market and Chestnut Streets, Philadelphia.
CASH PRICE $45 PER 2000 POUNDS. (2½ CTS. PER POUND.)
In the preparation of this Valuable Manure, BONES ARE USED IN THEIR RAW STATE ONLY. They have never been boiled or calcined. They are taken as nature has made them, crushed with powerful machinery, and subjected to a process, by which, while all the virtue of the bone is retained, it is rendered so pulverized, furnishing to a concentrated and soluble form, the two indispensable ingredients for the growth of Plants and enriching the soil, viz.: phosphoric acid, and ammonia. These two ingredients, by the use of "BAUGH'S RAW BONE SUPER-PHOSPHATE," are given to the soil in all their original strength and purity. They assimilate at once with the soil, furnish all the nutrient elements for the growing crop, giving it ample nutriment, and leave the land permanently benefited, so that its presence can be traced for years afterwards.
Downingtown, Chester County, Pa., April 9th, 1860.
Messrs. Baugh & Sons: Gentlemen,—I have been using your article of Super Phosphate on wheat and corn for several seasons, and can well assure you of its value as a "quick acting" fertilizer.
I have applied it on wheat at the rate of 300 pounds per acre, alongside of a heavy coat of barn-yard manure, kept dry and under cover, and the result was, that by harvest the wheat where the Phosphate was put, was much the better has lodged heavier while the grass was taken more strongly than on the other portion of the field. I have also used the Phosphate by the side of Peruvian Guano, each in the same quantity, and in regard to both grain and grass, the action of your preparation was much the more satisfactory. On corn, my experience in its use has been the same. It pays well for money laid out.
Yours respectfully, ISAAC T. LEWIS.
Newtown Square, Delaware Co., Pa., July 23d, 1860.
Messrs. Baugh & Sons:—Being anxious last season to test some prepared manure offered for sale, I was induced by your agent to make a trial of three different kinds, which I did on wheat, side by side, to the same field. They consisted Peruvian Guano and Superphosphate of Lime (one of the most popular in use) together with your Bone Dust Super-Phosphate, and used them as above stated. During the growing, as well as the gathering of the crop, the last received most favor in favor of the latter.
But whether it is from the mode and care in preparing, or in the superior quality of the material used in your Bone Super-Phosphate, I am unable to say, however, I cheerfully accord you the result of my trials, thinking that others may be induced to make similar experiments, and in my opinion, generally to the agricultural interests of the whole country.
Yours, &c., JAMES DUNWOODY
Plymouth, Montgomery Co., Pa., 2 mos 10th, 1860
Baugh & Sons: Gentlemen,—Having used your Super-Phosphate, bought of John W. Jackson, Esq., Norristown, at the Montgomery Co. Agricultural Store, on wheat and corn, I am well pleased to recommend it. The effect it produced was a manifest that it greatly increased my profits in the value of your Fertilizer. Where it was applied on the wheat, the soil was decidedly the poorest on the field, yet the yield was fully equal to the balance, which had a heavy coat of barn-yard manure. Where it was applied on the corn, I am satisfied the yield was fully double
Very respectfully, DAVID MARPLE.

VERSES WRITTEN ON A FALL OF SNOW.

Lo! Mother Earth, with beauteous mantle clad,
Of purest white! mocking the fuller's skill
To imitate. All soft and smoothly laid,
As by some wondrous hand invisible!
Thine arm, Almighty God, its power doth here reveal!

O Lord! how marvellous are thy works! in all,
The footsteps of thy glorious majesty,
Wisdom, and goodness infinite, loudly call
Our souls to loftiest thoughts—to awe of Thee,
Adoring praise, trust, love, and deep humility.

Alas! that erring, vain, heart-blinded man,
Amid the noon tide blaze of the works of God,
Should ceaseless walk, and yet should fail to scan
His glory filling all the earth abroad;
But blind should grope, as though in midnight shades he trode!

Be mine, in every scene that nature knows,—
In winter's snows and storms; in summer's face;
In radiant skies; in clouds of varied hues;
In weeping heavens,—a moving God to trace:
Thence let me rise to know the wonders of his grace!

Thus, like the patriarch's ladder, unto me
Shall nature's ever varying aspects prove;
As wings shall they to my weak spirit be,
Upward to fly to blissful realms, where love,
And truth, and mercy reign, nor earth-born passions move.

And thus my soul shall ripened be,
Jehovah's face unveiled to see;
To spend eternal years of bliss
Where snows are not, nor tempests hiss;
But all is beauty, love, and light:
For God and Christ in glory bright,
There radiant endless reign:
Whose praises high, in ceaseless strains,
Yet ever new, from the denizens
Of heaven, ascend, in loud acclaims—
Angels and ransomed men.

LOMBARDI.

When shall I be at rest? my trembling heart
Grows weary of its burden, sickening still
With hope deferred. Oh! that it were Thy will
To loose my bonds, and take me where Thou art!

When shall I be at rest? My eyes grow dim
With straining through the gloom. I source can see
The way-marks that my Saviour left for me;
Would it were morn, and I were safe with Him.

When shall I be at rest? Hand over hand
I grasp, and climb an ever steeper hill,
A rougher path. Oh! that it were thy will,
My tired feet might tread the Promised Land.

Oh that I were at rest! a thousand fears
Come thronging o'er me lest I fail at last:
Would I were safe, all toil and danger past,
And thine own hand might wipe away my tears.

Oh that I were at rest, like some I love,
Whose last fond looks drew half my life away,
Seeming to plead that either they might stay
With me on earth, or I with them above.

But why these murmurs? Thou didst never shrink
From any toil or weariness for me,
Not even from that last deep agony;
Shall I beneath my little trials sink?

No, Lord, for when I am indeed at rest,
One taste of that deep bliss will quite efface
The sternest memories of my earthly race,
Save but to swell the sense of being blest.

Then lay on me whatever cross I need
To bring me there. I know them surest not be
Unkind, unfaithful, or untrue to me!
Shall I not toil for Thee when Thou for me didst bleed?

A DIRGE

BY THE LATE REV. E. YEATES REESE, D. D.

"Slowly enter—softly tread"—
So the whispered words were said—
"He is dead!"

He is dead—the lovely child!
Hush'd his laughter, loud and wild;
Mute those lips, whose softest words
Charmed us like the songs of birds—
Pale his cheek—it once was red—
Cold his eye—the fire best fled—
"He is dead!"

"Slowly enter—softly tread"—
So the whispered words were said—
"He is dead!"

Bend the youth of promise fair—
Lo the dark luxuriant hair,
Falling o'er a forehead, fraught
With lineaments of noble thought—
Violent bright! where have ye fled?
—And in whispered tones they said—
"He is dead!"

"Slowly enter—softly tread"—
So the whispered words were said—
"He is dead!"

Dead! but yesterday his name
Filled the sounding blasts of Fame,
He, the man whose deeds were sung,
By the aged—by the young,
—Open now his narrow bed!
Plant the marble at his head!
"He is dead!"

"Slowly enter—softly tread!"
So the whispered words were said—
"He is dead!"

Dead! the old man full of years,
Who shall count his fallen tears!
Many a long and fearful storm,
Beat upon that trembling form—
Now, at last his couch is spread,
Where the weary rest the head
"He is dead!"

"Slowly enter—softly tread"—
So the whispered words were said—
"He is dead!"

Mournfully the tidings spread—
As the living join the dead!
Maiden, matron—youth and age—
All who tread life's pilgrimage!
Tears of sorrow will be shed
And the whispered words be said,
"He is dead!"
"She is dead!"

"Slowly enter—softly tread"—
Will the whispered words be said—
"He is dead!"
"She is dead!"

None but those eminently blessed with mental endowments can conceive all the pleasures which spring from the well formed and fertile mind; it seems ready fitted with little cells for all sweets; to have a distinct pigeon-hole for every kind of communication; all it receives has a tendency not to dissolve, but to crystallize in brilliancy and beauty; however extended its chain, each link ends in a hook for joining more

THE SABBATH

THE LAW REQUIRING THE OBSERVANCE OF ONE DAY IN SEVEN, AS A HOLY REST UNTO THE LORD, IS OF MORAL, AND, THEREFORE, OF UNIVERSAL AND PERPETUAL OBLIGATION.

What is asserted in the words which stand at the head of this article was implied in the heading of two former articles, viz: The Sabbath a primeval institution; for this implies that it had its origin in the wants and necessities of man as the creature of God, and in his relation to his Creator.

It is unquestionably a fundamental truth of natural religion, that there is but one God, the Maker of all things, to whom alone religious worship and homage are due. This was known to Adam and the Patriarchs. But sin had so darkened the human understanding, that, in the course of a few generations after that signal manifestation of the Divine Power in the destruction of all flesh by the waters of a flood, the families of the earth began to glide rapidly into idolatry. God, therefore, saw it needful solemnly to announce the truth in the words: "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord." All must admit, that no new, or hitherto unknown, truth was now announced. So, when he announced on Sinai three memorable words: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," this is no evidence that the Sabbath had not before been instituted. The obligation to keep the Sabbath might have, and, as has been shown, really had, existed from the foundation of the world, and been regarded by all holy men; but, as in the case of the other truth just noticed, the sense of this obligation had been too generally obliterated from the minds of men by time and by sin. The one commandment, as well as the other, was delivered to the nation of Israel on Mount Sinai; that is, the commandment, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me," as well as the commandment, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy;" they were both delivered to the Jews as a peculiar people; a people separated from all the other nations of the earth, as a sacred trust which they were to preserve till the fulness of time should come; when they were to be published to the Gentiles throughout all the earth, and obedience to them make an important part of the obedience of faith among all nations.

Previous to the transactions on Sinai, the "great things" of God's law had been confided to the memories of the faithful; and had been handed down by tradition from parents to their children through successive generations. But it is the nature of the human mind in its fallen state to corrupt everything committed to its care. The sacred impressions of the divine law were growing faint; its principles were in danger of being lost through perversion or forgetfulness. God therefore thought it necessary, for the future instruction and direction of his people, to write the law with his own finger on two tables of stone; and while he thought it necessary that these precepts should be written: "Thou shalt have no other gods before me;" "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image," &c., he thought it necessary also to write the commandment: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." It was as much his intention that this precept should be preserved and esteemed throughout all generations as any of the other precepts of the Decalogue. Hence it was first pronounced by the mouth of Jehovah, in the midst of precepts which are universally acknowledged as moral and perpetual in their obligation; and then inscribed on stone to testify that, like a rock, it should endure forever. It was also afterwards laid up in the ark of testimony on which the glory of the Lord rested, in token of its being under his immediate care; and was covered with the mercy seat, a type of the Redeemer, to manifest that the transgression of this precept, in common with other violations of the "holy, just, and good law" of God, could only be expiated by the shedding of his precious blood.

Here it may be necessary to notice particularly some circumstances which distinguish the moral law contained in the ten commandments, from the civil, judicial, and ceremonial laws which are contained in the writings of Moses, and were designed for the special use of the nation of Israel. The moral law was proclaimed by the mouth of Jehovah in the audience of all the people of Israel "God spake all these words, saying: Thou shalt have no other gods before me," &c., but the "statutes and judgments" which were designed to be of peculiar application to the Jewish nation, or to remain in force only till the "seed should come," were spoken to Moses and Aaron, or more frequently to Moses alone, who was commanded to "set them before the people." Ex. xxi. 1. "The Lord spake unto Moses, saying: Speak unto the children of Israel," is the ordinary way in which they are introduced. The moral law was written by the finger of God on two tables of stone, and laid up in the ark of the covenant, which was a figure of our Redeemer to testify that it is inseparable from him. Therefore, he says, in the 40th Psalm, "Thy law I have within my heart." But the other "statutes, and precepts, and judgments, were written by Moses in a book," and laid up beside the ark in a box, or in some repository attached to the ark, but separable from it, to testify that they might be removed.

Now, what reason can be assigned for discarding the fourth commandment more than any other of the commandments of the law? By what plea will men justify themselves in disregarding its obligations, while they acknowledge the universal and perpetual obligation of the other commandments of the Decalogue? By what reasoning will they undertake to show that the fourth commandment is not now binding, which will not be found quite as forcible, if they should ever find it convenient to plead that not one precept is now binding of that perfect and unalterable rule of life which God at first revealed to man for the rule of his obedience? You allege that the fourth commandment has become obsolete because it was of Jewish origin; but were not the third, the fifth, the sixth, &c., equally of Jewish origin? Were they not all published to the Jews at first, and under precisely the same circumstances? If, then, you plead for the innocence of Sabbath profanation, why may not another allege that there is no harm in idolatry, blasphemy, disobedience to parents, murder, adultery, theft? If some of these sins are more immediately injurious to society than Sabbath profanation, what of that? The most deadly diseases often do not at once show such symptoms as to alarm the patient or his friends. If one man may enter the Devil-guarded door of one precept of the perfect and unalterable rule of life and manners, another may certainly enter at the breach, and out, and in, and destroy, till all the foundations of morality and moral order are subverted. Why is it?

The prophets were extraordinary messengers whom God sent from time to time. They were not sent to administer the Levitical institute, or to enforce ritual observances, but to call the people their sins, to inculcate moral duties and principles, to teach the necessity, not of ceremonial, but of inward purity—purity of heart. Said Samuel to Saul, "Hath the Lord delight in burnt-offerings and sacrifices as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams." Isaiah thus exhorts: "Wash ye, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes, cease to do evil, learn to do well. Seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow." Jeremiah thus reproves prevailing iniquities: "Will ye steal, and murder, and commit adultery, and swear falsely, and burn incense to Baal, and walk after other gods whom ye know not, and come and stand before me in this house which is called by my name, and say, We are delivered to do all these things?" And Micah thus answers some anxious inquirers, "What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justice, love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God?"

Now how do these teachers of morality and righteousness speak in relation to the Sabbath? Listen to Isaiah, who is one of the chief of them, and sometimes called "the evangelical prophet:" "Thus saith the Lord, Keep ye judgment and do justice; for my salvation is near to come, and my righteousness to be revealed. Blessed is the man that doeth this, and the son of man that layeth hold on it; that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it, and keepeth his hand from doing any evil." Chap lvi 12. "If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable; and shalt honor him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words; then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord; and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father." Chap. lviii. 14, 15. Thus, in keeping the Sabbath classed with the precious and useful virtues, and such is its great reward.

When we enter the New Testament, we find that the teaching of our Lord was in accordance with the teaching of the prophets. In the 26th chapter of the gospel of Mark, we find him vindicating his disciples against a charge brought against them by the Pharisees for profaning the Sabbath. Had he agreed with those who deny the obligation of the Sabbath, he might have adopted a much more simple and easy method of defence. But not one word does he say in derogation from the sacredness of the Sabbath. On the contrary, as the conduct of his disciples had been a violation of the Sabbath, according to the construction of the Pharisees, he seriously sets himself to correct their mistake with respect to the nature, design, and duties of the Sabbath, that he might not appear to be a trampler on a divine ordinance. After citing an instance in the history of David, he adds: "The Sabbath was made for man." The idea is, that it was intended for man's benefit—to be a blessing to him. The Pharisees erred in excluding from it works of necessity, which would sometimes make its observance not for man's benefit. Now, if the Sabbath was made for man, at first, there will still continue to be the same reason for its continuance that there was for its original institution, while the race continues on the earth. He next, as Mediator, claims dominion over the Sabbath: "Wherefore the Son of Man is Lord also of the Sabbath day." It is one of his institutions. Dominion over it is a part of his glory. It is no superannuated or dead rite, which has no longer any glory "by reason of the glory that excelleth."

Speaking of the destruction of Jerusalem, which did not take place till 40 years after his death and resurrection, when the New Testament dispensation was fully ushered in, he said to his disciples: "Pray that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day." A day of holy rest to the Lord was to be observed after the abolition of the Jewish economy. D.

Sparta, March 19th, 1862

THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

An attempted description of the British Museum as the writer knew it will, indeed, be a reminiscence of the past, for the whole institution has been so thoroughly reorganized that no portion of the old building remains. In the reign of George II., lived a scientific Physician, named Sir Hans Sloane, who had collected a number of curiosities, specimens of Natural History and the arts, at an expense of fifty thousand pounds sterling. This was, doubtless, a splendid collection for a private individual, a prestising Physician, to have made, and Sir Hans, justly proud of it, was naturally desirous to prevent its distribution at his decease; and, in his will directed that it should be offered to the government for £20,000. With a liberality which had not always characterised the British Parliament, the offer was accepted, and Montague House, then probably standing alone, was purchased for the reception of the collection. Additions were rapidly made both by purchase and bequest, national expeditions to all quarters of the globe have contributed to enrich it, until it has at length reached its present magnificent proportions, a means of instruction and delight to millions, and an honor to the country to which it belongs. What it now is I cannot pretend to describe, but I should consider the privilege of wandering through its halls almost enough of itself to repay a voyage across the Atlantic. No American, whose travels have been confined to his native continent can form an adequate idea of its extent and value; and no stranger who may visit London to attend the World's Fair should return without an attentive survey of the British Museum.

Montague House, originally standing in the open country, has long since been overtaken by the growth of London, and is now surrounded for miles in all directions by streets and houses. The entrance for the public was through a wicket, in a pair of large gloomy looking gates from Great Russell Street, into a dull court-yard, partly encumbered by a colonnade. A flight of steps led to the hall and to a handsome stair-case; its ceiling and walls adorned with a brilliant painting, representing, if I remember right, Apollo and other heathen deities. In the hall was to be seen protected by glass, the original Magna Charta, with the signatures and seals of the grim Barons, as well as of King John himself.

The first room we entered was devoted to specimens from the South Sea Islands, carried to England by Capt Cook and other navigators; comprehending canoes, war-clubs, implements of labor, hideous masks, domestic utensils and a great variety of other articles, with which Missionary records have, in some degree, made us now familiar; but which, doubtless, appeared very marvellous when first exhibited. Another large room was filled with cases of minerals, arranged according to the classification and nomenclature of that time; many of the specimens of great beauty and interest. The entomological department also was extensive; butterflies and beetles innumerable, each on its separate pin, like a Simon Stylites with his column run through him. To the majority of visitors the ornithological rooms were more attractive; the cases filled with well-prepared specimens of "every bird that skims the air or dips the wing in water," the grace of form and brilliancy of plumage perfectly retained. Eminent among them stood the Golden Eagle of the British Isles; other large birds in abundance were there, but, I believe, the glittering humming birds received more than a proportionate share of the visitors' attention. And almost all known animals were there represented; the stuffed skins of contemporary animals, the fossil bones of the monsters of the Pre-Adamite world. In one room, side by side, stood the skeleton of an Elephant, and of the Mastodon; the former bearing about the same proportion to the latter as the skeleton of an Ox would have borne to that of the Elephant. There also might be seen specimens of the huge Saurians with whose strange forms Dr. Buckland has made us so familiar.

But whatever pleasure the various departments of Natural History might afford, my great delight was to ramble through the halls where the Etruscan, Roman, the Greek and the Egyptian antiquities were deposited; to scan, though with no artistic eye, the mutilated sculptures from the frieze of the Parthenon and all the manifold forms, Centaurs and Men engaged in deadly combat, among the Elgin and Phigaleian marbles. Most of these were regarded much more from heathen violation than from the touch of time. To watch the calm contemplative countenances of the huge Egyptian sculptures in red Syenitic granite, the names of Remeses, Amenoph and others; or again to meditate over the inscriptions on the Terra Cotta sepulchral urns of Rome, many of them still containing the ashes of the otherwise forgotten dead; frail, yet enduring monuments of the piety of bereaved husbands and wives, parents and children, most of the inscriptions beginning with the conventional, M. D. (Dis Manibus.) Two thousand years ago some of these urns were charged with the ashes of the loved and lost, and the mourners, not having the Christians' consoling hope of a meeting in a better world to sooth them, manifested their affection in these brief inscriptions on earthen vessels; which, after all, exhibit a far purer taste than many of the costly monuments of these latter days with their pompous epitaphs. A few loving words, a brief farewell, usually constitute the whole inscription. Statues, Busts and Reliefs, both Greek and Roman, are numerous; of course of varied merit, yet, almost all of interest to the classical reader as illustrative of the manners and customs of the ancients. One group remains to my mind at this moment of two Greek boys playing with the small bones from the leg of the sheep, as I had often known boys in England. It would seem that there had been a quarrel, one boy was grasping the fragment of an arm of the other; who still firmly held the bone, the cause of the dispute. While the occupations and implements of grown men had become so entirely different, the sports of childhood had continued unchanged.

One of the most noteworthy objects in the department of Egyptian antiquities is the celebrated Rosetta Stone, so called from the place of its discovery. It is a very thick slab of black basalt, about 24 inches by 18, bearing on its surface three inscriptions, the upper one in Hieroglyphics, the second in the Enchorial characters, the customary writing of the old Egyptians, the lowest in Greek. The Greek, of course, could be read, and it was found to relate to Ptolemy and Cleopatra, and to ordain that the triple inscription should be set up in several parts of Egypt. It was manifest, therefore, that the inscriptions were translations of each other, and Dr. Young undertook the task of deciphering the Hieroglyphics by comparing what he judged to be corresponding portions of each. This was the commencement of our knowledge of the meaning of the Hieroglyphics. Dr. Young has been followed by Champollion, Lepsius, Seyffarth and others, and it is now believed that we have the interpretation of many of the mysterious inscriptions on the obelisks and temples of Egypt.

I remember being once highly amused, while strolling through the Egyptian room, by overhearing the remarks of a young gentleman who was being led a party of ladies over the Museum. He readily explained everything; was not for an instant at a loss; till one of the ladies, spying this Rosetta Stone, exclaimed, O, Charles, what is this? At first he seemed puzzled, but his hesitation was but momentary. Soon recovering himself he replied with admirable coolness; That? O, that is a law of the Medes and Persians which alters not.

In the centre of a small ante-room, stood the lovely Portland Vase, itself the only object in the room. Stood, but stands no longer where the public can have free access to it; for, some years since, a maniac shattered it to pieces. It is said to have been perfectly restored, but to protect it from the chance of the repetition of such an outrage, it is now above to but a few visitors at a time and not without a special permission. It is of exquisite form and workmanship, of blue glass, the figures in relief in white, one of them being the genius of death, not as we represent it, a repulsive skeleton, but a fair angelic form. I have often wondered how it came to pass that the heathen should have been able so picture death under such a pleasing and hopeful shape, while Christians, with the promise of heaven before them, have dwelt only on its terrors.

I have said nothing yet of the Library with its cells of shelving, its innumerable treasures of printed books and manuscripts, partly because the Library is not open to the casual visitor.

The arrangements of the Reading Room are of the most liberal kind. It is very easy for any person, properly recommended to obtain the privilege of free access to it, and the whole literary treasures of the Museum are at his service. He has but to hand to one of the attendants, the name of any volume he desires to examine, with its number in the catalogue, and, without any unnecessary delay, the volume is brought to him. He is not permitted to take any book from the room, but he may return, day after day, as long as he desires. Around the room are books of reference of all kinds, to which the reader has unrestricted access; and it is easy to understand how, with such assistance at hand, a dashing article for the Edinburgh or the Quarterly may be written. F.

THE SECOND MOTHER.

A weary time had the three little birdlings in Mr. Holmes' cottage—when she, 'the sweet mother dove,' had folded her white wings in Paradise. A weary time, for, though their father was a kind hearted man, his business called him away all day in the city, and when the latest evening train brought him to his home again, but little time was left for converse with his little ones.—Their mother had been all the world to them.

"We are all utterly lost without her," said the father to his pastor.—"I never had the faculty of arranging matters with the children, of drawing out their confidence, and harmonizing all disquieting matters. I have often looked with astonishment on the ease with which she could accomplish all such things, and that they were safest in her hands; what can my motherless one do without her?"

A widow lady, somewhat advanced in life, was warmly recommended by a friend, in whose good judgment Mr. Holmes confided, as a general superintendent of the household and children; and into her hands the little immortal spirits were intrusted. She possessed the commendable habits of economy and industry: but if ever a fair, sweet flower of feeling had blossomed by the doorway of her heart, it had long since withered, and the very root dried up for want of a single dewdrop to refresh it. The little ones soon learned to shrink from the decided tread of her creaking shoes, so different from the soft foot-fall which used to make their hearts bound with gladness. Soon they found the circle of their simple pleasures grow narrower, and still narrower, until there seemed nothing left. She 'should not have the floor littered up by all that trumpery;' so their pretty playthings were packed away in a closet, the key of which dangled at Mrs Terry's side. Even Carrie's precious dolly, little Florence, with her auburn curls, whose dainty wardrobe mother's own sweet fingers had helped to fashion was shut away with all her pretty robes, in a broken band box. Carrie cried a long morning over it, for which bad behavior she was sharply reproved, and was told 'how grateful she ought to be, that some one was willing to take pity on her forlorn condition, and no mother to see to anything; and would even put up with so much for the sake of keeping everything from going to wreck and ruin.'

So poor Carrie was silenced, though in her secret heart she wished the disinterested stranger had kept away, and let things go to wreck and ruin. Yet she was the oldest of the flock, and sought as wisely as a child of eight summers could to comfort little Neddie and May. Dear little May, she suffered most, for she was a delicate, timid child, and the four years' gentle nursing on that loving bosom had little fitted her for the chilling blast in which her spirit shivered now. Her nervous system was too strongly strung for its frail casemate, and it was plain to the discerning eyes of the new nurse that the child had been hothed too much, and needed tonic training.

Among other failings was an instinctive dread of darkness, and though much tender care had been taken to remove her groundless fears, as yet they had but partially succeeded. This was announced at once as "a great piece of foolishness," and the little one was taken to her bed, when kind Aunt Mary was obliged to return to her home again, with never a tender kiss nor a good night blessing.

"Please don't take away the light, nurse; I am so afraid of the dark," said the little one.

"Fudge," said the nurse, in a contemptuous tone, "you know just as well as I do, there is nothing in the dark to hurt you. It's all a pretence, and I shall take down the light just as soon as I've put these clothes away."

The child cried out in terror and dismay—"Oh, I want my mamma to come home."

"Your mother has gone to heaven, and it is very doubtful whether you will ever go there and see her again, if you are such a naughty girl," was the soothing reply.

The little one's sobs redoubled, and struck like an arrow to the heart of the bereaved father, who was passing through the hall to his own apartment.

"No mother to soothe her now," he thought, as he passed by the partly opened door.

"What is little Mary crying about," he asked kindly.

"I'm 'fraid of the dark, papa, and the nurse will take the light away. When will my mamma come back, papa?"

A deep, half smothered sigh was her only answer, as he sat down on the edge of the little bed.

"Will baby go to sleep on the sofa in papa's room, while papa writes?" he asked. A glad cry, and an upreaching of the soft white arms, were a sufficient answer. He bore the little white-robed figure to his own apartment, placing a pillow for her head, and wrapping his shawl about her; then after a few gentle, loving words, he returned to absorbing care again. It was enough though, for the little heart beat happily, and forgot its troubles in peaceful slumber. In mercy has "the good All Father" ordained it, that the griefs of children should be transient as ——"The dew-drop on the rose,

When next the summer breeze comes by,
And waves the bush—the flower is dry."

The little one was not left alone in the dark again, as the father expressly forbade it, and Mrs. Terry was too politic to risk incurring his displeasure. Indeed, that lady daily nourished the few remaining charms she might have supposed herself to possess, with a secret hope in her heart that she might one day command where she now served.

Many months sped on, and little Carrie grew daily more unhappy, her little sister more fragile, and surly Ned, who needed a steady, restraining hand, more boisterous and rebellious.

But a blessed day dawned on that household. The father brought to his fire-side a second mother for his little ones. The disappointed widow explained the matter to them beforehand, and encouraged them with the assurance that "now they would find that they had to stand around."—"There would be no more running to father with complaints; if they did, it would do no good. They would soon learn that their grumbling had been when they were well off.

It was with no very high anticipations that they watched for the afternoon train, which was to bring the stranger to them. The autumn leaves spread a carpet for the bride, as she walked up the shaded path which led to the door of her new home. The children glanced at her shyly as she entered the parlor. There was no enthusiastic demonstration; but she greeted each one quietly and tenderly, calling them by their respective names. There was no bustle or ceremony, and the children looked up curiously into that clear, frank eye, which met them full and fairly, yet with a quiet, kindly smile. It was only a common face, yet the eye was one which children quickly learn to respect, and on its other foundation can love rest securely.

"A little fire seems pleasant such a chilly day," she said, as she drew off her gloves, and warmed her fingers before the polished grate. "Will Carrie be kind enough to take my bonnet and shawl?" she added pleasantly.

The little girl came forward with a light step, pleased with the idea that she could be useful, and Mrs. Holmes seated herself by the fire, taking up little May very quietly, and placing her on her knee.

"Can May warm my warm cold fingers?" she said, with a half smile, as she slipped one fair hand between the little one's small palms. With a bright smile the little one looked up, and there was a quick interchange of magnetic glances. It was a mere touch of a skilful player on that finest of all instruments, the human heart, yet little May was won. She wrapped up both hands playfully, in her little white apron, and folded her arms over them; looking the picture of content and happiness.

Ned was not much abashed, and gathering up his six year old courage, inquired, boldly, if "papa had brought them home any presents.—Biddy said, he ought to."

"If I am not mistaken, he has not forgotten you. We will look in the travelling-trunk after supper, and see.

"I want my present now," he persisted.

"I think we had better wait," said the same clear voice, and that calm, blue eye looked with the same steady smile into his. Ned felt that smile, and from that moment knew on what side the power lay.

It was not many days before the house began to wear a different aspect. "Old Shades," as saucy Cousin Will used to call the self-sacrificing Mrs. Terry, had taken her departure, and everything seemed to brighten up. The solemn stiffness which invested even the chairs by the walls, suddenly fled away. But no where was the change more apparent than in the little nursery. Fresh white curtains shaded the windows, looped back by tasteful pink ribbons and rosettes, which the children could never sufficiently admire; a simple chintz covered lounge was added to its furniture; and, above all, the old time playthings were drawn forth from their hiding-places, to gladden the little hearts which had so often sighed for them.

The new mamma had a wonderful fund of ingenuity in contriving new amusements and playthings, often, by a half hour's skillful use of her bright scissors could cut out of a bit of gray or black cloth. And then it was perfect witch-work the way those small fingers could fashion over a fragment of cotton flannel into a plump, white rabbit; a pair of red beads for eyes completing the enchantment. It was a unanimous verdict after this astonishing performance, "mamma knew how to do everything." What a trifle it takes to amuse children, and home-made toys give far more pleasure than more expensive ones, as they exercise a child's talent in contriving and fashioning them. Any one may learn, with slight pains-taking, many little arts for making home pleasant to the little ones; and no woman's education should be considered finished without these simple accomplishments. Alice Holmes had been for several years a teacher among children, and there can scarcely be a better preparation for women's life mission. The minds and hearts of her children were carefully cultivated, and their physical education was not neglected. Little May's cheeks began to grow plump and rosy under the combined influence of abundant out-door exercise, wholesome, appetizing food, and above all, the sweet sunshine of love in which her life was passed. All the children throve under her judicious guiding hand, as they never could if left to the care of mere hirelings. Indeed, I have scarcely ever seen a home that was not better off, with a step-mother at its head, than with no mother at all, even though that mother had many imperfections, and failed in many points of duty, as alas! what own mother does not

God bless the noble step mother, wherever is our fair land she may be, who is striving daily in her Heavenly Father's strength to discharge faithfully her arduous duties. Let her strive to cultivate a brave, resolute spirit, which can look the world fearlessly in the eye with all its censoriousness. All the world makes way before a determined, fearless spirit, while a cringling, wandering nature, can never command respect.

Above all, let her live a daily life of faith and prayer, so that the sunlight of divine love may always shine within her breast.

WHAT A HYMN BOOK OUGHT TO BE: AND HOW IT SHOULD BE MADE.

The Hymn Book is the next book to the Bible. It is hardly possible to over estimate its importance. It is everything to those who use it. No other uninspired volume has so deep, so abiding, so general an influence over the minds and hearts of Christians and their families. The young and old, the instructed and the ignorant, the rude and the refined, learn and receive from this common source. Its position forces it upon our attention, its contents commend themselves to our affections. When we enter the house of God, from its pages we worship Him; when in the silence of our houses we send up the voice of complaint, entreaty, or thanksgiving, we often find in it the readiest and fullest expression for the thoughts of our inmost spirits. The hymn book goes far towards forming the library and the ideas of many persons, in matters of doctrine and devotion. It enters the houses of those who possess and read no treatise on theology, no commentary on the Scriptures, no volume of printed sermons, no work on experimental religion. The form in which its contents are presented is essentially popular: the language is for the most part comprehensible by any one, and the metre attracts by its simplicity. The mind has a fondness for easy verse; the memory catches and retains it far more readily than prose; children will commit hymns more willingly than passages of Scripture. All the magic of association, too, is added to the love we feel for these sacred songs, and to their power over us. This hymn we learnt in infancy; that we have sung often and often, with God's people, in the sanctuary; a third seemed to fit our condition, and to supply a voice for our emotions, in hours of sanctified affliction, in seasons of spiritual darkness, or at times when God had made His face to shine upon us with unaccustomed brightness; another was the favorite of some beloved one, whose voice has since been transferred to the choirs of the blest. Is it wonderful that the book which comes to us with the sanction of the Church, which guides so large a part of our devotions in the temple, which thus twines itself around our history and our hearts, should be to us in great measure the exponent of theoretical and practical religion? that we should form our creed, our expectations, our views of Christian truth, duty, and experience as much from this as from any source? and that our active faith, the spiritual life within us, should be moulded as largely by this as by any earthly influence?

If this be true (and that it is, the experience of every one can in some measure testify,) it follows that it is vastly important, what sort of a hymn book we have. If the mass of the people are so greatly influenced by it, (and none the less, because unconsciously:) if the children of the Church learn lessons from it, more readily than from catechism and question book: if our men of culture and learning, our theologians, preachers and thinkers, find its power insensibly and subtly distilled into their minds in youth,—yea, and in ripe manhood too; if, in fine, the hymn book be of such vital moment, not only to the Church's external services, but to her inner life, as all Christians acknowledge, (while but few, perhaps, understand,) that it is: it behooves us to see to it, that this great engine for good be of the best quality and largest power; that there be no avoidable defect in its materials or construction; that no flaws be created, no opposing given by needless accident; to other words, that the book be such as will do no harm, and as much good as possible. Any hymn book which is used in a power: if it be evangelical in sentiment, and decent in literary merit, it is a power for good: and it is plain, that as its excellence advances, so will its usefulness; a perfect hymn book will do more good than an imperfect one. A selection containing three hundred hymns, of mixed or indifferent character may be better than none; but one which includes an equal number, of standard excellence, will be better yet in its effect upon the minds of those who use it; and one containing twice as many, of equal merit, will be yet more acceptable, as giving more varied and no less solid food.

A hymn book may be objectionable either positively or negatively; may be in some sense actually bad, or simply not as good as it might be; may contain false and dangerous matter, or be scant in its supply of the good. The heretic Arius, we are told, composed hymns on his peculiar doctrines, and sung men into Unitarianism. So is unscriptural theology sometimes promulgated in the garb of holy song, in this modern day. There are hymns (so called) of self-righteousness; hymns on the nobility of human nature; on the inferiority of the Son to the Father; on the universal salvation of the world hereafter. It is needless to speak of the effect of these: a hymn book usually either expresses or produces, the life of its own denomination: "Let me make the songs of the Church, and I care not who makes her creeds." Of course this vice does not prevail among orthodox societies; but there are minor faults which work their own ill results. A hymn book may be incorrect in other things than theology; its contents may be such as breed 'burnt districts,' as inculcate a jumping and shouting religion, whose fruits are more brilliant than solid, and its worship more loud than deep. But it may be said our collection is not open to that charge: true. Again, a hymn book may be filled (a sadly common fault) with wearisome, characterless, lifeless verse, which sometimes does as much harm as good. For when the authorities of a Church propose to palm off this kind of doubly long metre on their congregations as sacred lyrical poetry, the better educated and more discerning of the people will perceive the imposition, and their common sense will rebel against being edified by that which has no power of edification: while those who believe what is told them, and cannot distinguish between a genuine hymn and a mass of prose worked into rhymed metre, will have their tastes still further depraved and their glimmering notions of what is and what is not, darkened into utter intellectual night. The day is past when it could be supposed that the graces of style, and the gifts of genius, had nothing to do with singing the Lord's praises: in this age it is understood, in theory at least, (would that it were in practice!) that a hymn book ought to establish and maintain a high standard of literary merit; that it should violate the rules neither of grammar nor of rhetoric; that it should be able to endure the test of any fair and appreciative criticism; and that its general contents should rather gratify than offend a severe and elegant taste.

It may be asked, How many hymn books exist which have risen to this standard? Few enough, indeed; but we are not to suppose from this that such a book could not be created. That a subject has never yet been properly understood, does not prove that it never will be: that few or none heretofore, have done a piece of work thoroughly, is no evidence that no one hereafter will do it better. Why do we live, if not to learn and to improve?

The negative fault, above ascribed to hymn books, remains to be considered: it is the commonest and perhaps the worst of all their faults. Our language contains many respectable hymn books; not one that is complete. There are many of quite sufficient size; not one that is exhaustive: not one that does not omit many hymns that are fully up to its standard, and some that are as good as its best. Whether the field has ever been fully reaped, or whether the reapers did not know grain from chaff, when they were mostly out knowledge of the subject, or lack of judgment in choosing, or sheer indolence in the compilers of hymn books, certain it is that a great mass of precious treasures have been left to perish unknown, defrauded of the use for which God designed them.

It is an ignorant error to suppose that if it can be said of a hymn book, "there are a great many good hymns in it," that is enough. No compilation of any size can well help having many good hymns in it; it should aim to leave none out of it. In this, as in every endeavor, we should set Perfection before us as our object and ideal: and though the frailty of all human works prevent our attaining that, we may and must study to approximate it indefinitely. A manual may contain 'many good hymns' on the Atonement and on Christian Duty; but the absence of 'Rock of Ages' and 'A charge to keep I have,' will be felt. A minister has no right to take all his texts and chapters from the Epistles and the Psalms, ignoring the historical books of Old and New Testaments. He might tell his people that he read and preached the Gospel; but they could answer that it was not the whole Gospel. Just so we have no right to keep from the people any portion of the real treasures of sacred song with which pious and gifted men have endowed the Church. If the compilers of a hymn book, from any reason, omit three, twenty, or one hundred hymns of positive excellence and unquestioned usefulness, are they not, to that extent, robbing the congregation which use the result of their labors?

ORIENTAL PLOUGHING—THE FORCE OF CUSTOM.

Whilst most of the peculiarities of oriental life may be traced to patriarchal times, some of them are far from being in accordance with the Mosaic requirements. In Deut. 22: 10, it is said "Thou shalt not plough with an ox and an ass together." This direction I had often seen violated in Syria and Palestine, and even in Europe, but stranger yet than this appeared, the practice which I witnessed in my excursions about Jerusalem, of ploughing with two as

NOTICE.

APPOINTMENTS ON SABBATH, MAY 4TH.

The morning services of the Wesleyan A. M. E. Church, Hurst street, will be devoted to the baptism of several persons by immersion; a charge will be delivered to the candidates at 9 o'clock, A. M., in said church, by the pastor. From thence to proceed to South Street Wharf, for Gloucester Point, by way of the boat, leaving said wharf at 10 A. M.

Fare each way, 6 cts.

Revs. I. J. Hill and S. Jones will take part in the administration of the ordinance. In the afternoon, at 3 o'clock, a sermon will be delivered to the Daughters of Conference connected with said church. Theme—"Female Influence, and their Obligations to exert it in the cause of Christianity."

At half-past 7 o'clock, P. M., a sermon will be delivered preparatory to the administration of the Lord's Supper.

The Pastor's Valedictory Address for this Conference year will be delivered on Wednesday, the 7th of May, at 8 o'clock, evening.

NOTICE.

The Tenth Annual Commencement Exercises of the Institute for Colored Youth, will take place on Tuesday and Wednesday next, May 6th and 7th. Tuesday will be devoted to an examination of classes in the High and Preparatory Schools, at the Institute Building, 716 and 718 Lombard street. The examination will commence at 9 o'clock, A. M., and continue until 6½ o'clock, P. M.

On Wednesday, the Rhetorical and Elocutionary Exercises of the Alumni and of the under-graduates will occur; those of the Alumni will be held in Sansom Street Hall, beginning at 11 o'clock, A. M.; those of the under-graduates will be in the same hall in the evening, beginning at 8 o'clock.

At the close of the exercises on Tuesday, the distribution of prizes among the successful competitors will be made; and on Wednesday evening at the close, the diplomas will be presented to the members of the graduating class.

FUTURE.

An article from Rev. T. Strother, of Terre Haute, Indiana, we reserve for the next number.

OUR FOURTH PAGE.

Through arrangements made by the editor before leaving town, and through the courtesy of the Publisher of the Youth's Evangelist, we are enabled to present our readers with two illustrations, and a number of extracts from the numbers of the Youth's Evangelist for May 1st and 15th.

Sabbath School Superintendents who may wish the Recorder for distributing in their schools, will be supplied at the rate of three dollars per hundred!

NOTICE.

This is to certify that I shall be very happy to meet the Rt. Revs. Quinn and Payne in a Bishops' Council in Bethel Studio, Sixth St., at 3 o'clock, P. M., on Wednesday, the 7th inst.

(Signed) WILLIS NAZREY.

The St. Louis A. M. E. Sabbath School, under the charge of Rev. John Turner, one of the strong Western pioneers, has shown, through him, with the teachers and members at the head, how highly they esteem the Christian Recorder and its Editor. The Rev. Mr. Turner has sent us quite an interesting letter. They have sent us $30 for the benefit of the Recorder. All hail to the St. Louis Church and Sabbath School. Let all of our Sabbath Schools do likewise who have not as yet done so, and the connexion will soon see what an establishment we will have for the young and rising generation.

We returned home only a few hours previous to the time of going to press, and consequently cannot say as much as we could desire; but we refer our readers to the report of the Sabbath School, and also to Rev. John Turner's Address to them.

The Rev. A. L. Stanford deserves much credit for his kindness in conducting the editorial department of the Recorder. Also, the Baltimore Conference deserves credit for recommending ways and means to aid and encourage us in the great cause that we are engaged in for the Church That's right, brethren!—push while we pull!—and GOD will most surely bless us in our labors —ED

A CRITICISM ON "BISHOP PAYNE'S REJOINDER TO BISHOP NAZREY."

To his reverence, Bishop D. A. Payne.

DEAR SIR:—It is no pleasure to me to be found a controversialist with one whose duty, like my own, is to make and preserve peace among men, and point mankind the way to God. But in the Episcopal controversy, as you seem to dispense with the proper means given us for establishing peace, and have placed yourself in a hostile attitude to right, duty compels me to oppose such a position.

In your rejoinder of April 12th, you have, in the absence of truth, substituted a number of suppositions, and mustered to your aid a similar amount of logical and rhetorical fallacies, and with great ingenuity labored to deceive; and, though you may think me "blind in one eye and cannot see out of the other," yet, I shall endeavor to expose some of those fallacies.

First, You say that my "denial of exercising a double episcopal authority, contradicts the decree of the General Conference of 1860," &c. Now let us inquire what this venerable body said: "They did not say that I was exercising a double Episcopal authority, (and neither could they, for I was exercising my authority under their directions,) but they said, mark; they "believed it was double." Now, when a man is summoned before a court as an evidence, he is to testify to what he knows, and not to what he merely believes; no man is hanged on the mere belief of others. I have not, therefore, contradicted any decree of that "venerable and authoritative body."

Again, in speaking of the Episcopal jurisdiction in Canada, in my article of March 15th, I intended only to show that Bishops Brown, Quinn, Payne and Nazrey, all received their authority from the same power, and that in Nazrey's case there was a special act that he "should serve in accordance with the wishes of the Canadians," which made his acts as lawful, if not more so, than theirs; and if the one is double, then are they all double. But you unsuccessfully attempt to show that the "parallel" thus drawn is a "complete failure." "Because," say you, "while they presided over the churches of Canada, these churches were nothing more nor less than so many missionary branches," &c.: then if so, the various districts of the A. M. E. Church are yet nothing more than missionary branches, for the same means used to connect the New England, Ohio, Indiana and other districts were used to connect Canada with the A. M. E. Church. Again, you say that their "authority was only temporary" and "permissive," but Nazrey's authority is "for life"—"legal and rightful,"—if that is true, the conclusion is favorable to my position, and your fallacious reasoning must fall to the ground.

Again, you say, you "wonder that" I "do not deny my own existence;" in a few sentences after you call me "most sapient Bishop," which means most wise Bishop. Can you make honest men and women believe that you are surprised that a wise man does not deny his own existence? No sir, you can make them believe no such thing, but you have made them believe that your intention is to mislead their judgment in regard to the Episcopal controversy. Again, by your letter in the Recorder of March the 1st, you tell us that the request of the General Conference of 1860, relative to my resignation was a "decree," and in your rejoinder of April the 15th, you say that you "are not so ignorant as not to know that a request is not a decree." Now sir, what are we to believe, as it is impossible for a thing to exist and not to exist at the same time? You then ask, if "this request under consideration is not the legitimate result of the decree touching your" (my) "Bishopric." I answer, if you mean what you called a decree in your letter of March the 1st, there is no such decree exists, and effects or results cannot exist without causes. Then, so much of your fallacious argument is of no avail. But if you mean the decree of 1856 or the "Clarke resolution," and the request of the Canadians at the Convention; my answer is that this request, i. e. "for one of the Bishops to serve them," is like the decree or "Clarke resolution," i. e. "that one of the Bishops shall be appointed to serve them in accordance with their wishes." Or, using your language, "the fruit is like the tree," or partakes so much of the nature of the tree, that no power can change the relation between them, but those who made the decree and the parties with whom it was made. Therefore, this part of your fallacious argument is against you and the result in my favor. Again, you say "that the General Conference having previously decided that" I "alone was the Bishop of the B. M. E. Church had no power to command me," if this is true, why did you wish at that critical juncture to take the advantage of the members of that body, which you now make so "venerable?" You was aware that Bishop Quinn was sick, and by some not expected to live. At such an unhappy period, I ask, why did you resign and refuse to act as one of the Bishops of the A. M. E. Church and at the same time know that they had no power to command me? Here are your words in a modified form, according to the Minutes of the General Conference of 1860. See Minute, page 20. "Bishop Payne announced to the Conference that he could not conscientiously act as Bishop until the above was repealed," and your leaving during a part of the Conference, accounts for my presiding over the Conference twelve or thirteen sessions out of twenty-three.

Again, you say that the "decree of" the General Conference of "1860 confirmed you (me) in your (my) life time Bishopric" in the B. M. E Church, and then asked me to resign.

Now I ask, what did they mean by this request, after having falsely accused me of separating myself from the A. M. E Church, and some publishing that I was gone to Canada? Was it to practise deception on me, or in hopes that I would deny their request? Or what was the design of first confirming me for life as Bishop of the B. M. E. Church, and then requesting me to resign? I wanted to know then, and I want to know yet.

Again, you say that I "gave myself to the Canadians to be their Bishop for life," after having previously said, "that the Canadians asked for me and I was given to them by the General Conference." Now, which assertion is true, for you have given us two, and one opposite, or contradictory to the other?

Again, you say that in 1852 or 3, I "bought a farm and built a house in Canada," &c. My reply to this is, that in 1852 I did buy fifty acres of wild wood land, and for it, I was to pay $137,50 cts., part of which I paid down at the time of bargaining, and was allowed time to make payment of the balance. In 1856 I built a log house on a portion of the land. I did not know that this course of procedure was such a sin as would require me to be called in question by five Annual Conferences, or thirty-one members of the General Conference of the A. M. E. Church, or representatives of said Conferences.

Again, you tell me that "to consent for" me "to exercise Episcopal authority while this pledge remains unfulfilled is what we never can and never will consent to do in the face of the prohibitory decrees of the last General Conference." Now, mark, you say in another place of your rejoinder that you was "not so ignorant as not to know that a request was not a decree," and here you call it "prohibitory decrees." I ask which is true? Again, you have sent out your circulars over the different districts to get thirty-one names or "representatives of five Annual Conferences," as you term them, and you tell them in that circular that you wanted to offer some plan in accordance with my request, concerning my Bishopric, &c. (See "Letter to Bishop Nazrey" of Recorder, March 1st.) Now, after you have obtained their names you deceive them, and come out in open rebellion, and say that "we never will consent for you to exercise Episcopal authority," &c. You here bring in the pronoun "we" instead of saying, I as you should have done to give us your real meaning. Moreover, the General Conference tell us who shall exercise Episcopal authority, and when any minor portion of its members independent of the major part of this authoritative Council, openly declare that I or "we" will never consent to these your doings, and at the same time refuse to use the only legitimate means to alter or change, i. e. either by Council or by a called General Conference, (the former of which has been already set aside, and the latter not resorted to,) I must confess is a little too much.

Again, sir, you attempted to prove that I am exercising Episcopal jurisdiction in Canada, by proxy, and as usual you destroy the design you seek to establish, or in other words, your argument, like all other fallacious arguments, is a compound where the two simplest, i. e., truth and error, are held in solution: but one drop of sound logic is sufficient to separate and expose your fallacy. First, you say that the General Conference of the B. M. E. Church, "which refused to accept my, (Nazrey's) resignation, elected an assistant Superintendent." Observe, here, you tell us that they refused to receive my resignation. Will your reverence tell me how they could refuse it if I did not offer it, as I pledged myself to do? But I either did or did not offer it. And if I did offer it, then your assertion, that my pledge with the General Conference is "unfulfilled," is not true; and if I did not offer it, then is your last assertion relative to the "Canadians refusing to receive my resignation," untrue. Hence, your argument works against you in either case, and still renders it more apparent that you are laboring to deceive. Moreover, if the General Conference of the B. M. E. Church elected an assistant, he is their agent, and not "Nazrey's," and is, therefore, acting as all other agents should act under the authority of the power that authorized him. But you say that the A. M. E. Church confirmed Nazrey, "in his life time Bishopric," and exultingly ask, "To whom is he" (the assistant superintendent,) "assistant?" Why, sir, the answer is plain from the following: The same General Conference that you say refused to receive Nazrey's resignation, also declared that by virtue of a clear understanding and lawful agreement made in good faith with the A. M. E. Church, that one of the Bishops of the A. M. E. Church should serve the Canadians in accordance with their wishes, which wishes were for life. But since the agreement was entered into and granted, the General Conference of the A. M. E. Church requested said Bishop to resign from the B. M. E. Church. And as the members of the B. M. E. Conference were the contractors with the A. M. E. General Conference, but had no power to make, neither did they wish to make the Bishop violate his pledge to the A. M. E. Church, while they, therefore, resolved never to relinquish their claim to him in accordance with the contract made with the A. M. E. Church, they also resolved to look to the A. M. E. Church for Episcopal services whenever necessity required, until the matter could be properly settled between the parties, and the Bishop of their choice should return to them. They, therefore, appointed a standing committee to invite him or either of the Bishops of the A. M. E. Church to attend to their Annual Conferences, and they elected an assistant to do all the duties of the Church, except the ordinations, and to assist his reverence, (the Bishop,) who might be present at the Conference. So we conclude that to all reasonable persons your grave question is answered.

Again, you have tried to make it appear that I have treated thirty-one members of the General Conference with "silent contempt," because I did not connect them with your letter of deception. But such is not the case. Any man, though he may be accused of being "blind in one eye and cannot see out of the other," may plainly learn (by the sense of hearing, if he is deprived of seeing,) that your communication in the Recorder of March 1st, is commenced and closed as an individual document, and not a document coming from thirty-one persons who are scattered over a country, and some of them hundreds of miles distant, each from the other, when the document was written.

Again, your letter came to me in all its official or authoritative character with the following words, "Signed Daniel A. Payne, one of the Bishops of the A. M. E. Church." Now, even a blind man knows that the General Conference did not ordain nor elect thirty-one of its members in Daniel A. Payne. And this is one reason why I charge your letter with deception, because of the lack of agreement in its beginning, intermedium and ending.

Again, when I address any particular part or parts of the Church, I address them in their respective classes or in the position they are placed, whether lay members or officers. If officers, I regard or address them as Trustees, Stewards, Leaders, Exhorters, Preachers, Deacons, Elders, Members of an Annual Conference, or of a General Conference, &c., as the case may be. When the last named class was addressed in my article of January 11th, 1862, I did not mean the Bishops, because I knew that it was their privilege and duty to meet together in Council and see each other to arrange matters for the best interest of the Church. And if the class addressed should have offered any unlawful measures, the Bishops would then be the right and proper persons to interfere. But when one of them, (the Bishops,) openly refuse to use the only lawful means enacted or ordered by the General Conference, I am compelled to inquire, "Watchman, what of the night?"—for really I am at a loss to know where we are coming or what will be the end. Now, I do not hold any one or two Elders of the A. M. E. Church infallible or above the rest, neither do I condemn those of the class addressed, in my "January article," for offering their plans through the paper. But I do object to any person or persons leaving his or their proper position, and through egotism, placing himself or themselves at the head of other classes and assuming the dictatorship without being asked to do so. Now, sir, it is evident you have assumed this authority, for your reverence tells us "We never will consent for you to exercise Episcopal authority," &c. I suppose by this your declaration, that I may look for a recess from the South to be sent out, to catch and chain me, as you was going to do Bishop Quinn in 1852, had I not stopped you. However, we will try and prepare a committee of reception, as it is the order of these days.

Other parts of your "Rejoinder" need a severe criticism, but for the sake of brevity I have deemed it unnecessary to further criticise. I have already made this article longer than I intended at the commencement. I wish the readers to excuse me for taxing so long their attention. I hope not to be compelled to write more in connexion with this controversy, but that our difficulties may be brought to a final issue. The controversy I did not court, but it has been forced upon me. I have begged for peace, but certain antagonists declare war, and are attempting to drive all peace theories to the winds. As Southern rebels compelled the Unionists to fight in support of their noble banner, so am I compelled to sustain the right, in support of the great and glorious flag of truth and justice. So help me God.

W. NAZREY.

IN BEHALF OF THE CHRISTIAN RECORDER.

St. Louis, April 18th, 1862.

MR. EDITOR:—Seeing the many appeals and the earnest efforts made by you to sustain our Church organ, the Christian Recorder, the Sabbath School attached to the St. Paul's Chapel felt it their duty to make an effort to obtain the needful assistance. That we may have the pleasure of contributing our mite to the best paper ever published by our connexion, is our earnest desire; but, in these hard times, what were we to do?—how could we raise the wherewith to fulfil our desire? At length the Rev. JOHN TURNER came to our aid, and suggested that the School celebrate the Forty-Sixth Anniversary of our Church. "That is just the thing!" was exclaimed on all sides. We thank God for having given our beloved pastor the honor of originating the idea.

The Sabbath School Union Society, composed of the teachers of this school, took the matter in hand, and went earnestly to work to perfect the arrangements. Committees were appointed, and assigned their different duties.

Friend Weaver, as you are, I know, wishing to have all the particulars, I will give you the names of the Committees in order:

COMMITTEE ON DONATIONS.

Mrs. Mary Armsted, Mrs. Mary James,
Ezekiel Pyne, Miss Joanna Mosby,
Mrs. Mary E. Turner.

COMMITTEE ON DECORATIONS.

Mrs. Mag. E. Pritchard, Miss Joanna Mosby,
Mary Armsted, Malinda J. Boyd,
Frances Pyne, Lucy A. White,
Ann Jackson, Sarah Prince,
Mary James, Mrs. Emeline Boyd.
Chairman—Mrs. Susan V. Robinson.
Supt. of Tables—Mrs. Harriet Francis.

COM. ON DECLAMATION AND SINGING.

Mr. George Wedley, Wm. H. Grey,
Moses Dickson.
Chairman—Mrs. Lucy J. Robinson.

The following programme was the order of the evening's exercises:

1. Hymn sung by the school—"Glory to God on high."
2. Prayer by the Rev. John Turner.
3. Hymn by the children—Sabbath School Festival.
4. An Oration by Rev. John Turner—Subject, History of the Church.
5. Hymn by the school—That Sweet Story of Old.
6. An Address by Miss Lucy A. White—Subject, Power of GOD.
7. Recitation by Susan America Estes—Subject, Light of Life.
8. Ode by Miss Eliza Allen—Jesus Lives.
9. Recitation by Miss Sarah Prince—Joy to Israel.
10. Dialogue by Miss Mary L. McDonald and Emma J. Harris.
11. An Address by Henry Bailey—Subject, The Ministry.
12. An Ode sung by Miss Angeline Anderson.
13. Recitation by Miss Frances Scott—Subject, Our Saviour.
14. An Address by Miss Malinda J. Boyd—Subject, The Last Plague of Egypt.
15. An Address by Margaret Dutton—Subject, City of God.
16. Dialogue by James Bass, James Henry, Wm. Meachum, John R. Mahony—Subject, Father Allen in his Study Receiving Visits from the Brethren.
18. Hymn by School—O Come, let us Sing.

The day and night were wet, I may say very damp, for it rained plentifully; the streets were very muddy, and yet we had a fair turn-out to honor the occasion. St. Paul's Chapel was decorated with a becoming splendor that will forever add a lustre to the genius and taste of the decorating Committee. Come, let us enter at eight o'clock, P. M. The Church is brilliantly illuminated. On each side of the pulpit are a hundred children, standing with their smiling faces and sparkling eyes, looking as beautiful as the morning sun, and in their clear, juvenile voices singing praises to God on high. The house was filled with youth and beauty, old and young, grave and gay, and here and there might be seen an old veteran of the cross viewing the scene with approbation.

Fronting the altar was a magnificent arch that reached from the floor nearly to the ceiling, with this inscription, done in letters of evergreen:—"Forty-sixth Anniversary of the A. M. E. Church, organized April 11th, A. D. 1816." Behind the altar, suspended high above all, was a life-like likeness of the venerable Bishop Allen. Just below him hung a lithographic engraving of the inner view of old Bethel, in Philadelphia. On either side was flanked by Bishops Allen, Brown, Quinn and Payne. Suspended in different parts of the church were many fine paintings and engravings of old prophets; also of the Bishops, and the outer and inner view of Bethel Church, of your city.

It was a scene to charm the eye—a poet's dream, a painter's fancy.

The Rev. John Turner made a short, comprehensive address, in which he very ably described the rise and progress of the Church. The children spoke and sang excellently, and elicited many irrepressible applauses. The ceremonies concluded at eleven o'clock, and all retired well pleased with the manner in which our first Anniversary had been conducted.

A COPY OF REV. JOHN M. TURNER'S ADDRESS TO THE SABBATH SCHOOL OF ST. PAUL'S CHAPEL.

Mr. President and Members of the Sabbath School Union Association, and Sabbath School Scholars—Having been appointed to address you on this occasion upon the history of the A. M. E. Church, I regret that I have not had time and opportunity to prepare an elaborate address.

The occasion on which we have assembled is an interesting and important one, having met to celebrate the Forty-sixth Anniversary of our Church, an event which all hail with delighted and rejoicing hearts.

As to our history, I would state the following In November, 1787, the colored people belonging to the Methodist Society of Philadelphia convened together, in order to take into consideration the evils under which they labored, arising from the unkind treatment of their white brethren, who considered them a nuisance in the house of worship, and even pulled them off their knees while in the act of prayer, and ordered them to the back seats, &c. For these and various other acts of unchristian conduct, our fathers considered it their duty to devise a plan in order to build a house of their own, to worship GOD under their own vine and fig tree. In this undertaking they met with great opposition from an elder of the Methodist Church, (J. M. C.,) who threatened that if they did not give up the building, erase their names from the subscription paper, and make acknowledgment for having attempted such a thing, that in three months they should all be publicly expelled from the Methodist Society Not considering themselves bound to obey this injunction, and being fully satisfied they should be treated without mercy, they sent in their resignation.

Being now as outcasts, they had to seek for friends where they could; and the Lord put it into the hearts of Dr. Benj. Rush, Mr. B. Ralston and other respectable citizens, to interfere for them, both by advice and assistance, in getting their building finished. Bishop White also aided them, and ordained one from among themselves after the order of the Protestant Episcopal Church, to be their pastor.

In 1797 the number of the serious people of color having increased, they were of different opinions respecting the mode of religious worship—and as many felt a strong partiality for that adopted by the Methodists, Rev. Richard Allen, with the advice of some of his brethren, proposed erecting a place of worship on his own ground, and at his own expense, as an African M. E. Meeting-house. As soon as the preachers of the Methodist Church in Philadelphia came to the knowledge of this, they opposed it with all their might, insisting that the house should be made over to the Conference, or they would publish them in the newspapers as imposing on the public, as they were not Methodists. However, the building went on, and when finished they invited Bishop Asbury, of the Methodist Church, to open the house for divine service, which invitation he accepted, and the house was named Bethel. It was now proposed by the resident elder, J. M. C., that they should have the Church incorporated, that they might receive any donation or legacy, as well as enjoy any other advantage arising therefrom. This was agreed to, and in order to save expense, the elder proposed drawing it up for them; but they soon found that he had done it in such a manner as entirely deprived them of the liberty they expected to enjoy—so that, by this stratagem, they were again brought into bondage by the Methodist preachers.

In this situation they experienced grievances too numerous to mention, which continued for several years successively, until about 1816. At this time the colored people in Baltimore and other places were treated in a similar manner as those in Philadelphia, who, rather than go to law, were compelled to seek places of worship for themselves. This induced the people of Philadelphia to call a general convention in April, 1816, to form a connexion. Delegates appointed to represent different Churches met those of Philadelphia—and in order to secure their privileges and promote union among themselves, it was "Resolved, That the people of Philadelphia, Baltimore, and all other places, who should unite with them, should become one body under the name and style of the African Methodist Episcopal Church—the first and only A. M. E. Church in the United States." We believe that it was the design of a gracious Providence in thus uniting us to mark out a way by which the despised African race might have an opportunity of receiving from their own brethren that religious instruction from which they have been kept by persons claiming to be their superiors, and thereby privileged to sit under their own vine and fig-tree; and, though opposed by the prejudices of the times, persecuted by the tongue of calumny, and buffeted by the great adversary of GOD and man, we have had the happiness of seeing the pleasure of the Lord prospering in our hands, to whom we appeal for our good conscience in Christ Jesus The preachers and members of our Church having become a distinct body of people by reason of separation from our white brethren of the A. M. E Church found it necessary, at their first General Conference in April, 1816, to elect one from their own body who was adequate to be set apart in holy orders to superintend the connexion that was then formed. The Rev. Richard Allen, being seventeen years an ordained preacher by the Rev. Bishop Asbury, of the M. E Church, was unanimously elected to fill that office; and on the 11th day of April, 1816, the said Rev. R. Allen was solemnly set apart for the Episcopal office by prayer and the imposition of the hands of five regularly ordained ministers, at which time the General Conference in Philadelphia did unanimously receive said Richard Allen as their Bishop, being fully satisfied with the validity of his Episcopal ordination.

Prior to 1816 there was a very little space in these United States for the development of the mental strength of our race; there were no openings before them to induce a cultivation of what a kind Providence had been pleased to endow them with. However great their aspirations might have been, there was no point to which they could look with any degree of certainty of realizing their hopes. The long looked for period ultimately arrived when the fathers believed something could be done in order to secure that religious liberty which they knew was guaranteed to every man in the happy land of Columbia, or under the spread eagle of America.

In forty-six years, the A. M. E. Church has spread over a majority of the States of this Union, from the waters of the Atlantic east to the gold regions of California. Her proud flag is floating to the breeze, and under her banner some fifty thousand members are gathered, led on by more than three hundred preachers, and a large number of local preachers. If there had never been an A. M. E. Church in this country, there would have been no place where we could have exercised to any extent the talent GOD has given us—but, thank GOD, as she (the Church) moves onward to her zenith, as fair as the moon, clear as the sun, she tells to all around to mark well her bulwarks, consider her palaces, that ye may tell to the generations following.

The A. M. E. Church has done more for the elevation of the colored people than all the other denominations of Christians in this country. Through her instrumentality the onward march of ignorance and superstition have been arrested Thousands of children are taught in her Sabbath Schools. Let a young man of bright intellect become a member of the A. M E. Church. He sees an opening before him—a place where he may be useful, and, knowing the qualifications that are essential to success, he commences to prepare his mind to fill with dignity any position which Providence or the Church may assign him, &c. All the religious liberty which the colored people enjoy in this country is attributable to the organization of the A. M. E. Church. There were no efforts put forth for their religious elevation previous to 1816, but since then great changes have taken place—the clouds have dispersed, and light has commenced dawning, and there is a brighter day in the future to shine upon our race. The A. M. E. Church now holds several Annual Conferences every year—viz.: Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Ohio, Indiana, New England, Missouri. The California Conference was set off in 1860. The A. M. E. Church has a book establishment, located in the city of Philadelphia, where all the books and religious periodicals are edited by a person raised in the A. M. E. Church. Is there any other colored Christian denomination in this country that has a book concern of their own, where a religious journal is published? No—not one.

Mr. Belcher, in his Church History, in speaking of our connexion, says: "It is gratifying to know that the members of this body show a high regard for education. They sustain four seminaries for the education of their youth. These are in Baltimore, Md., Columbus, Ohio; Allegheny and Pittsburgh, Pa." We bless the name of the great Head of the Church that we can now add Xenia, Ohio—the Wilberforce University

EPISCOPACY OF OUR CHURCH, &c

Rev Richard Allen was ordained Bishop on the 11th day of April, 1816.

Rev. Morris Brown was ordained Bishop on the 25th day of May, 1828

Rev. Edward Waters was ordained Bishop on the 15th day of May, 1836.

Rev. Wm. P Quinn was ordained Bishop on the 7th day of May, 1844

Revs Willis Nazrey and Daniel A Payne were ordained Bishops, May the 17th, 1852.

Bishop Payne is the last Bishop ordained—but not least; it is true he is least in stature, but not in intellect and intelligence. Our connexion is now in a prosperous condition throughout its bounds. We have all our Bishops

In conclusion, let me say, my prayer to GOD is that the number of Sabbath Schools may be increased, and, also, the number of faithful teachers, the number of faithful members of church, also the number of faithful ministers This will necessarily increase the number of Bishops, &c.

INSTITUTE FOR COLORED YOUTH.

The annual (private) examination of the Senior Class of this Institution took place last week. It was confined to Latin, Greek, and Mathematics, and was conducted in writing, under the direction of Professor PLINY E. CHASE, A. M., of this city. The following are the questions in Latin:

QUESTION 1.

Mum, mihi causa memora, quo numine laeso.

What different translations can you give of this line?

QUESTION 2.

Ille haec, deposità tandem formidine, fatur:
Cuncta equidem tibi, rex, fuerit quodcumque, fatebor
Vera, inquit; neque me Argolica de gente negabo:
Hoc primum; nec, si miserum fortuna Sinonem
Finxit, vanum etiam mendacemque improba finget.

Scan these lines, giving the rule for the quantity of each syllable.

QUESTION 3

Explain the proper names and epithets which occur in Virg. Aen. I., v. 441–473. (These are Pœni, Juno, Sidonia Dido, Æneas, Ilienses, Atridas, Priamus, Achilles, Achaia, Pergama, Græii, Trojana, Phryges, Rhesus, Tydides, Trojæ, Xanthum.

QUESTION 4.

Parse and give the rules for the italicised words in the following lines:

Tum breviter Dido, vultum demissa, profatur:
Solvite corde metum, Teucri; secludite curas,
Res dura et regni novitas me talia cogunt
Moliri, et late fines custode tueri.
Auxilio tutos dimittam, opibus que juvabo
Hin animum arcebit dictis.

QUESTION 5.

Translate the following lines:

Postquam introgressi, et coram data copia fandi,
Maximus Ilioneus placido sic pectore coepit:
O regina, novam cui condere Jupiter urbem,
Justitiaque dedit gentes frenare superbas,
Troës te miseri, ventis maria omnia vecti,
Oramus: prohibe infandos a navibus ignes;
Parce pio generi, et propriis res adspice nostras.
Non nos aut ferro Libycos populare Penates
Venimus, aut raptas ad litora vertere praedas;
Non ea vis animo, nec tanta superbia victis.
Est locus, Hesperiam Graii cognomine dicunt,
Terra antiqua, potens armis atque ubere glebae;
Œnotri coluere viri, nunc fama minores
Italam dixisse, ducis de nomine, gentem.

QUESTION 6

Arrange in the English order of construction the following lines:

Primus se, Danaûm magna comitante catervâ,
Androgeus offert nobis, socia agmina credens
Iasenus; atque ultro verbis compellat amicis:
Festinate, viri; nam quastam sera moratur
Segnities? Alii rapiunt incensa feruntque
Pergama; vos celsis nunc primum a navibus itis!

QUESTION 7.

Parse Dum abitur eram: Virg. Aen. II., v 428.

QUESTION 8.

Give a liberal translation of the following lines:

Nate dea, (nam te majoribus ire per altum
Auspiciis manifesta fides; sic fata deum rex
Sortitur, volvitque vices; is vertitur ordo;)
Pauca tibi e multis, quo tutior hospita lustres
Æquora, et Ausonio possis considere portu,
Expediam dictis; prohibent nam cætera Parcæ
Scire, Helenum farique vetat Saturnia Juno.

QUESTION 9.

Point out the compound words, and their elements, in the following lines:

Longuinqua tum portus jubet, et considere transtris
Certatim socii feriant mare, et aequora verrant.
Protenus aerias Phaeacum abscondimus arces,
Litoraque Epiri legimus, portuque subimus
Chaonio, et celsam Buthroti accedimus urbem

QUESTION 10

Give the roots of the nouns and verbs in the following lines:

Proxhibimur pelago vicina Ceraunia juxta,
Unde iter Italiam, cursus que brevissimus undis
Sol ruit interea, et montes umbrantur opaci.

Subjoined are the questions in Greek. The first eight are on the Greek Reader; the ninth and tenth are confined to the Greek Testament:

QUESTION 1.

Translate literally the following passage:

Ὅτου, ἄφρων ἐστὶν ἐπιθυμῆσαι, τινὰ ἐκ μέσου ποιῆσαι, ἢ ὑφ' ἑαυτὸν ἐγεῖραι, ἢ ἀνθρώπων, ἢ θεῶν; Ὃς δὲ ἀκριβῶς μανθάνειν ἐπιθυμεῖ ὧν ἕνεκα ἄνθρωπος αὐτὸν προσκυνήσαντος, τοῦτο πάντες ἐπιθυμοῦντες ἔνδικοι καὶ βασιλικοὶ αὐτοὶ ἔσονται.

QUESTION 2.

Translate literally the following passage:

Τῶν ἀνθρώπων βουλόμενοι πυκνὰς βαλεῖν, ὡς ἔοικε, ζῶσι δὶα τὸ κακῶς χειροτονεῖν. Λίμνοιμεν δὲ τούτου τῶν ἄλλων, ὁ πόλους ὑκόλαβεν ἐφ' ἑαυτοῦ. Καὶ οὐχ ὑβὼν ἀνὴρ ἀλλ' εἷς, σὺν βασιλεύοντος, ὁ δεύτερος ἡμᾶς κατάδουλοι ἐπὶ χειρῶν, πῶς ἡμῖν ἐκφεύξεσθε;

QUESTION 3.

Parse the words, ἦν and ἤκουσεν, in the sentence, ἤλιος δὲ ἦν θορυβός, ἐξ ἐγω τοῦτο ἤκουσεν.

QUESTION 4.

Parse ἐκαθέζετο, ἤρξατο, ἔφαγον, and ἔγνων, in the passage, Καινοῦ ἐκ κέρατος βοὸς ἐκαθέζετο τοῦ ὑῶν. Ἐξ τὰ ἑκτῶν εἶπον ὑμῖν, καὶ οὐ πιστεύετε πως, ἐαν εἶπον ὑμῖν τὰ ἐπουράνια, πιστεύσετε; Καὶ οὐδεὶς ἀναβέβηκεν εἰς τὸν οὐρανὸν, εἰ μὴ ὁ ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ καταβὰς, ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ὁ ὢν ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ.

The questions in Mathematics are twenty in number—ten in Geometry and ten in Trigonometry. In Geometry they are as follows:

Demonstrate the elementary propositions on which the Pythagorean proposition depends.

2. Demonstrate the Pythagorean proposition. If you know any other mode of demonstration than the original one, give it.

3. Find the value, in terms of R, of the chord of 7° 30'.

4. What is the ratio of the perimeter of one inscribed square to the area of a circumscribed regular pentagon?

5. What must be the side of a regular hexagon to contain 10 A., 3 R., 28 r.?

6. The side of a regular inscribed polygon of 30 sides being 2,091 R., required the side of a regular inscribed polygon of 60 sides.

7. What is the ratio of the surface of an inscribed sphere to that of a circumscribed cylinder, demonstrating your answer?

8. Demonstrate the simplest formula for the entire surface of a cone.

9. Demonstrate the rule for finding the solidity of the frustrum of a pyramid.

10. What is the ratio of the solidity of a sphere to the surface of its circumscribing cube?

5. Two sides and the included angle of a spherical triangle being given, find the other side and angle.

King Leopold, of Belgium, is dangerously ill. His death would deprive Europe of one of her wisest and safest rulers; for King Leopold has long been a trusted adviser of many other kings and queens. He is a Protestant, and yet the king of the most intensely Catholic nation of Europe.

Horace Holden's Will.—The late Horace Holden, Esq., whose death we have so recently lamented, left a large property, which he bequeathed to his family, making this remark on the use of money:

"I have felt it for many years to be my duty to give to various objects of Christian benevolence, according as God hath prospered me. My wife is fully acquainted with those objects to which I have given, and for which I trust we have both prayed, I do hereby recommend to her, by yearly benefactions, to sustain the same great religious charities as we have heretofore done, and more liberally if her means will do so, and I enjoin the same upon my children."

The Governor of Wisconsin Drowned.—Governor Louis P. Harvey, was drowned at Savannah, Tenn., on Saturday night, while stepping from one boat to another. His body had not been recovered when the despatches left.

At the time of his death he was engaged in the humane object of ministering to the wounded at Pittsburg Landing, having taken with him an immense am

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

Washington, April 24th, 1862.

We arrived in the city about 7 o'clock, and finding none of our people at the depot, with their hacks, we then got a gentleman to wheel our trunk to the house of Rev. James Reed, a local preacher; and here I met with Rev. Bishop Payne, whom I found looking very well. After breakfast, I accompanied the Bishop to Conference. He called upon me to open the Conference by reading the 2d chapter of Colossians, singing, and prayer. The minutes were read and approved; after which many of the brethren came forward and gave us a hearty shake hands, among whom we recognised Revs D. W Moore, Wayman, Lynch, Turner, and Hamans. Some of the brethren read their parochial reports. They are all looking in fine spirits The committees reported—some on missions, some on education, temperance, &c. Quite a number of petitions, in relation to brethren holding charges, were presented. Conference adjourned to meet on Friday morning, by appointing preaching at 4 P M., and 7½ P. M.

Friday morning, April 25th. Conference met, per adjournment, Bishop Payne in the chair. Conference was opened by reading, singing, and prayer. The minutes were read and approved. Conference resolved itself into the missionary society. At half-past 11 o'clock, Conference entered upon its business. The Bishop then called up some four brethren whom the committee had recommended for itinerant service. Conference adjourned, to meet on Monday morning.

Monday morning, April 28th. Conference met at 9 o'clock, A. M. Bishop Payne in the chair Conference was opened by singing, prayer, and reading of the 2d chapter of the Book of Psalms. The minutes were read and approved. Conference proceeded to unfinished business. At 11 o'clock, Rev D. W. Moore, who was appointed to preach the ordination discourse, arose and took his text from 2 Tim. iii. 5. Brother Moore was profound, logical, and very impressive. The Bishop then proceeded to the ordination of some four elders, which was performed by Bishop Payne with much solemnity. The members of the Conference bought off the Editor and General Book Steward, "The Death-bed of the Rev. John Wesley," which was presented to Bishop Payne, on behalf of the Conference, by Rev. A. W. Wayman, as follows: "Rev. Sir,—Allow me, on behalf of the members of the Baltimore Annual Conference, to present to you this beautiful picture, representing the peaceful dying moments of the Apostolic Wesley. Sir, it is our wish that your life may be as useful as his, and your dying moments as peaceful." Bishop Payne replied, with tears in his eyes, in a most impressive manner, holding a crowded house spell-bound for some ten minutes or more. Conference then adjourned, to meet on Monday morning.

The committee on the Book Concern reported the approval of the General Book Steward's report, and that it be adopted; it contained a recommendation of ways and means to assist the Editor and General Book Steward. The Bishop entered his protest; it will be found in the Minutes. The report was adopted. Rev. H. M. Turner offered a series of resolutions, to prevent brethren from going outside of the Church to baptise persons. After some little discussion, a committee of three was appointed to make or give the sense of the Conference. Rev. A. B. Green, who claims to be the Bishop of the B. M. E. C., of Canada, was requested to give some statements about the position of Bishop Nazrey and himself, which took some three-quarters of an hour. We forgot to state that the Conference adopted, or recommended some plan by which they are to aid the Editor and General Book Steward. Conference adjourned, to meet on Wednesday morning, April 30th.

Personal.

Parson Brownlow has been visiting our city, and made his speech from the State House steps. He made a very free use of the epithets and adjectives of our language, over which he has such a fearful mastery. He is, unquestionably, a Union-loving, brave and patriotic man, yet, for the sake of his former clerical profession, we could wish that he would use language a little softer, or, at least, more euphonious.

Rev. Joseph F. Duryea, late pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Troy, N. Y., was installed as one of the associate pastors of the Collegiate Church, in New York, on Sabbath evening, April 6th.

Samuel R. Wilson, D D, late of Cincinnati, was installed pastor of the Grand Street Church, N. Y., on Sabbath, the 20th of April.

The Old Sailor Hurt.—Father Taylor, the well known sailors' preacher of Boston, had his shoulder-joint dislocated by a fall at Cambridge a few days since. His age and infirmity render this a serious trial to the good man.

Rev. J. Edwards, late of the Choctaw Mission, under the care of the Presbyterian Board, (O. S.,) arrived with his family on the steamer. Mr Edwards' labors in connexion with the Mission referred to, were suddenly arrested by the rebellion, which has swept on like a tornado to the revolted states. He is for the present engaged as an associate in Dr. Burrows' City College.

Port Royal Contrabands.—At a meeting held on Wednesday evening, at the Philadelphia Institute, by the Executive Committee of the Statistical Association of Colored People, of this city, the following resolutions were passed, which were read at the close of a concert by the Hutchinson Family last evening, given in aid of the escaped slaves at Port Royal:

Resolved, That the claims of the "Contrabands" in the vicinity of Port Royal and elsewhere call loudly upon the friends of humanity for material aid and sympathy.

Resolved, That while there is reason to regret that the Government has not more fully defined the status of these poor creatures, nevertheless it is clearly the duty of the Social, Civil and Statistical Association of the Colored People of Pennsylvania, not only to render aid as an organization, but also to commend these sufferers to the consideration of the various colored churches and societies of this city and State, that they may co-operate in the noble work of helping the Freemen's Association or other proper enterprises, which have undertaken to furnish food, clothing, and teachers, moral and religious, so much needed to relieve immediate distress and to inspire them with hopes of final deliverance.

Resolved, That we cannot lose sight of the Act of Congress, passed at its extra session, or of those proclamations emanating from the several Generals and Commanders of the Army, in which freedom has been declared to the slaves of all parties aiding directly or indirectly the rebellion.

Resolved, That in view of these acts, the slaves cannot (in our judgment) be considered other than FREEMEN.

Prayer in Congress.—The session of the House was opened recently with the following prayer, by Rev. Thomas H. Stockton, Chaplain of the House:—

"We thank Thee for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. We thank Thee for the emancipation of slaves in the capital of our country. We thank Thee that our soil is now free from slavery, and that this air is now free air, and so shall remain forever. We accept this great blessing, not as the result of human manifestation—not as a matter of party policy—but as a Divine intervention, as a development of another form of confirmation to Thy great and glorious purpose, to carry on and complete the whole work of human redemption. Therefore, we bless and magnify Thy most excellent name, uniting with the churches of all lands, and of ages in saying:—'Glory be unto the Father, and unto the Son, and unto the Holy Ghost; as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end!'"

Parson Brownlow's Press.—The popular subscription in New York to the fund for purchasing the Parson one of Hoe's fast presses is well nigh made up, and the committee of gentlemen having the matter in charge are now deliberating upon the propriety of supplying him with a new font of type, as an additional mark of their esteem and respect for the parson—the patriot and the man.

New York Don't Feel the War.—Broadway, in these fine summery days, exhibits its gorgeous plumage and its newest fashions, without regard to the possible evils of the near future. Talk about the war touching us habits of economy, frugality and all that! In the rural districts, where popular greenness is presumed to predominate, possibly some such change for the better has really been accomplished, but here we "don't see it." Walk from Canal Street to Grace Church, on the shilling side, and almost every "MoFlimsey" you meet is attired in silks or satins. Upon and along the fashionable avenues, about as many sumptuous carriages are to be seen rolling along as usual. The theatres are as well attended as ever—the jewelry shops are selling about as many gew-gaws as they sold before the war; and so on throughout all the graduations of Metropolitan society and life. New York has heard much of the war, but the truth is, it has but little felt it as yet.

The refugees from Florida, who arrived in the Star of the South, tell terrible stories of their hardships and sufferings under their rebel masters. They bear witness to the prevalence of a strong Union feeling in Georgia and Florida.

A Scotchman in Court.—In the Court of General Sessions, New York city, Daniel McCarry, the porter of Nunas and Rieman, who, it will be remembered, stole some $3,000 from his employers, was sentenced to two years in the State Prison. Recorder Hoffman mentioned as a singular fact, that the accused was the first Scotchman that had ever been before him charged with crime since he had entered upon his official duties.

The Battle of Winchester.—The following account is abridged and arranged from the letter of a chaplain, dated March 28, 1862:

HOW THE BATTLE WAS BROUGHT ON.

Jackson made a great mistake when he risked the battle. He was led to suppose, by information from the secessionists there, that Winchester had been evacuated by all our forces excepting a provost guard, while in reality the whole of General Shields' Division lay sheltered by hills. The information went mainly from secession women, whose bitter zeal led to the melancholy slaughter of many of their own relatives.

UNCOLORED STATEMENT OF THE RESULTS OF THE BATTLE.

Jackson retired in very tolerable order. He has since kept on. The pursuit, commenced the next day, has never, I believe, encountered anything more than his rear guard, skilfully fighting and then retiring. He is now, doubtless, safely encamped some dozen miles from our advanced force. I read in the papers of the 26th the following:

"The loss of the rebels must have been enormous. They have abandoned their wagons along the road, filled with dead and wounded, and the houses on the route are found crowded with their wounded and dying.

The dwellings in the town, adjacent to the battle-field of Sunday, are also found filled with the wounded.

The inhabitants aided the rebel soldiers in carrying off their wounded during the day, and burying them quickly, as soon as dead.

Our artillery makes terrible havoc among the enemy in their flight, and the route bids fair to be one of the most dreadful of the war."

Two-thirds of this is pure invention. The rebels suffered, and worse than we did. Success remains with us, and the enemy have retreated.

THE BATTLE-FIELD THE NEXT DAY.

Whatever excitement there is in the time of action, the next day's look excites only melancholy. It was a raw and chilly morning, and there lay, soon to be buried, more than two hundred corpses. Most of them were as they had fallen, in every position, but most with their faces upturned. Here were the dead, shot in the head, there a limb shattered, there a slight hole in the breast, and, again, a shell had shattered every feature. In one spot was a pile of over twenty, mainly from the accurate bursting of a shell in their midst. In another place their concentrated infantry had suffered terribly from our musketry. A few soldiers were guarding the spot from all depredation. Women were there searching for dead friends and relatives. It was hard to realize in that silent air that a few hours before the scene had been terrible with conflict, and full of slaughter. But the silent and mangled dead here were—and I wished that Jefferson Davis could have been brought face to face with every corpse, and it be said to him, "Your infernal ambition killed this man."

Winchester Hospitals and Scenes in Them.—Across the main street in Winchester, in front of the Court House, on Monday last, was suspended the sentence, "Theatrical performances here every evening." But within the Court House, in every available spot, lay the wounded, the dying and the dead. On Tuesday was suspended a notice, "No performances this evening." But within surgeons were using the knife and the saw, nurses were dressing ghastly wounds, and in spite of all care, scores were passing into eternity.

Four places were thus occupied, the Court House, the Union Hotel, and two smaller buildings I was able to visit three of the four on Monday evening, and until we moved on at six o'clock on Tuesday. As you entered the Court House, the outer room was occupied with dead laid side by side, and reverently covered, and each, as far as could be, with a little slip of paper bearing his name and that of his regiment. Passing through every square foot of room for the attendants to pass, was occupied by the wounded, and now and then one was carried to the dead-room. Owing to some strange management, for twenty-four hours neither hay nor straw was procured, and the wounded men lay upon the floor. When our Brigade came, our surgeons immediately volunteered their services. They were declined! The surgeons of Gen. Shields' Division "needed no help," when I saw soldier after soldier waiting impatiently for necessary care. The spirit seemed that of some third-rate physicians in small towns, who are afraid somebody is trying to get away their practice. It was only when a most formal application was made on Tuesday morning, by our Brigade Surgeon, that the services of ours were reluctantly accepted. Nevertheless, with or without formalities, our surgeons made themselves useful. The two of our own regiment proved of the greatest service. Our senior surgeon remained all night and all day in the Court House, reduced things to order, and proved himself most admirably qualified for his post. Our assistant surgeon did similar work at the Union Hotel. Our Hospital Steward, with his medicines and apparatus, was there, and of the greatest use. Our nurses were indefatigable. Our litters did most of the work of moving the injured from place to place.

It was pleasant to see the gentleness and activity of the attendants. Hardy men seemed like women in the care of children. By and by deliacies came from the people. Monday evening, many people were called upon for beds. It was hard to procure even a few. One man, living in a fine house, had "no beds for Yankee soldiers, let them lie on the ground." Women, on Tuesday morning, brought luxuries "for Southern soldiers," while with us there was no friend, no foe, only wounded men lying there indiscriminately, equally cared for. Women came there to abuse and insult us in the hearing of our wounded men; but they were speedily sent off. I think the kind treatment of their own wounded shamed them, or perhaps a refusal to receive anything for one class exclusively. By and by they came with supplies without specifying for which men.

One Confederate soldier was asked, "Do you have kind treatment here?" "Yes," he answered, as if wondering at it. "Why, didn't you expect it?" "No, I thought you would kill us." What made you think so?" "We were told so."

One poor fellow of sixteen, from the South, wanted to take the oath of allegiance. He knew he must die, but he felt he had been in a wrong cause, his mother had made him go, and if he could take the oath, he should feel better and die happier. He needed something better than that, however.

One man I can never forget. He was a Southerner. One deed had struck him with remorse. I found his story at last. A few days before he had gone out with a white flag, enticed one of our soldiers near, and then deliberately shot him. Wounded now, his mind dwelt only on that. He felt that it was murder. He would not have his wounds dressed. Horror-struck, he was determined to die. He would admit no hope of pardon.

One was a boy, from Texas, talked of his sister; and he wanted her informed, and sent his dying love. One man, a rebel officer, wanted his wife in Southern Virginia, to know he died happy, and his blessing to go to his little children. And one had longings for his mother. And so on, on, through the long rows and many rooms.

New Decimal System.—John Vernon, of New Orleans, has invented what purports to be a decimal system for the currency of coins, weights and measures, and has laid it before the rebel Congress. A minute analysis of Mr. Vernon's new decimal system, which the Charleston Courier pronounces "perfect in theory," reveals its wonderful novelty, which may be expressed in the following formula: Ten centimes make one tropic, ten tropics make one star, ten stars make one sol.

North Carolina.—Union Sentiment.—About ten days before General Burnside captured Newbern, some seven hundred men assembled in Iredell County, west of Raleigh, and raised the stars and stripes. A force was sent from Newbern to reduce them to the rebel domination, and about twelve of them were killed.

New Orleans Captured.—The Petersburg Express contains the following dispatch:

MOBILE, April 25.—The enemy passed Fort Jackson at 4 o'clock yesterday morning. When the news reached New Orleans, the excitement was boundless. Martial law was put in full force, and business was completely suspended. All the cotton and steamboats, excepting such as were necessary to transport coin, ammunition, &c., were destroyed.

Corinth Evacuated.—Passengers from Pittsburg Landing report that on Thursday thirty deserters from the rebel army entered our camps and begged to be enrolled among our troops. They all corroborate the statement received the day before relative to the evacuation by the rebels of their present position. It is asserted that Beauregard had withdrawn a considerable portion of his forces for the defence of Memphis.

Beauregard has been outflanked, outgeneraled, and overwhelmed. He has acknowledged, at length, his defeat at Pittsburg Landing. He has retired the principal part of his army to Memphis; not that that point can be made any more impregnable than the other Gibraltars that have been built to be abandoned, but simply because retreat in any other direction was impracticable. Beauregard's career is drawing to a close, and Beauregard, as the rebels say, is the sole hope of the Confederacy. It was he who, at Island No. 10 and Corinth was fighting the battle for New Orleans. All his strategy has been thrown away. Fort Jackson has been passed by our gunboats, and the Crescent City restored to the Union!

Yorktown.—On Saturday morning, a Massachusette company captured a rebel earthwork at the point of the bayonet, with but trifling loss. Fourteen prisoners were secured.

Banks and Jackson.—The rebel General Jackson has undoubtedly retreated to Gordonville. General Banks is in rapid pursuit, but Jackson is so far ahead that Banks will not overtake him unless the rebel general determines to make a stand. The retreat of Jackson has had a good effect upon the people of this section of Virginia, as they were dreadfully persecuted by him Many are coming out of the caves where they have been hiding to escape the rebel persecutions, and placing themselves under the protection of our soldiers.

The Gunboats.—One of our gunboats shelled Yorktown on Thursday last, and must certainly have done some damage. The rebels promptly answered, but their fire was ineffectual. Shots were occasionally fired along the entire line to prevent the enemy from strengthening their defences.

The gunboats Tyler and Lexington, with a land force under command of Gen. Sherman, have succeeded in destroying an important bridge on the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, at Bear creek, near Chickasaw, Alabama. Some rebel cavalry disputed the passage of our forces, but they were driven off.

Halleck and Beauregard.—The news from Gen. Halleck's army is exciting. General Halleck put his whole army in motion, and on Thursday they met and drove back the advance guard of Beauregard's army. At latest advices, General Halleck's army were at Pea Ridge, within six miles of Corinth, having, on their march, destroyed a rebel camp and taken a number of prisoners. Deserters who have arrived in our camp, state that Corinth has been evacuated by the rebels, and General Beauregard has withdrawn his forces for the defence of Memphis.

Major General Halleck has issued a general order, in which he thanks Major Generals Grant and Buell, and the officers and men of their respective commands, for the bravery and endurance with which they sustained the general attacks of the enemy on the 6th, and for the heroic manner in which, on the 7th instant, they defeated and routed the entire rebel army. General Halleck also orders that Generals Grant and Buell retain the immediate command of their respective armies in the field.

Jacksonville, Florida.—Immediately after the evacuation of that place by the Federal troops, the rebel forces entered and commenced committing their outrages on the people of the place. Two of our gunboats are in the harbor affording protection to the people.

From Fortress Monroe and Vicinity.—Fortress Monroe, April 24th.—The weather and the tide today were very favorable for the re-appearance of the Merrimac in Hampton Roads, but she still delays her coming

It is reported that some of the rebel gunboats in the James river made an attempt, this forenoon, to shell some of our camps situated this side of Warwick river.

Latest News from New Orleans.—There is a report that Commodore Farragut has gone up the Mississippi river, a steamer, Merrimac, on its way, was destroyed by the U. S. steamer Pensacola.

Foreign Summary.

Entire religious liberty is to be secured by law in Austria, excepting that up to the age of eighteen children must follow the creed preferred by their parents. The enjoyment of civil and political rights is not to depend on religious confession, nor to be subject to any restriction on that account. Difference of religion will not form a civil obstacle to marriage. Professors of all beliefs are equally admissible by law to all dignities, functions and public employments. Every church or religious society has the right publicly to carry out its worship, with a reserve as to measures necessary to secure public order. The law grants to all churches and religious societies this legal right. There is to be no State-privileged religion

A new Wesleyan chapel at Paris is in course of erection. One of the parties to the preliminary negotiations was Rev. William Arthur. He writes:

"When we came to sign the contract, we insisted on a clause forbidding Sabbath work, on which the contractor declared that it would rob him of his profits, and finding us resolved, submitted, saying, 'Oh, not one clause ridaine pour nous.' ('It is a villanous clause for me.') But by virtue of this 'villanous clause,' the building, in its very progress, will preach to contractor, workman, and spectators, the blessings and duties of a Sabbath-day."

There are now two Protestant Theological Seminaries in Italy in peaceful and successful operation. The first is the Waldensian, removed from La Tour to Florence eighteen months ago, and occupying the Salviati Palace—obtained, as a free gift, through the great exertions of Dr. Stewart of Leghorn, among liberal friends in Scotland and America. Dr. Revel and Mr. Geymonat are the Professors, men of whom any church of Christ might be proud. The former devotes himself to Church History, the latter to Dogmatic Theology, while teachers of elocution, singing, &c., join in preparing the twelve students for their future work of organising and conducting meetings. And the other, under the auspices of the Free Church of Italy has been recently opened at Genoa, under the care of Dr. De Sanctis and Mr. Mazzarella. A programme of the course of study is shortly to be printed. There are at present five students under instruction, Dr. De Sanctis takes the branches of church History and Doctrinal Theology, while Mazzarella is occupied with Exegetics of Criticism. Let us hope that from these two Seminaries a large band of preachers will go forth to proclaim the glad tidings of salvation.

Strong efforts are being made in certain quarters for the union of the Waldensian and Free Italian Churches. But as they differ in origin and history, in government, and somewhat in doctrine, it is very doubtful whether any effort of the kind can be successful at present.

It is reported that the English government has ordered all work on wooden ships of war to cease. Universal and eager interest is felt in our naval experiments, and the English note with dissatisfaction that the Monitor throws a ball about double the weight of any British navy gun. We were superior in naval artillery to the British in the war of 1812, and are now; and unless the Yankee loses his cunning, always shall be.

A curious insinuation creeps across the ocean from Paris, that Slidell is deserting the cause of the South. It seems probable. What future prospect has Slidell of "making anything" by the South?

An unhappy event has just occurred in Ireland. The First Presbyterian church in Antrim, one of the very finest of the Presbyterian body in Ireland, was recently entirely destroyed by fire.

George Francis Train, the sarcastic Bostonian who has been pleading the Union cause in England so ingeniously and successfully, has been engaged for the past year in laying down a rail-road in one of the streets of London. This road was opened last September, when mirabile dictu! he was immediately indicted "for laying down his iron tramways in the roadway leading from Westminster Bridge to Kingston Park, and making it dangerous to the public," and on the 5th of April was tried before Chief Justice Earle at Kingston, and found GUILTY. A city rail-road in overgrown London is a dangerous nuisance! Verily the jury must have been composed of backmen. He gives the following description of his trial.

You, perhaps, may know that the laws of nations permit a foreigner to have six of his own countrymen on the jury on any criminal offence. My crime, in the words and eye of the law, was a criminal one, and as Chief Justice Earle remarked, did not come under any civil process, therefore I was entitled to have six Americans upon the jury. A British sailor in New York frequently calls for six Englishmen upon his case, and I myself have been asked to act as juryman in Liverpool, when an American sailor was being tried for some criminal offence. These, then, are the grounds of which I complain. First. I am indicted as a criminal by ex parte statements. Second, I am not allowed to have six Americans upon the jury. Third, I am not allowed to speak in my defence. Fourth, the verdict is suspended with the Englishmen—thereby throwing all the costs, my own, the county's, and the prosecution on to my shoulders, and those I represent! And I may mention that twelve hundred and fifty pounds in cash, for law expenses, had to be deposited before the trial came on. Fifth. I am not allowed to call one of my witnesses, hence am found GUILTY by purely an ex parte trial, when their leading witness testified to his political animus to an American.

ELLEN GRANT.

Courteous, look at this picture. It represents Ellen Grant and her sick mother. Would you like to hear something about them? Perhaps, as they are such pleasant looking people you would find their history interesting. Their home was a happy one, in the State of Connecticut, until Ellen was nearly fifteen years old. Mr. Grant thought he would become wealthy much sooner if he lived in the West; so he was not contented till he bought a farm in Iowa, and moved there. The first year his crops were nearly destroyed. Before the next season for planting he took a fever and died. Mrs. Grant was thus left among strangers to support herself and Ellen. Being a very delicate woman, she soon sank under her heavy burden, and was unable to rise from the bed. Now, grim poverty stared them in the face. Mrs. Grant was a true Christian. She believed that God would help her, and in her distress prayed, "Give us this day our daily bread."

One morning, Mrs. Blair, their nearest neighbor, came in, and discovering their need, administered to their wants, and engaged Ellen to come over and assist her about the house a portion of every day. She knew this would be a more acceptable way of relieving them than by offering money, as Mrs. Grant would then feel more independent. They soon became quite comfortable, as Mrs. Grant's health improved and enabled her to take in sewing, and Ellen helped Mrs. Blair with her work and received much in return. In the picture you see Ellen, as one bright Saturday afternoon, after her return from her kind friend's, she sat down by her mother's bed-side to read to her from the Bible, that book they so much loved. While reading they heard a knock, and in walked Mrs. Blair and Miss Stanhope, Ellen's Sabbath School teacher. While Mr. Grant was living, Ellen had attended the Sabbath School regularly, and was much beloved by her teacher, for she was a lamb of the "Good Shepherd's" fold. As Miss Stanhope's house was four miles from Ellen's she did not see her after leaving the school until now. Being on a visit at her Aunt Blair's, she visited her favorite pupil, and soon learned to esteem Mrs. Grant also. Much pleasure did they all find in talking of Jesus and their heavenly home.

But I must not tire you, my little readers, so I will only tell you that in a few years Mrs. Grant and Ellen were enabled to return to their former house and friends in Connecticut. There they spent much time in relieving the necessities of the poor, and in teaching them of him who became poor for our sakes, that we might be rich in heaven.

MYRTA.

For the Youth's Evangelist.

GOD EVERYWHERE.

God is everywhere present. He is in all places at all times. All is not God, but God is in all. He sees and knows everything we do; we cannot hide any thing from God, for his all-seeing eye is everywhere present. He holds the central suns, and rolls the ponderous planets. Seasons come and go as he directs—God speaks: the north winds retire, and the balmy zephyrs come; genial rays unlock the earth's long bound bosom; the fettered streams break loose their bonds; the birds return from their winter retreat; the wild beasts come from their dens, and man goes forth to toil; the air is filled with notes of praise, and heaven seems descending to earth; myriads of happy songsters, and numberless voices of the musical tribes he sets in tune, from the cricket that chirps in the chimney corner, to the chief bird singer that charms all with her melodious strains. Under the ever watchful eye of the Almighty are reared the beautiful plants of summer. To the sweet-scented pink, He imparts its fragrance; alike paints the colors of the lily and the rose; to the vine gives fingers, and spreads a green carpet over the face of the earth. In Autumn, God ripens the apple, mellows the pear, and gives flavor to the peach. God speaks in the cold of Winter. Every chilling blast of wind admonishes the living that the cold night of death, and the winter of the grave are fast hastening. The sifting snows suggest the winding sheet; the shut up way points to the end of life. Let us all, my kind friends, ever keep in mind, whether in calms or storms, sunshine or rain, sickness or health, sorrow or gladness, that God is everywhere present, beholding the evil and the good, and if we put our trust in him, he will never leave nor forsake us.

LIZZIE.

GOD CARES FOR YOU.

A little girl about eight years old, who was not afraid to sleep alone, was left one night by her mother, while she went to take care of a sick neighbor. When the mother came home in the morning, the little girl told her that she heard dogs making a great noise during the night. "And were you not afraid?" asked the mother. Her answer was, "A little at first; but I thought, God will take care of me, and I knew that I was safe." Children, this was exercising faith in God; and older persons may learn a lesson from this little girl's answer,—"God will take care of me."

"Yea, though I walk in death's dark vale,
Yet will I fear none ill;
For thou art with me; and thy rod
And staff me comfort still."

THAT LITTLE HAND.

Will our dear readers just hold up their little fat dimpled hands, and look at them? Observe the curious and delicate manner in which each finger moves. How complete every part is, and how complete the whole hand is! Could human wisdom have ever formed such a beautiful piece of workmanship? No! Divine wisdom alone could do it. Dear young reader, God made that little hand, at which you are now looking, each finger of which you are now moving. But he never made that little hand that it might be raised in anger against your little brother or sister, playmate or companion. God never made it that it might take any thing that belonged to another, and thus break one of his holy commandments. Employ it in doing good. With it you can relieve distress. You can use it as a little boy who was lame used his hands. He was very poor, but he was a good boy, and wanted to do something for the heathen. He begged a ball of twine from a gentleman, and told him that he wanted to make a net of it to sell, that he might send a Bible to some poor heathen child. The gentleman gave him the twine, and told him to bring the net to him when he would have it made, that he might look at it. The boy did so, and the gentleman was so pleased that he gave the boy the price of two Bibles. How glad it made the heart of that poor boy, when he was able to send two Bibles to the heathen. Children, will you not employ your hands in doing some good, and thus honor God who made you and who preserves you?

RICHES AND HAPPINESS.

We hope our little readers try to remember what we tell them from time to time. Do you recollect the story we told you about the poor cobbler a short time ago? He was happy, though very poor. Now, let us tell you what happiness rich men who are now living have. Mr. Rothschild, an English banker, is one of the richest men living. "You must be happy," says a friend. "Happy, I happy!" he answers. "Happy, when you are just going to dine a note is put into your hand, saying, 'If you don't lend me five hundred pounds, I'll blow your brains out!' Happy, when you have to sleep with pistols under your pillow?" Children, do you envy Mr. Rothschild?

Mr. Astor, the richest man in New York, says he only gets a living for the great trouble he has in taking care of his wealth. He says he can carry none of it into the other world; and it won't buy off death. Riches in themselves cannot bring happiness. What can bring happiness? The love of God in our souls, dear readers, and its fruit, love to our fellows. May we all have much of that love.

THE FRAILTY OF EARTHLY BEAUTY.

It is a calm bright afternoon in the month of June. All nature seems teeming with life and joyousness. During the morning there had been a gentle shower, which refreshed all things, making them seem to smile and say, "We are indeed happy and grateful for the pleasant rain." I see, from the window of my room, Mary and her sister Emma walking in the garden. As Emma, who is only ten years old, admires the pretty flowers, Mary talks to her of their Creator, and of that garden above, whose "beauties fade not, and pass not away." As she listens, her little face glows with pleasure. Mary is radiant with holy joy and peace. She has early given her heart to the Saviour, and now wishes her sister to do the same. How very pretty they look now in their mossy seat, surrounded by queenly roses and flowers whose perfume fills the air. Mary's hair, dark and glossy, is pushed back from her broad, white forehead, and loosely fastened up. Her bright black eyes beam with intelligence and love. Emma does not at all resemble her. She has golden curls, and light-blue eyes, and is the very picture of health, with her rosy cheeks and full round face. They are both clad in pure white, which agrees well with their loveliness of person and character. Mary has fond parents, good health, is well educated, and pious. Her home is in the midst of loving friends. Is it any wonder, that upon this, her eighteenth birth-day, she looks forward to a long and happy life, or that her heart swells with gratitude to the Giver of so many blessings?

FLOWERS.

BY MRS. H.

Flowers: sweet tokens of God's love,
To his children here below:
His goodness manifold doth prove
In the varied plants that grow

The lovely Rose, the queen of flowers,
Bedecks the verdant ground,
And as we rove through Eden's bowers
She sheds sweet fragrance round.

The modest Violet, white and blue,
This lesson wins doth teach:
To rove made, faithful be and true,
And not betray thy speech.

The Daisy, innocent and sweet,
Of beauty not aware,
Both old and young should imitate
Her traits with special care.

The Tulip's vanity always scorn,
As it may prove to thee,
Along thy pathway, like a thorn,
False and deceitful be

Strive to be like the Lily, white,
Too pure for this vile earth,
And the little Mignonette so sweet,
Emblem of moral worth.

The orange blossom rich and rare,
We gather with glowing pride,
And twine them through the golden hair
Of the young and lovely bride.

Choicest flowers we pluck with care,
To scatter o'er the tomb
Of friends whose spirits dwell afar,
Where flowers immortal bloom.

O! think of these beautiful flowers,
How soon they with'r away—
Some bloom in morn's dewy hours,
And fade ere close of day

So we, like flowers, must perish,
Perhaps in youthful bloom,
And friends our mem'ries to cherish,
Will flowers strew o'er our tomb

MY WRITING BOOK.

SON.

Please, mother, give it back to me;
I wish you would not look
Inside, why can you want to see
My poor old copy book?

You'll find a blot on every page,
I've not the sum right I know;
I know 'tis shameful at my age
I tried to rub them out.

There's something wrong in every line;
I'm sure I could not tell
If 'twas another name than mine
That these strange letters spell

Do, shut the book, and end my grief
I'll learn it if I durst,
I truly think that closing leaf
Worse written than the first.

MOTHER.

Son, there is another copy-book,
Your Father, God, has seen;
You cannot close it from his look
Is that writ fair and clean?

If there are blots and crooked lines
Across those pages white,
When his clear eye upon them shines,
'Twill be a hateful sight.

And you are writing every day,
Upon that inner page,
How little it must be to say,
Your heart grows worse with age

O, write your very best, my boy,
Ask God to guide your hand,
Then every leaf will bring you joy,
When you before him stand

THE SABBATH SCHOOL TEACHER

Should be prayerful. This is one of the essential qualifications of a good and faithful Sabbath School teacher. The teacher who does not pray daily for his or her scholars, does not feel the importance of the work. Paul may plant, and Apollos water, but God alone giveth the increase. If we feel that the work in which we are engaged is God's work, we will surely go to Him, and consult him, and ask his guidance and blessing on our labors. If we feel that deep desire which we should feel for the salvation of souls, we will go often to the throne of grace, and plead earnestly for each one of the little ones committed to our care. By so doing we will feel more interest in our scholars, we will study their disposition more, and will feel more the great responsibility resting on us to be faithful to the everlasting welfare of the immortal souls in our charge, and to our blessed Master, who has honored us by permitting us to work in his vineyard.

A few days since a superintendent of one of our Sabbath Schools in the West called on us, when the subject of teachers praying for their scholars was discussed. He had read the incident of the young lady in London, who was a very successful Sabbath School teacher; and who, on being asked the secret of her success, replied, that she prayed for each of her scholars daily. He had been teaching a class for several years, and still teaches, although superintendent of the school, and he made up his mind to pursue the same course. The result far exceeded his most sanguine expectations; for all of that class are now members of the church. He has another class now, and every day he carries each one of them to the throne of grace. Teacher, will you not do the same, and leave the result to God?

Teacher, think of the greatness of the privilege you enjoy, and thank God for it. Think of the opportunities you have, Sabbath, after Sabbath, of telling the little ones of the great love of Jesus; and, O, think of the reward promised to those who save souls from death! And remember that it is not for yourself you are working, but for Jesus. May you and I, dear fellow laborer, go often to Jesus, and ask him to bless each of our scholars, and make each one a child of his; and may He enable us to be faithful to the great trust committed to us.

THERE WILL BE NO SORROW THERE.

My friends, this is a world of sorrow,
Grief and trouble everywhere,
Let us live alone for heaven,
There will be no sorrow there.

Every day that passes o'er us,
Calls for more devoted care;—
Teacheth us to live for heaven—
There will be no sorrow there.

Here, with trouble we're surrounded,
Death doth oft upon us stare;
Let us all prepare to meet him,
In that world that's free from care.

Sickness, pain, and many sorrows,
We have often-times to bear;
But there is no pain in heaven,
There will be no sickness there.

In heaven there they need no candle,
Nor the sun to shine and glare;
Nor the moon's pale face to cheer them,—
Scripture says there's no night there.

Here our days oft pass in sorrow,
And our nights the trouble share,
But there is a rest in heaven,
For all those that enter there.

Here our friends do oft desert us,
For our souls they have no care;
Let us strive alone for heaven,
There will be no sorrow there.

Xenia, Ohio, April 14th, 1862 JOHN KNOX.

WHAT ONE CAN DO.

MR. EDITOR:—You everywhere hear the complaint, that "teachers are needed in our mission schools," and almost every earnest superintendent finds his work retarded, for the want of a few more willing hearts, while friends of the Sabbath School are continually pained at the want of interest manifested by church members in regard to this great work. The excuses seem to be numberless: "It is the only time I have for reading"—"Too far"—"I have no talent for that kind of work"—"There are many more competent than I"—"Never did teach." But why repeat? These are familiar words to all in quest of teachers. The real reason is, (as a general thing,) that people are not willing to suffer self-denial. Let me tell you what one woman has done. Jane was the only servant in a large family, and was required to remain at home every other Sabbath morning to cook dinner and attend to the domestic affairs. She had come from a home where God was honored, and his day kept holy, and Sabbath was her day of delight. Many tears wet her pillow, when she thought of brothers and sisters in their happy home, and how she was alone in a strange city; but she had a source of comfort—God is everywhere, and he was the "strength of her heart." Jane wished that all the wicked people whom she met in the street knew the value of an interest in Christ; but it did not occur to her, for months, that she was called upon to work in his vineyard. She sought, it is true, to discharge her duties as servant, "Not with eye service as men pleasers, but in singleness of heart, fearing God." But not until after many months did she realize that her services would be joyfully accepted in the Sabbath School.

We will not say, it did not cost her an effort. Attending school the afternoon of every day, would leave her but the half of every other Sabbath to go to church. Self said, "You need instruction: there are others whose whole time is at their disposal." But the Spirit whispered, "The harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few," and the conflict ended with many prayers that God would make her faithful to the souls committed to her care. A class of little ones were given her, and she had much to try and discourage her; but she drank deep of "the Fountain of Life," and felt more than repaid when their bright eyes, and stretched forth hands of welcome, evidenced to her that she was loved, and no longer a stranger in a strange city.

Reader, my tale is told; are you disappointed that I cannot relate some wonderful conversions that attended her work? She is sowing in faith, leaving the consequences in his hand who has said, "In due season ye shall reap if ye faint not." Go thou and do likewise. EBENEZER.

HAUNTED HOUSES.

Some people are afraid of ghosts. It is a pity that they don't know better. When you meet with anybody that believes in ghosts, you may set it down as a sure sign that he is either very silly or very ignorant. Foolish folks sometimes like to play tricks. They dress themselves up in a white sheet and pretend they are ghosts. If you should ever see anything that looks like a ghost, the best thing you can do is not to run away from it, not to scream, but to run up to it, and take hold of it. You will find that it is somebody dressed up, and when you pull off the sheet he will be very much ashamed of himself.

There was once an old house that everybody said was haunted. Several families went to live in it at different times, but they left it, declaring that they had heard such queer noises in the night that they were afraid to stay.

Nobody would live in it, and the house went to ruin. Bad boys threw stones into the windows as they passed till there was scarcely a pane of glass left. The grass grew on the walk that led to the house. The dead leaves lay upon the door-step. The chimneys were blown down, the paint was worn off, and made it look very desolate. The fence was broken down, and the garden was full of weeds. Three old poplar trees stood in front of it. The middle one was dead. These gave it a still more sombre appearance.

The landlord felt very sorry to see his house going to ruin, and the timbers getting rotten with the damp, just because no one would take care of it. He did not believe in ghosts. He said the stories were all nonsense.

There was a laboring man in the town named Henry, who sometimes worked for the landlord. This man was very poor and had a large family. One day the landlord said to him:—

"Henry, are you afraid of ghosts?"

"Why I—I think not, sir, not exactly, but there are some strange stories about that house of yours."

Henry stammered out this reply, for, to tell the truth, he was a little afraid of ghosts, though, like all others that believe in them, he did not like to acknowledge it.

"It is about that house," continued the landlord, "that I wish to speak to you; of course you do not believe these idle tales about strange sights and mysterious noises; you are too much of a man for that?"

"As to that, sir," said Henry, "I have been in this world a good many years, and have lived in all sorts of houses. I have walked through graveyards at midnight, and I have out up with dead people, but I must say I never saw a ghost."

"And you never will," said the landlord.

"But you know, sir, that some very respectable people do really think that house of yours is haunted."

"Yes, I know it, Henry, but some very respectable people are very foolish, and believe anything that sounds wonderful. Now I want to make a proposition to you. If you will take your family to live in that house, you may have it for a whole year, and need not pay me any rent."

"I'm very much obliged to you, sir, but really I don't exactly—It would save me a good deal of money—but—but—"

"But you are afraid of ghosts," added the landlord.

"No, not that exactly. I ain't much afraid of anything, but I have a house now, for which I pay rent, and it wouldn't be quite right to take yours for nothing. Now couldn't you try and get somebody to rent it off you?"

"Oh, I see," said the landlord, "you are not so brave a man as I took you to be; you are afraid."

"I'm not afraid," said Henry, rather indignantly, "and to prove it, I will take the house and live there."

It was agreed upon that he should remove to the house the next week. No sooner had the landlord left him than he was sorry that he had promised to live in it. He was not a coward, but he was a very ignorant man. When he was young he had been told many foolish ghost stories, and though he did not really believe any of them, he had not got quite over the impression they had made, and he really felt nervous about going to the house.

When he told his wife what he had done, she gave him a scolding. He quieted her by promising that he would live in the house a week by himself before he took her there.

The time came for him to spend the first night in "the haunted house." He went to bed but could not sleep. He listened and started at every sound. The wind blew a gale; the trees outside bowed in the storm and struck against the house. It made him jump, but he could account for every sound.

At last the clock struck twelve. "Now," said he to himself, "is the time that they will come, if they come at all." Hark! what is that! Sure enough there was a sound then which he could not account for. It was not the wind—it was not the rain—it was not the trees striking against the house. He breathed quickly—he listened again. Perfect stillness for a few moments, and then—there was no mistaking it. There was a moaning, scratching, fluttering, sound coming from the open fire-place. He trembled from head to foot. Silence again. Then came the moaning sound as before. Should he scream for help? No, he would not do that. He tried to look through the darkness, but could not see anything.

Then he began to reason with himself. "Truly," said he, "I am a coward. Why should I fear? I will find out what it is. I am strong and can fight if need be."

He jumped out of bed, felt for the matches which he had placed in readiness, and having lighted the candle, then as firmly as he could, walked towards the fire-place to find the ghost. And sure enough he did find it, but not such a one as he expected. It was a real live thing. It was a screech owl.

The poor thing had been out in the storm, and seeking shelter in the chimney, had fallen down. It had tried to get up again, and its moaning, scratching, and fluttering were the noises he had heard. He caught the ghost, tied a string to one of its feet, and fastened it to his bed-post. He slept well the remainder of that night, and in the morning took the poor captive ghost to show to his wife and the landlord. He told them of his fear, and how ashamed he now was on account of it.

He thought he had heard some other kinds of ghosts running about the floor, and the next night he set what he called four ghost traps. He had not been in bed long before click went one of them. On striking a light, he found he had caught another ghost. This time it was a big, ugly rat. The house being unused, a family of rats had taken possession. He caught several more of this kind of ghosts before morning.

The next day his wife and children were quite willing to go and live in the haunted house. The only ghosts they ever saw were the screech owl and the rats.

A drunken man had once lived in that house, and he was the worst ghost that had ever been in it. Bad tempered children sometimes haunt houses, and annoy their parents more than any ghost could. The worst things that ever get into houses are bad people and bad dispositions. See that you do not haunt your mother's house with either of these, and when foolish people talk to you about any other kind of ghosts, tell them of Henry, the screech owl, the rats, the drunken man, bad people, and bad tempers.

MANUFACTURED FROM UNBURNED BONES
BY BAUGH & SONS,
Wholesale office and Store, 20 S. Wharves, between Market and Chestnut Streets, Philadelphia
CASH PRICE $45 PER 2000 POUNDS. (2½ CTS. PER POUND.)
In the preparation of this Valuable Manure, BONES ARE USED IN THEIR RAW STATE ONLY. They have never been boiled or calcined. They are taken to mixers but made them, crushed with powerful machinery, and subjected to a process, by which, while all the virtue of the bone is retained, a Fertilizer is produced, furnishing in a concentrated and ready form, the two ingredients in greatest request for the growth of Plants and enriching the soil, viz.: phosphoric acid and ammonia. These two ingredients, by the use of "BAUGH'S RAW BONE SUPER PHOSPHATE," are given to the soil in all their original strength and purity. They assimilate at once with the soil, furnish all the essential elements for the growing crop, giving it ample nourishment, and leave the land permanently benefited, so that its pressure can be traced for years afterwards.

Downingtown, Chester County, Pa., April 9th, 1860.
Messrs. Baugh & Sons: Gentlemen,—I have been asking your article of Super Phosphate on wheat and corn for several seasons, and am well satisfied of its value as an active and "paying" fertilizer.
I have applied it on wheat at the rate of 300 pounds per acre, alongside of a heavy coat of barn-yard manure, kept dry and under cover, and the result was, that by harvest time about where the Phosphate was put, was much the better headed and heavier, while the grain was taken more strongly than on the other portion of the field. I have also used the Phosphate by the side of Peruvian Guano, each in the same quantity, and in regard to both grain and grass, the action of your preparation was much the more satisfactory. On corn, my experience in its use has been the' it pays well for the money laid out.
Yours respectfully, ISAAC T. LEWIS.

Newtown Square, Delaware Co., Pa., July 23d, 1860
Messrs Baugh & Sons—Being anxious last autumn to test some prepared manures offered for sale, I was induced by your agent to make a trial of three different kinds, which I did on wheat, side by side, in the same field. I purchased Raw Bone Dust and your Phosphate of Lime (one of the most popular in use) together with your Raw Bone Super Phosphate, and used them as above stated. During the growing, as well as the gathering of the crop, the last mentioned was fully in favor of the latter.
But whether it is from the mode and care in preparing, or in the superior quality of the manure used in your Raw Bone Super Phosphate, I am unable to say, however, I cheerfully send you the result of my trials, thinking that others may be induced to make similar experiments, and in my opinion, greatly to the agricultural interests of the whole country.
Yours, &c., JAMES DUNWOODY

Plymouth, Montgomery Co., Pa., August 10th, 1860
Baugh & Sons: Gentlemen,—Having used your Super Phosphate, bought of John W. Christman, at the Montgomery Co. Agricultural Store, on wheat and corn, I can with pleasure recommend it. The other fertilizers I have used this season generally in vogue, were likewise in the value of your Fertilizer. When it was applied on the wheat, the soil was decidedly the poorest on the field, yet the yield was fully equal to the balance, which had a heavy coat of barn yard manure. Where it was applied on the corn, I am satisfied the yield was fully double.
Very respectfully, DAVID MARPLE.

PATENTEES, MANUFACTURERS, AND PROPRIETORS
No. 104 N. Tenth St., above Arch, Philadelphia.
This superior Regulator and Economizer of gas is so simple and practically effective in its operation that it at once commended itself to the favorable approval of a most scientific and practical gentleman of this city and elsewhere. The great advantage of this invention over all others is, that its operative principle, a conical spring which accommodates motion to the street pressure, being connected within a brass tube, it is fully protected from the corrosive and impure exhalations of the gas, and therefore is not liable to get out of order—its exciting is ever perfect, securing to the consumer a saving of gas, from 25 to 50 per cent, with a clearer, more pleasant and steady light, free from all blowing, flaring, or other irregularity of flame, self-acting and, mellow light, far less hurtful, and more delightful to the sight.

LAURRE

TO THE MEMORY OF ANNA MARIA JOHNSON LEE, DAUGHTER OF JAMES AND ANN LEE, BORN OCT. 30, 1841, DIED MARCH 20, 1862.

Joyful, with all the strength she had,
Her quivering lips did sing,
Where is thy victory, boasting grave?
And where the monster's sting?
If sins be pardoned she's secure,
Death has no sting beside,
The law gives sin its damning power,
But Christ her ransom died.
Now to the God of victory,
Immortal thanks be paid,
Who makes us conquerors when we die,
Through Christ our living head.
He also beckons to the skies,
Upward let us turn our eyes.
Her smiles, her tears of childish years,
And the words of love she has spoken,
And the eye that once shone is now dimmed and gone,
And her cheerful heart is now broken.

HARRIET E. HENRY.

THE TRUTH DOTH NEVER DIE.

Though Kingdoms, States, and Empires fall,
And dynasties decay;
Though cities crumble into dust,
And nations die away;
Though gorgeous towers and palaces
In heaps of ruin lie,
Which once were proudest of the proud,
The Truth doth never die!

We'll mourn not o'er the silent past;
Its glories are not fled,
Although its men of high renown
Be numbered with the dead.
We'll grieve not o'er what earth has lost,
It cannot claim a sigh;
For the wrong alone hath perished,
The Truth doth never die!

All of the Past is living still—
All that is good and true;
The rest hath perished, and it did
Deserve to perish, too!
The world rolls ever round and round,
And time rolls ever by;
And the wrong is ever rooted up,
But the Truth doth never die!

MARY MAGDALENE.

BY FRANCIS S. KEY, AUTHOR OF THE "STAR SPANGLED BANNER."

To the hall of the feast came the sinful and the fair,
She heard in the city that Jesus was there;
Unbeeding the splendor that blazed on the board,
She silently knelt at the feet of the Lord.

The hair on her forehead, so sad and so meek,
Hung dark on the blushes that burned on her cheek;
And so sadly and lowly she knelt in her shame,
It seem'd that her spirit had fled from her frame.

The frown and the murmur went round through them all,
That one so unhallowed should tread in that hall;
And some said the poor would be objects more meet
For the wealth of the perfume she shower'd on his feet!

She heard but her Saviour, she spoke but with sighs,
She dar'd not look up to the heaven of his eyes;
And the hot tears gush'd forth at each heave of her breast,
As her lips to his sandals were throbbingly press'd.

In the sky after tempest, as shineth the bow,
In the glance of the sunbeam, as melteth the snow,
He looked on that lost one, her sins are forgiven;
And Mary went forth in the beauty of heaven.

LIFE.

"Man is like to vanity: his days are as a shadow that passeth away."—PSALM CXLIV. 4.

How often is this solemn truth impressed upon our minds; by the summons to attend the remains of some near and dear friend to the grave! How often are we startled by the news, that one more friend has passed off this stage of action; having been summoned by the king of Terrors, to appear in the presence of God, around whom, if they have trusted in the atonement of his Son Jesus Christ, and have been regenerated and saved, they shall forever rejoice, singing the praises of Him who hath washed them from all their sins in His own precious blood;—but by whom, if they have preferred the things of this present evil world, and looked upon the religion of Jesus Christ as a small matter, they will be sent bound hand and foot into that awful place of torment "where their worm dieth not, and their fire is not quenched."

While engaged in the labor of colporting in the city of Philadelphia, during the summer of 1861, frequent opportunities for religious conversation were presented to me, several of which I endeavored to improve. I remember calling one Monday morning at the house of a friend, hoping to dispose of some of my books or tracts. Upon entering I found three ladies and one gentleman present, but none of them desired any books. One of the ladies said that they were not the kind of books she wished to read. This confession led to a conversation on religion and its requirements; during which the other persons not feeling interested left the room.

My friend seemed quite young and in good health, and was not willing to renounce the world with its affections and lusts: they seemed so essential to happiness, she seemed to fear that in reading religious books, she might become serious, and, therefore, preferred not reading them. She, however, promised to read a couple of tracts which I left with her.

I saw her again, before quitting the work of colporteur, on which occasion a violent thunder storm arose, the lightning of which flashed fearfully, threating instant destruction to all that lay in their path. I embraced the opportunity of conversing with her upon the nearness of death, not only when in brilliant electric light, he hastes with rapid movement across the cloudy paths of the sky, but at all times, even when we think ourselves perfectly safe, and warped her of the necessity of constant preparation for that awful change.

She listened very attentively, and I endeavored to impress upon her mind, the necessity of regeneration, the joys in heaven awaiting those who accept Christ's offered mercy; as well as the terrible end of those who refusing to drink from the wells of salvation, hew out to themselves "broken cisterns, broken cisterns that can hold no water." Before we parted, I expressed a hope that she might, ere long, become a recipient of the salvation of Jesus Christ, and that we might meet in heaven, and there forever rejoice in the goodness, love, and mercy, of him who saves lost sinners from the wrath to come, and makes them sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty.

Shortly after this, I left the city to attend upon pressing duties, in another quarter. I visited the city again during the holidays, and called to see my friend, but she had removed to a part of the city with which I was unacquainted, and I left the city without seeing her.

In the spring of 1862 I was again in the city. I thought several times of my friend, and was hoping, if time permitted, to pay her a visit. But before I could put my purpose into execution, another friend spoke of her decease. Greatly astonished, I immediately inquired when she had died. I was informed that she had died about two months since, happy in the confidence that Christ was her Saviour. So resting in his arms, she was, we trust, wafted to the celestial seats of happiness at Christ's right hand.

Reader, are you prepared for the solemn change that awaits you? Or do you fear to meditate upon death, lest the horrors of the damned be presented to your view? If you are still in the snare of the devil, you may well fear, for unless you escape his grasp, you must forever send forth hideous cries from the bottomless pit. O! flee at once to Jesus; His blood cleanseth from all sin. Receive him as your Saviour, for he is able to save them to the uttermost, that come unto God by him. (Heb. vii. 25.) Do not wait till to-morrow; you know not what may be on the morrow. "For what is your life? It is even a vapor, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away." (James iv. 14.) No doubt you have had many warnings. What terrible torments, then, may you expect, if they are all allowed to pass without improvement; for, He that, being often reproved, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy. (Prov. xxix. 1)

LETTER FROM INDIANA.

Vincennes, Ind., April 22d, 1862.

MR. EDITOR, SIR:—Permit me, through the columns of your valuable paper, once more, to inform all who are friendly to Christianity and the prosperity of our beloved Zion, in this part of the Lord's vineyard, we held our third quarterly meeting, March 13th. At this meeting the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified, many souls were awakened, and brought to the knowledge of the truth. I never saw a more glorious display of the divine power than I have witnessed whilst in this field of labor. The clearness of justification and sanctification, is decidedly and constantly preached A present enjoyment of both of them are so ardently pressed, so unceasingly offered by faith, and faith alone, to be received, felt, and enjoyed now, that the whole circuit seems to catch the flame. Believers are claiming their undoubted right, which is that of entire sanctification. Numbers have professed to have entered into possession of that state, and have brought forth its precious fruits, and the work is still progressing. God is diffusing his own blessing, and sealing the truth by his own power. Since our quarterly meeting, nineteen has joined our beloved Zion. The church property has been improved by the young ladies and gentlemen in the city, the church has been painted, new curtains put up, and one room added to the parsonage, and the lot enclosed, and everything looks as if we were living. We have four Sabbath schools on this circuit. The one at this place is in a good condition. We have one hundred and six scholars, and a tolerably good library. The officers consist of a superintendent, librarian, secretary and treasurer. Number of teachers, nine. Mrs. E. A. Jackson has a Bible class of nineteen regular scholars. We are making arrangements for a day school. I now remit to you $5, for the purpose of supplying us with Sunday school papers. We wish to get twenty-five numbers of the Sunday School Banner, or some other useful paper I should like to take it weekly for one year. Pray for us. WM. JACKSON.

MAY.

Sweet May! beautiful Queen of the year! we greet thee with a thousand welcomes! we hail thy coming with a joyous consciousness of the pleasures that come with thee! Thou dost ope wide thine eyes, and glorious sunshine o'erspreads the earth; thou dost but breathe forth thy gentle breath, and bounteous wild flowers spring up in thy footsteps, filling all the air with delightful perfume. Yes; we greet thy coming, bounteous Queen of sunshine and flowers. Merry laughter from myriad throats greet thee; joyous smiles and love-lit eyes bespeak thy delightful welcome; the little wood land warblers swell their throats with gushing melody; the little gray wren trills forth its joyous greetings; all nature, sweet May, proclaims thy happy advent. The fitful howl of wintry winds no longer sweep o'er naked or snow-clad hills, or, like spirit-fiends, rush in fury through the deep old woods, marking its way with scenes of desolation; no longer does the stern king nod his heavy head or hold his frightful orgies in desolate valleys; no more does he breathe forth his biting breath, withering and blighting every living thing. Sweet May! thou beloved fairy Queen! thou dost but lift thy magic wand, and lo, the change! Winter, stern relentless king, retreats from before thy advancing train, and the dismal howl of his going is heard amid the warring trees. Thou hast changed the rough wrappings of winter, and lo, the bounteous adornings of spring; the sweet wild rose timidly lifts its fragrant head in the desert, and wild flowers of every hue dot and variegate the velvet carpet of nature; the gurgling rivulet steals from its prison-house in the rocks and hills, wanders slowly along through the vale, singing its tinkling silver song, flashing its crystal drops in the gentle sunlight, reflecting in its mirror-like bosom its own bounteous surroundings. The sweet song bird pours forth its wild melody in cheerful songs of praise; all nature attunes its voice to welcome thee, sweet May; happy children, in groups here and there, dot the landscape, bathing their joyous faces in the silver sheen of thy glorious mirror, drinking in thy fragrant breath, roaming o'er the green hills, plucking flowerets here and there, and pouring forth their little souls in gushing songs of joy; sweet maidens, too, trip with fairy step all o'er the plain in search of the first fair flowers of spring. Sweet, gentle May! thou dost stir everything with thy gentle influence. Thou dost o'erspread the earth with loveliness, and the heart doth swell with new life as we drink in thy delightful breath, or listen to the sweet music of thy fairy charmers. Then all hail, sweet May! thou fairy queen of love! glorious type of Eden beauty! may thy gentle reign infuse a balm into the heart weary, making the sad gay, and infusing into every heart thine own gushing joyous spirit. THE WONDERFUL PROPHET.

MR. EDITOR:—Dear Sir:—As this is the first time in my life that I ever attempted to make any remarks through a public paper, and thinking I might interest the readers of the Recorder, I trust, even in this humble attempt, that I shall not say anything that will reflect any discredit either upon the subject or upon myself. The title of my subject is "The Wonderful Prophet." This prophet was not Noah's Son, nor an old Levite, nor John the Baptist, nor yet the Wandering Jew. He was before any of them. His generation was before Adam, with whom he was in the garden of Eden. He was also with Noah in the Ark, and near Christ at his trial before Pontius Pilate. The Scriptures makes frequent mention of this prophet, yet he never knew father or mother. He walks bare-footed and bare-legged, like an old friar, and wears neither hat, cap, bonnet, or any manner of head attire. His coat is neither woolen, linen, silk, lace, cotton, bark, leaves, or sheep-skin, and yet it abounds with a variety of colors, and fits close to the skin, without either seam, button, loop, girdle, or stitch of needle. He is not full four feet high, and carries neither stick, sword, cane, nor any manner of warlike instrument, and yet he encounters his enemies fiercely, and often kills them on the spot. He takes no thought for the morrow, for he considers it sufficient when the day comes to provide for it. He is not fond of worldly pomp or grandeur, for he would rather take his meals in a farmer's barn than in a king's palace. He is wonderfully temperate, for he would rather drink cold water than the strongest liquor. He was never married, yet he has favorites whom he loves greatly, for if he has but one morsel of bread or meat he divides it among them. Yet he is apt to be jealous, and he would rather venture his life than countenance a rival. He is neither Whig nor Tory, Conformist, or non-conformist, for he holds no articles of the Christian faith, neither doth he deny any of them. He never goes to church, meeting, or synagogue, for conscience' sake; and as to going to the altar, he scorns the idea of it. He is not fond of fresh meats on Saturdays, nor yet all Lent throughout. He once preached an eminent sermon to a man who thought to thwart him therein, and in the end brought tears in abundance from his eyes. He is very urgent in proclaiming, with outstretched arms, that the day of the Lord is at hand, and at the voice of the prophet the doors and windows are thrown open. He speaks no language perfectly, yet all men understand him.

I am, dear sir, respectfully, your humble and obedient servant, B. V.

LETTER FROM LEE, MASSACHUSETTS.

Rev. and Dear Brother Weaver:—I thought it would not be amiss to inform you that we are alive as well as awake, and you will say so too when the address arrives for a new subscriber and still another prospective. I just returned home from the concert given by the Minnesinger Brothers for my benefit in the church, and it affords me pleasure to say that the performance was admirably conducted so as to give general satisfaction to the audience; and I think I cannot say too much in commending those ladies to the public through the columns of the Christian Recorder. They are not a whit behind the chief in benevolence, and should always have a place amongst the vocal and instrumental musicians of the day. We received the nice little sum of $12 06, which we could but prize very much, considering that they were not members of our church, for you know it is not often that persons who are not immediately connected with a religious sect feel such interest, and take such an active part in sending the gospel to the lost sheep of the House of Israel, and encouraging the heart of the laborer. What a comfort it is to one in distress when he believes he has a friend. The above named ladies I believe to be such. They are true friends to the ministry. May the blessing of God rest upon them, and may they at last sing in heaven. M. W. C.

COLORED MEN IN THE REVOLUTION, AND IN THE WAR OF 1812.

MR. EDITOR:—Allow me, through the columns of your worthy paper, to say something on this subject—the assistance rendered to the American cause by colored men during the Revolution and the War of 1812. Very little is known on this subject—and the efforts of our forefathers, which were as faithful and patriotic during the time that "tried men's souls" as those of the whites, deserve a lasting record, and should be held in grateful remembrance. This is a matter that has been very carefully kept out of sight by orators and toast-drinkers. We allude to the participation of the colored men in the great struggle for American freedom. It is not in accordance with our taste or our principles to eulogize the shedders of blood, even in a cause of acknowledged justice; but when we see a whole nation adding honor to the memories of one class of its defenders, to the total neglect of another class, who had the misfortune (?) to be of a darker complexion, we cannot forego the satisfaction of inviting notice to certain historical facts which, for the last half century, have been quietly elbowed aside so as more deserving of a place in patriotic recollection than the descendants of the men to whom the facts in question of late have won a place in a Fourth of July procession. Of the services and sufferings of the colored soldiers of the Revolution, no attempt has (to our knowledge) been made to preserve a record. They have had no historian. With here and there an exception, they have all passed away, and only some faint tradition of their campaign under Washington, Green, and Lafayette—and of their cruising under Decatur and Barry, lingers among their descendants—yet enough is known to show that the free colored men of the United States bore their full proportion of the sacrifices and trials of the revolutionary war. The colored men formed an entire regiment, and they discharged their duty with zeal and fidelity. The gallant defence of Red Bank, in which the colored regiment bore a part, is among the proofs of their valor. In this contest, it will be recollected that four hundred men met and repulsed, after a terrible and sanguinary struggle, fifteen hundred Hessian troops, headed by Count Donop. The glory of the defence of Red Bank, which has been pronounced one of the most heroic actions of the war, belongs in reality to the colored men; yet who now hears them spoken of in connexion with it? Among the traits which distinguished the colored regiments, was adoration of their officers. In the attack made upon the American lines near Croton River, on the 13th of May, 1781, Colonel Greene, the commander of the regiment, was cut down and mortally wounded—but the sabres of the enemy only reached him through the bodies of his faithful guard of colored men, who hovered over him to protect him, every one of whom was killed. Dr. Harris, of Dunbarton, New Hampshire, a revolutionary veteran, stated, in a speech at Francestown, New Hampshire, some years ago, that, on one occasion, the regiment to which he belonged was commanded to defend an important position, which the enemy thrice assailed, and from which they were as often repulsed. There was, said the speaker, a regiment of blacks in the same situation—a regiment of negroes fighting for our liberty and independence—not a white man among them but the officers, in the same dangerous and responsible position. Had they been unfaithful or given way before the enemy, all would have been lost. Three times in succession were they attacked with most desperate fury by well-disciplined and veteran troops, and three times they successfully repel the assault, and thus preserved an army. They fought thus through the war. They were brave and hardy troops. Governor Eustis states that the free colored soldiers entered the ranks with the whites. The time of those who were slaves was purchased of their masters, and they were induced to enter the service. In consequence of a law of Congress, by which, on condition of their serving in the ranks during the war, they were made freemen. This hope of liberty inspired them with courage to oppose their breasts to Hessian bayonets at Red Bank, and enabled them to endure with fortitude the cold and famine of Valley Forge. The celebrated Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, in his speech on the Missouri question, and in defence of the slave representation of the South, made the following admissions: They, the colored people, were in numerous instances the pioneers; and in all the labors of our armies, to their hands were owing the greatest part of the fortifications raised for the protection of the country. Fort Moultrie gave, at an early period of the inexperience and untried valor of our citizens, immortality to the American arms—and in the Northern States numerous bodies of them were enrolled, and fought side by side with the whites in the battles of the revolution. Martindale, of New York, in Congress, January 22d, 1828, said: Slaves, or negroes who had been slaves, were enlisted as soldiers in the war of the Revolution, and I myself saw a battalion of them—as fine, martial-looking men as ever I saw attached to the Northern army in the last war, on its march from Plattsburg to Sackett's Harbor.

Hon. Charles Miner, of Pennsylvania, in Congress, February 7th, 1828, said: The African race makes excellent soldiers. Large numbers of them were with Perry, and helped to gain the brilliant victory of Lake Erie. A whole battalion of them were distinguished for their orderly appearance.

On Lakes Erie and Champlain, where the fleets triumphed over a foe superior in numbers and engines of death. They were manned in a large proportion by men of color. In 1814 a bill was passed in New York, receiving the approbation of all the branches of the Government, authorizing the Governor to accept the services of a corps of two thousand free colored men. These were times which tried men's souls. In those times it was no sporting matter to bear arms. These were times when a man who shouldered his musket did not know but he bared his bosom to receive a death-wound from the enemy ere he laid it aside; and in these times the colored men were found as ready and as willing to volunteer in the service as any other.

They were not compelled to go; they were not drafted—no; the pride of the whites had placed them beyond their compulsory power—but there was no necessity for its exercise. They were volunteers—yes, sirs, volunteers to defend this country from the inroads and ravages of a ruthless and vindictive foe, which had treated the country with insult and degradation.

A REJOINDER.

MR. EDITOR:—I see that Elder Campbell has finished his reply to my communication which I wrote on inconsistencies. He says in his reply, which is found in No. 66 of the Christian Recorder, "Bro. Strother has written three long and tedious, dark and gloomy articles about inconsistencies." I want the public to notice here, that he says my articles are on inconsistencies, which is true. Elder Campbell says a few lines from this, "We purposedly and intentionally refrained from entering into a discussion with him about the statements made in his article upon the subject, in No. 58, because he pleaded ignorance of the subject about which he wrote." Now notice, if you please, Mr. Editor, that Elder Campbell says in the commencement of his reply that all three of my articles were about inconsistencies; now, if Elder Campbell, or any other man living or dead, will show me in my articles where I have pleaded ignorance about inconsistencies, I will give up the subject, and say Elder Campbell is right and I am wrong, but if they cannot find such a thing I will reverse the assertion. In the course of my rejoinder I will try to keep from abusing Elder Campbell as he has abused me. I will try to keep his standing in the connection before my eyes, and also the rules of controversy, and my own credit and standing, my own conscience, and my character as a minister in this connection, and what the religious and intelligent would think of me were I to pursue the same course; I intend to keep these things all before my mind, so as not to make myself ridiculous, because a brother has shot me a centre shot. I had not thought that Elder Campbell was so sensitive as to turn his arguments almost wholly into abuse; I regret that my good brother is so irritable. Elder Campbell further criticises the length of my articles; let us look at one of his—it is found in the 59th number of the Recorder; it contains 420 lines. Now, I will take that one of mine that the editor headed as one of the long articles. I find 188 lines in it; let us substract 188 from 420, and we have a remainder of 232 lines. We see then that one of his articles has 232 lines more than mine; let us subtract 188 from the remainder, and we have a remainder of 44, which shows that Elder Campbell's article is not only double the length of mine, but that it is 44 lines more than double its length. Now, is it not a gross absurdity, for such a man to criticise on the length of a such an article as mine, when compared with his. Elder Campbell also says that my articles are dark; well, since I have learned something about his acquirements, as I have in those brilliant articles of his, I do not doubt but what a portion of my language is dark to him; well, I will promise him now that before I close this rejoinder, that I will translate and explain to him such words as may probably be dark to him, and in that way I will make them light for him.

Brother Campbell says enough in his reply to convince me that he is done debating with me; well, I consider it a great victory to silence so great a battery at three blows. I have gained another advantage in the matter. I will have nobody to misrepresent me, and set me wrong before the public, once I set myself right again. Elder Campbell emphasizes very strongly upon my inconsistencies and contradictions; why does he not show these? I say without hesitation, that he is inconsistent, and that he has contradicted himself, and I will show it, as I have already done in my other articles, which I will, in justice to myself, and for the satisfaction of the public. So let us turn now to that little short article of Elder Campbell's, referred to above, which has only 420 lines in it, he says: "Having shown that Bishop Nazrey, during the four years referred to, did exercise legal authority in both places;" (meaning Canada and the United States) Now hear him again, near the end of the same article, in referring to the same case, he says: "We are now, as we were in the General Conference of 1860, opposed to the thing in itself." Now, after arguing to great extent, and after having strained his genius to its uttermost tension to prove that Bishop Nazrey's position is right, and after having concluded that he had most clearly proven it, he turns right about, and almost in the same breath declares that he was opposed to the Bishop's position in 1860, and that he is still opposed to it. I would ask Elder Campbell if he calls this consistent? is this anything better than the very thing with which he falsely accuses me, which is, inconsistency, false reasoning, and contradictions! and is not such contradictions glaringly absurd, as well as inconsistent! But still let me give the public another piece of Elder Campbell's irrelevant reasoning. I will here cite his own language, found in number 59 of the Recorder. "Can it be said of a minister of state, sent to a foreign court, that he is exercising double functions when performing those duties assigned him" Now I would ask in the name of common sense and common honesty what analogy is there between Bishop Nazrey's case, and that of a minister of state? (as he calls him.) I would ask every man who has two eyes and a nose, if he can see anything like a simile between the office of a bishop in any case, and that of a foreign minister. Just let the public consider the functions of these two officers, and I think every one will say as I do, that the comparison is irrelevant; and surely none but an unskilful writer would have ever used it.

Or I would ask this question: What semblance does there appear between one who goes to govern, and rule, and to helpmake laws, and to preside over a certain religious community and become chieftain, (as in the province of a Bishop,) and one whose office it is (diplomatically speaking,) to treat before the court of the nation to which he is sent, in order to keep up friendly commercial and other relations between his own and the nation to which he is sent? Is there any? If there is not, what kind of reasoning is this? Is it philosophical? Is it likely? Elder Campbell would call it logical. I say this from having seen a specimen of his logic. But take another parable of Brother Campbell's: "Is not a minister of Jesus Christ commanded to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature? And if, in obedience to that command, the church send him into the province referred to above, can it be said truthfully that he is exercising double jurisdiction?" Now, is there a man in all the wide world that can see any similarity between a call given by our Saviour to men to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature, and a call by the Canada people to Bishop Nazrey to go to Chatham, Canada, to officiate as Bishop? At any rate, if this be logical reasoning, then I have done. I can but notice E. C.'s manœuvres. It seems that what I have said in my articles galls him more than all that everybody else has said, yet he himself is the aggressor; for when I commenced writing my articles on inconsistencies, I called no name, and I had no more allusion to E. C. than to others who were writing on the same subject, but it seemed that "a guilty conscience needs no accuser," for he begins at once to pounce away upon T. Strother, of Terre Haute, as though I had arrayed myself against him personally. T. STROTHER.

AN INTERESTING EXPERIMENT.

Two hundred pounds of earth were dried in an oven and afterwards put into a large earthenware vessel; the earth was then moistened with rain-water, and a willow-tree, weighing 5 lbs., was placed therein. During the space of five years the earth was carefully watered with rain water, or pure water. The willow grew and flourished; and to prevent the earth being mixed with fresh earth, or dust blown into it by the wind, it was covered with a small metal plate, perforated with a great number of small holes, suitable for the free admission of air only. After growing in the earth for five years, the willow tree was removed, and found to weigh 169 lbs. (about three times The leaves which fell from the tree every autumn were not included in the weight. The earth was then removed from the vessel, again dried in the oven and afterwards weighed; it was discovered to have lost only about 2 ounces of its original weight; thus, 164 pounds of lignum or woody fibre, bark, roots, &c, were certainly produced, but from what source?—Griffith's Chemistry of the Seasons.

THE EMANCIPATION BILL OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The following are the first three sections of the bill, embracing its most important features:

An act for the release of certain persons held to service or labor in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all persons held to service or labor within the District of Columbia by reason of African descent are hereby discharged and freed of and from all claim to such service or labor; and from and after the passage of this act neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except for crime, whereof the party shall be duly convicted, shall hereafter exist in said District.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all persons loyal to the United States, holding claims to service or labor against persons discharged therefrom by this act, may, within ninety days from the passage thereof, but not thereafter, present to the commissioners hereinafter mentioned their respective statements or petitions in writing, verified by oath or affirmation, setting forth the names, ages, and personal description of such persons, the manner in which said petitioners acquired such claim, and any facts touching the value thereof, and declaring his allegiance to the Government of the United States, and that he has not borne arms against the United States during the present rebellion, nor in any way given aid or comfort thereto: Provided, that the oath of the party to the petition shall not be evidence of the facts therein stated.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint three commissioners, residents of the District of Columbia, any two of whom shall have power to act, who shall receive the petitions above mentioned, and who shall investigate and determine the validity and value of the claims therein presented, as aforesaid, and appraise and apportion, under the provisions hereto annexed, the value in money of the several claims by them found to be valid: Provided, however, That the entire sum so appraised and apportioned shall not exceed in the aggregate an amount equal to three hundred dollars for each person shown to have been so held by lawful claim: And provided, further, That no claim shall be allowed for any slave or slaves brought into said District after the passage of this act, nor for any slave claimed by any person who has borne arms against the Government of the United States in the present rebellion, or in any way given aid or comfort thereto, or which originates in or by virtue of any transfer heretofore made, or which shall hereafter be made by any person who has in any manner aided or sustained the rebellion against the Government of the United States.

Sec. 11, appropriates $100,000 "to aid in the colonization and settlement of such free persons of African descent now residing in said District, including those to be liberated by this act, as may desire to emigrate to the Republics of Hayti or Liberia, or such other country beyond the limits of the United states as the President may determine."

THE OBJECT OF PRAYER.

That philosophy is false which flies in the face of Inspiration. Let God be true, and every man a liar who contradicts the Holy Scriptures. The view which they give of prayer is everywhere one and the same. It is asking and receiving; nothing less. To affirm, then, that its sole object is to moderate the human soul, and bring it into harmony with the divine mind and will, is to darken counsel by words without knowledge. "Ask, and ye shall receive," is Christ's promise; not "ask, and ye shall be prepared to receive." It is very true, that prayer does exert a very important and happy influence upon the state of our own hearts, and prepares us to receive in a right spirit the blessings which God gives in answer to prayer. But to make this the principal object of prayer is to neutralize this very effect, and to make prayer nothing but a form. Imagine a person saying to himself, as he enters into his closet, and shuts his door, "Now I am going to ask God to give me certain blessings, not with any idea that He will be any more likely to give them for my asking, but because my asking will make me feel more humble, more dependent, and more grateful when the blessings come." Would such prayer as that be likely to have a very salutary effect in preparing his mind to receive the blessings? But why should he not have just those thoughts, if that is "the principal object of prayer."

Certainly, the better one understands the true doctrine of prayer, the better he is prepared to pray. If prayer is nothing but shooting our petitions against a brazen heaven, that they may rebound with no more force or possible effect upon our hearts, then let us know it, that we may acquire skill by practice, and learn to make a sure and strong aim in this intellectual exercise. Is it not evident, that the moment such a theory of prayer gains possession of the mind, prayer in any sober and scriptural sense of the word, prayer to God becomes an impossibility. This theory is based on the unchangeableness of God But whether or but we can perfectly reconcile our views of His unchangeableness with the doctrine that He hears and answers prayer, one thing is certain, that God must have changed very much if He has ceased to hear and answer it. "O thou that hearest prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come."

JASPER.

HOW MORTARS ARE LOADED AND FIRED.

The following description of the mortar practice is by a correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial:

"I took a position on shore, near the point, and alongside the mortars, to witness their practice. The firing of a mortar is the very poetry of a battle. A bag of powder, weighing from eighteen to twenty pounds, is dropped into the bore of the huge monster. The derrick drops the shell in; the angle is calculated; a long cord is attached to the primer; the gunner steps out upon the platform, and the balance of the crew upon the shore. The captain gives the word, the gunner gives his cord a sudden jerk, a crash like a thousand thunders follows, a tongue of flame leaps from the mouth of the mortar, and a column of smoke rolls up in beautiful fleecy spirals, developing into rings of exquisite proportions.

"One can see the shell as it leaves the mortar flying through the air, apparently no larger than a marble. The next you see of the shell a beautiful cloud of smoke bursts into sight, caused by the explosion Imagine ten of these monsters thundering at once, the air filled with smoke clouds, the gunboats belching out destruction, and completely hidden from sight in whirls of smoke, the shells screaming through the air with an unearthly sound, and the distant guns of the enemy sending their solid shot and shell above and around us, dashing the water up in glistening columns and jets of spray, and you have the sublime poetry of war. An incident, however, will show how completely the battle may lose its poetry and develop into a stern and suggestive reality.

"Impatient of being at a distance, and wishing to witness the effect of our shells, which were playing upon the head of the island, in company with one or two others I strolled round the point, until we came in full view of the enemy's lower forts. We kept along the bank until we passed our pickets, and then took to the underbrush and behind fences, until we reached an old deserted mill, where we emerged in plain sight of the floating battery. No sooner had our party come in sight than a flash of light shot from its sides, and a shell came screaming like a fiend over our heads, bursting a short distance behind us. The poetry of shells and-denly changed into a double-quick retrograde prose."

PREACHING OVERDONE.

ONE SERMON SUFFICIENT.

There is no field of effort in this world in which so much labor is worse than thrown away, as in the field of Sabbath religious instruction in well organized Christian communities. The work is overdone in the matter of preaching, beyond all question; and we may say, also, that it is underdone in other departments. Two-thirds of the Christian church of America are doing nothing, except going to church and cramming on Sabbath. They are simply passive and receptive. We do not see them in the Sabbath school, we do not see them in the mission school, we do not see them in any active Christian labor whatever. They pay their slip rent, swallow the preaching, and then run to their farms and their merchandize. In short, the ministers are expected to do all the work, and the people none of it.

Again, no minister ought to be required to preach two sermons every Sabbath. We suppose there are fools in every community who imagine that, on the whole, a pastor has a pretty good time, and earns his money easily. We have heard this kind of talk not unfrequently; but we give it as a deliberate judgment that not one man in a thousand has the power to write two good sermons a week, throughout his working year, and that not one man in five hundred is equal to the writing of even fifty-two first-class sermons a year. The hand that writes this article possesses quite the average amount of vitality, but it would shrink from a sermon a week, of the ordinary length of those of Mr. Beecher, in the Independent. Fifty-two such sermons will fill three large octave volumes. Think of those volumes of carefully elaborated essays, by the side of Mr. Bancroft's single volume that comes out once in two or three years; and then think of doubling those volumes and making six of them; and then add to those a weekly lecture; and add to that funerals, pastoral visits, and extraordinary labors of various kinds to which all ministers are subjected. Why, the wonder is that any minister lives through what all are obliged to do. None know better than the ministers who read this article that when they have written one good sermon, into which they have put their best power, they are exhausted for the week. Such a man as Mr. Beecher is one in a million; and we are inclined to think that even he would assent to this statement as applied to himself. A congregation may be sure that they do not get any more than there is in a man, any way; and if they prefer to take it spread out into two different sermons, rather than in one good one, why we wonder at their taste, or their lack of taste.

Again, as our Sabbaths are now conducted, the idea of rest is entirely set aside. We are aware that some good people think change of employment the best kind of rest; but it seems to us to be the curse of the nation that we take no time to sit still.—There is no repose; and where there is no repose there is no reflection. We drive through the week, take no time whatever with our children and families, and then drive through Sabbath in the same way. The Christian father of a family who attends church regularly, and goes into the Sabbath school, has no time with his family at all. His day is all used up, and he is used up into the bargain. Perhaps it was intended that Sabbath should be spent in this way, but we don't believe it. We regard this transformation of the day of rest into a day of unremitting work, as simply a weak device on the part of the influential portion of the Christian church for keeping its members and the world out of mischief. We believe it is the fear of the church that fewer services would lead to more Sabbath desecration and more carelessness, that keeps it up to the old standard of two sermons a day, and sometimes a "third service"—God pity the poor man who has to go through it! We need less public life and more home life on the Sabbath—less preaching by the minister and more lay effort.—Springfield Republican.

OUR OWN FAULTS.

Let us not be over-serious about the failings of others, but take account of our own; let us bear in mind the excellences of other men, while we reckon up our own faults, for then shall we be well-pleasing to God. For he who looks at the faults of others, and at his own excellences, is injured in two ways: by the latter he is carried up to arrogance, through the former he falls into listlessness. For when he perceives that such a one has sinned, very easily he will sin himself; when he perceives he has in aught excelled, very easily he becomes arrogant. He who consigns to oblivion his own excellences, and looks at his failings only, while he is a curious engineer of the excellences, not the sins, of others, is profitable in many ways. And how? I will tell you. When he sees that such a one hath done excellently, he is raised to emulate the same; when he sees that he himself hath sinned he is rendered humble and modest. If we act thus, if we thus regulate ourselves, we shall be able to obtain the good things which we are promised through the loving-kindness of our Lord Jesus Christ.

St Chrysostom.

THE STUDY OF ATTITUDES.

Perhaps a finer opportunity has not for many generations occurred, than that after the battle, for the study of attitudes. There was the old man, his locks sprinkled with gray, kneeling beside a stump, as if in the attitude of prayer, his face now resting in his hands, and head reclining on the top, apparently having gone to sleep in death while in the act of devotion. A ghastly wound in the side told of his end.

Another powerful-looking man had just placed a cartridge in the muzzle of his gun, and had the ram-rod in his right hand, as if about to ram it down. Death caught him in that moment, and as he lay with upturned face, the right hand clenched the gun, and the left one the ramrod. There were many instances similar to this last. One soldier had loaded his piece, and paused to take a chew of tobacco. Beside his body lay the gun, and in his right hand was a flat plug of tobacco, bearing the imprint of teeth.

In one place lay nine men, four or five of ours, and about as many rebels, who, from indications, must have had a hand to hand fight. They were dead, and bore wounds made evidently with bayonets and bullets. Two had hold of another's hair, and others were clenched in a variety of ways. One seemed to have had a gripe in the throat of his antagonist, and been compelled to relinquish it, judging from the frigid marks. The most singular attitude of any that I have ever observed was that of one Union soldier, the position of whose body was similar to that of a boy's when he is playing at leap-frog

Some had lain down quietly with their heads resting against a stump or tree, their caps resting on their faces, and had thus died alone and unattended. Yet the calmness and repose of the countenances, as one raised the covering, indicated a peaceful departure to the spirit world. Death caused by a bullet leaves a quiet, calm look behind, while a bursting shell,

CHRISTIAN RECORDER

The Christian Recorder, now in the 70th number of its publication since we have been Editor and General Book Steward, and which has been going on for several months, has never once stopped to "take breath" for a single week since it commenced under our humble administration, ever continuing to scatter and disseminate its congenial influences around, both far and wide. Well, what can we further say upon the great subject of propagating religious truths to a dying world? Let us think a moment:

It is admitted by a majority, if not all, writers that the Press and the Pulpit are the two great levers by which the greater portion of the people can be met. There never was a time in the history of this country when our Church stood more in need of a paper for the moral and spiritual welfare of our people than at present. We need just such a paper. It is acknowledged by all generous and unprejudiced minds to be quite a creditable weekly paper—equal to any published for the same object—religious instruction. It gives our ministers, as well as the laity, an opportunity of unfolding and displaying the extent and capacity of their individual talents and literary acquirements.

It is a medium of communication among and for our people—a medium by which we can learn in the interval of the Annual Conference how each circuit and station is progressing, both spiritually and temporally. It is a medium by which our Bishops can notify a Council, which we think is highly conducive to the interests of the Church. Let it cost what it may, it should and in this council. We can see no good reason why they might not in this manner decide upon removing such a minister or ministers from the East, West, North or South, as they may agree upon, whose disposition and qualifications, both in a spiritual and financial point of view, require it. The mother church, with all her brilliant array of talent, does so. We have remembrance of one particular case when we were stationed in Chicago. The Rev. Mr. Rice was, by the Council of the Bishops, sent from Baltimore to build the Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church. Hence the Christian Recorder is a medium by which such could be made known.

Again: it is a medium by which we can learn the amount and degree of intellectual capability in our Church—and by this means we could generally tell those who are qualified for any position in which the Church may desire them to act. We need all the grace and talent, as an oppressed people, that we can get to grapple with ignorance and stupidity.

Then, we say to every minister of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, throw aside your little, frivolous objections and excuses, and let all put their shoulders to the wheel!

We are glad to see that the Baltimore Conference is coming up. The people are regaining confidence in the Book Concern and paper—and in order that they shall continue to grow so, we call upon our ministers and people to take hold of the work in earnest. Every minister is an agent for the Christian Recorder, and every minister who gets us ten cash subscribers shall be entitled to two dollars, if for a year, and if it is for six months, one dollar. Yes, we want annual subscribers—for these are the kind to make the paper live.

Again: it is acknowledged by all of our brethren and friends, wherever the paper has gone, that it has done much good, and the people are universally pleased with it. Then, we say to all, let us keep it in the field until the next General Conference, and then let them adopt whatever they may think best. We are willing to give our services, as we are now doing, until the next General Conference, if brethren throughout the connexion will rally to our aid. We believe you will do it, brethren. Let every minister preach on the subject of the Recorder, and never allow three weeks at any time of the year pass over his head without having the subject of the Recorder and Book Concern brought up—and, in this way, we will soon begin to approach as second to the mother Book Concern.

HOME AND AT OUR POST.

We are again at home, through the mercy of the All-wise Creator, after having had a journey over the mountains, hills, and valleys, by way of railroad, sometimes rough and sometimes smooth We could hardly realize, when we returned from the West to the District of Columbia, that we were treading on free soil. Three shouts for the Union, and all hail to the King of Glory. We hope that the people of color will prove that they appreciate their deliverance by subscribing for the Recorder. But this depends much upon the ministers having the control of the people, and we do hope that the pastors of the churches will be as active as were Rev. Daniel W. Moore and Rev. James Lynch, though we can speak for Rev. H M. Turner, of Israel station, and Rev. H. J. Reade, and have great expectations of the others.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

The Annual Conference of Philadelphia District meets in the city of Trenton, New Jersey, the capital of the State, on the 10th of May, at 9½ o'clock, P. M. It is to be hoped that we shall have a good time. All three of the bishops are expected to be present, and we also expect some of the Ohio brethren as delegates, and a visit of the members of the Baltimore Conference. There will be several candidates or applicants for the itinerant services. There is plenty of work in this District. Yes; there is sufficient work in this city to employ at least five good men. We tried to call attention to the great need of the missionary work in this city, (Philadelphia,) but little attention was given to it. If one-half the money that is spent for segars and tobacco was appropriated, it would almost support one missionary here in Philadelphia. May the good Lord give us all the spirit of missions.

BAPTIZING BY IMMERSION.

Rev. A. L. Stanford had a baptising on last Sabbath in the Delaware River. There were seven persons baptized, and there was a very large crowd assembled on the occasion, and I am sure I would have had no objection to seeing policemen present, with their stars shining brightly, which more than likely would have been the means of many enjoying themselves much better than what they did. May the good Lord take care of the candidates.

EVERYBODY GO!

New Spring Goods.—Mrs Shorter S. Hawkins, No 615 Lombard St, has just bought an assortment of Spring goods, which she can sell at a very low price. We would say to all, go to Mrs. Hawkins' store. For further particulars, we refer you to her standing advertisement on our third page.

NOTICE.

The Bench of Bishops have at last come together in Philadelphia

SACRAMENT.

This solemn duty was performed by Elder Woodlin, in Bethel Church, and by Elder Stanford, at night, in Wesley Church, Hurst St.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE DAUGHTERS OF CORNISH.

The Anniversary of the Daughters of Cornish came off on Wednesday, the 7th inst. We were present on the occasion, and can say that Mrs. Carter, the President, presided over the society with much credit to herself, and it would be well for some of our brethren to take example from her. Mrs. Seymour, their Secretary, read the report of the annual proceeding, which was very interesting and creditable to the society. They paid out over $100 to their sick members, and also took in some $138. On that night, after the society was through, they then introduced the ministers, and we all delivered a short address to them. After which we were invited to some of the most magnificent cakes, with the name of the late Rev John Cornish, and, with the aid of a knife, we were all made to fare sumptuously. May this society still live to do good.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

We received the following amounts from Rev. Daniel Moore, due for papers up to the 67th No of the Recorder, in full:—

Rev J. Lynch, on account for papers,	$5.00
Mr. John D. Harper, Summerton, O.,	1.00
Mrs. Fleming Fowlis, Barnesville, O.,	1.00

THE INSTITUTE FOR COLORED YOUTH.

The examination of the pupils of the Institute for Colored Youth came off on Tuesday last, under the principal and teachers of said school We can say that we were highly pleased with the exercises, and that the examination was one of the most brilliant that has ever been since the commencement of the school, as they teach some branches they never taught before. The scholars deserve much credit for the manner in which they acquitted themselves. On Wednesday, and in the evening of the same day, the Rhetorical and Elocutionary exercises of the Alumni came off. At 11 o'clock, A. M, Miss Estelleua Johnson read an essay or poem, which was well timed, and read with much ease.

Octave Catto was next introduced, who delivered an able address, or eulogy, on the late J. E. Glossow, who was a graduate of the Institute for Colored Youth. Prof. E. Bassett, the principal of the school, concluded the exercises by a very able oration, and what may be considered a masterly effort. We disagree a little with some parts of the theory brought to bear upon our minds.

COLORED MEN IN THE REVOLUTION, AND IN THE WAR OF 1812.*

On the capture of Washington by the British forces, it was judged expedient to fortify, without delay, the principal towns and cities exposed to similar attacks. The Vigilance Committee of Philadelphia waited upon three of the principal colored citizens, James Forten, Bishop Allen, and Absalom Jones, soliciting the aid of the people of color in erecting suitable defences for the city. Accordingly, twenty-five hundred colored men assembled in the State House yard, and from thence marched to Gray's Ferry, where they labored for two days almost without intermission. Their labors were so faithful and efficient that a vote of thanks was tend-red to them by the committee. A battalion of colored troops was at the same time organized in the city under an officer of the United States' Army, and they were on the point of marching to the frontier when peace was proclaimed. General Jackson's proclamations to the free colored inhabitants of Louisiana, in his first inviting them to take up arms, he said:—"As sons of freedom, you are now called on to defend our most inestimable blessings. As Americans, your country looks with confidence to her adopted children for a valorous support. As fathers, husbands, and brothers, you are summoned to rally around the standard of the eagle to defend all which is dear in existence." The second proclamation is one of the highest compliments ever paid by a military chief to his soldiers:—

"To the free people of color.—Soldiers: When, on the banks of the Mobile, I called you to take up arms, inviting you to partake of the perils and glory of your white fellow citizens, I expected much from you, for I was not ignorant that you possessed qualities most formidable to an invading enemy. I knew with what fortitude you could endure hunger and thirst, and all the fatigues of a campaign. I knew well how you loved your native country, and that you, as well as ourselves, had to defend what man holds most dear—his parents, wife, children, and property. You have done more than I expected. In addition to the previous qualities I before knew you to possess, I found among you a noble enthusiasm which leads to the performance of great things.

"Soldiers: The President of the United States shall hear how praiseworthy was your conduct in the hour of danger, and the representatives of the American people will give you the praise your exploits entitle you to. Your General anticipates them in applauding your noble ardor."

It will thus be seen that whatever honor belongs to the "heroes of the Revolution and the volunteers in the second war of independence," into be divided between the white and the colored man And now they (the whites) tell us we have no rights that they are bound to respect. "What right, I demand," said an American orator, in this city, some years ago, "have the children of Africa to a homestead in the white man's country?" The answer will in part be found in the facts which we have presented to your notice. Their rights, like that of their white fellow citizens, date back to the dread arbitrament of battle; their bones whiten every stricken field of the Revolution; their feet tracked with blood the snows of Jersey; their toil built up every fortification south of the Potomac; they shared the famine and nakedness of Valley Forge; and the pestilential horrors of the old Jersey prison ship. Have they, then, no claim to an equal participation in the blessings which have grown out of the National Independence for which they fought? Is it just, is it magnanimous, is it safe even, to starve the patriotism of such a people—to cast their heart out of the treasury of the Republic, and to convert them, by political disfranchisement and social oppression, into enemies?

ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF THE A. M. E. ZION CHURCH.

The Annual Conference of the A. M. E. Zion Church, in America, for this District, met, according to appointment, in Wesley Church, Lombard Street, between Fifth and Sixth Streets, on Saturday, 3d inst., at 4 o'clock, P. M., and was organized by Superintendent Peter Ross, who read the first chapter of the Epistle of James, sang, prayed, and feelingly addressed the Conference. J. D Brooks was elected Secretary, pro tem. The chairman appointed J. A. Williams, Thomas H. Castor, and J. D. Brooks, Committee on Public Worship. They made out the appointments of preachers for Sabbath, 4th inst., Superintendent Ross, President of the Conference, to deliver the opening discourse in Wesley Church, Sunday morning, at 10½ o'clock. Adjourned to meet 5th inst., at 10 o'clock, A. M

MONDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.—Second Day.

Conference met pursuant to adjournment. Superintendent Ross presiding, associated by Rev William H. Bishop, Superintendent of the First Episcopal District. Scripture lesson by the former, singing and prayer by the latter. The roll was called, Journal of Saturday read and approved, R. A. Gibson was elected Secretary of Conference, W T. Biddle, Assistant Secretary, and J. D Brooks, Reporter. The Conference Rules of 1860 were read, and the first rule amended so as to meet at 10 o'clock, A M., daily, and adjourn at 1 o'clock, P. M., to go into effect 6th inst. They were adopted, after amendment, for the government of this Conference. Revs. Woodlin, Smith, Weaver, Stanford, Morgan, and Eddy, of the A. M. E. Church, were introduced to the Conference Adjourned to meet at 2 o'clock, P M.

Afternoon Session.—The Conference re-assembled, and the proceedings of the morning were read and approved. The characters of J. A. Williams, A. Cole, S. T. Jones, W Young, R. A. Gibson, J D. Brooks, and T. H Harris were examined and passed. The passage of T H. Castor's character was arrested by Elder Blackstone. Elder S. T. Jones arrested the passage of Revs. Blackstone, Wallace, and Biddle's characters on rumor, and J. Gasaway's was arrested by a letter from the trustees of Makefield Church, Bucks co., Pa. They were referred to the Committee on Complaints, viz: George Johnson, William Young, and Abraham Cole. Committee on Credentials, Shadrach G. Golden, Singleton T. Jones, and John A. Williams. Bros Jones, Williams, and others, discussed upon matters of interest to our connexion till time of adjournment. Adjourned.

TUESDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.—Third Day.

May 6th, Conference met, at 10 o'clock, pursuant to adjournment. Superintendent Ross, associated by Rev. W. H Bishop. The latter read a portion of Scripture. Singing and prayer by J. D. Brooks. The roll was called, and the proceedings of the last session were read and approved. The committee reported relative to Revs. Castor, Blackstone, Wallace, Biddle, and Gasaway, the passage of whose character had been arrested. The first by Elder Blackstone, the next three by Elder S T. Jones, on rumor, and the last named by a letter from the trustees of Makefield Church, Bucks co., Pa. Said committee found no bill of condemnation. The report was received and adopted, and the characters of those brethren were examined and passed. C. J. Carter's character was examined and passed. Elders D Stevens, and W. McFerlin, of New York Conference, and Deacon R H. Dyson, of the Southern Conference, were, by motion, granted permission to participate in the business of the Conference Brother Samuel Matthews, local preacher, of the Canistoga Church, was presented, by Elder Gibson, to join the Annual Conference. The brother gave his recommendation from the Quarterly Conference of the above church, which was read and accepted, and he questioned at length the chairman and others. After which he withdrew, when a spirited discussion ensued for and against his reception, at the close of which, he was, on motion, admitted on probation into the itinerancy. Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.—Fourth Day.

May 7th, Conference met pursuant to adjournment. Superintendent Ross presiding, associated by Superintendent Bishop. Scripture lesson by the former, singing and prayer by C. H Wallace. The journal of last meeting was read and approved. C. J. Carter was censured by a vote of the Conference for violation of Conference Rule 6th. Rev. J. J. Clinton, Superintendent of the Third Episcopal District, appeared, and took a seat on the platform by an invitation from President Ross. By order of the Conference.

A FEW REMARKS.

Sabbath morning, April 27th, 1862, was a most bright and beautiful one. The brilliant god of day lent an indescribable charm to the romantic scene presented by the dim and fading expanse of the Jersey shore, as viewed from Arch Street Wharf, Philadelphia. In every direction large crowds of persons might have been observed wending their way hitherward, bound for Burlington, New Jersey, by way of the steamer Edwin Forrest, lying at this wharf. The object of their visit was, to attend the funeral of Mrs. Elizabeth A Schureman, the wife of Rev. W D. W. Schureman, a beloved and respected minister of the A. M E Church.

At 1 o'clock, P M., a large concourse of people had assembled—the funeral procession to move at 2 o'clock, P M., according to arrangement. The corpse was beautifully and appropriately laid out by Mrs. Sarah Williams, a shroudress of Philadelphia, and reflected no small amount of credit on her good taste and judgment. At 2 o'clock, P. M., the funeral cortege proceeded to the Burlington A. M. E Church, in the following arranged order:

1st The Grand United Order of Brothers and Sisters of Love and Charity

2d. The Ministry.

3d. The remains of the departed, born on a bier by the United Order.

4th The mourners—consisting of the bereaved husband, three children, and a sister.

5th. The United Daughters of the Rev. W D. W Schureman's Society.

6th, and lastly The friends of the family.

It is said to have been the largest funeral ever witnessed in Burlington. On entering the church, singing was commenced by the choir. Opening hymn by J. Truby. Prayer by Rev. R. Evans. Brother James Truby then arose and announced the following text: Rev xiv 13—"Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord," &c. His remarks were much to the purpose, and very satisfactory. Benediction by Rev. Joshua P. B. Eddy. We then proceeded to the silent regions of the dead, and the burial rite was performed by Rev. W. J. Fuller, after which the Grand United Order of Brothers and Sisters of Love and Charity surrounded the grave. Attention was called by the proper officers who attended to the ceremony of the dead, to the immortalization of themselves, and to the admiration of all observers

AN OBSERVER.

Burlington, May 1, 1862.

By special request we publish the following Jubilee Meeting, clipped from the weekly Herald of Connecticut: it will be interesting to our readers:

THE JUBILEE MEETING.

The meeting of the colored people of New Haven, held in Temple Hall, last evening, in commemoration of the Emancipation of Slavery in the District of Columbia, was largely attended, and passed off with great honor to those who had made the arrangements, and gratification to those who attended

The house was called to order by Mr. Mineus Lyman, whereupon D. C. V. R. Creed, in behalf of the Committee of arrangements, announced the following gentlemen as officers of the meeting:—

President—Rev. Amos G. Beman.

Vice-Presidents—Richard Green, Mineus Lyman, Richard Wright, William Stevens, Thomas Prime, Edward Galpin, Robert G. Cromwell, Wm. Wilson, Robert J. Cowes, Richard Giles, S. V. Berry.

Secretaries—Wm W. Quonn, Charles E. Cummings, Robert W. Evans, Cornelius H. Gibbs.

The Throne of Grace was then addressed in a brief but appropriate prayer by Rev. D. L. Ogden.

The Chairman briefly addressed the meeting, when the following preamble and resolutions were read by Dr. C. V. R. Creed, and adopted in the midst of loud cheers:—

WHEREAS, the Congress of the United States have in a noble and masterly manner passed an act Emancipating the Slaves in the District of Columbia, and removing forever this long-cherished institution from the very heart and centre of the "National Government," thus wiping away the stain which for years has disgraced the "nation's escutcheon," and acknowledging the great Jeffersonian principles, embodied in the "Declaration of Independence" and "Constitution of the United States," of the freedom and equality of all men—therefore,

Resolved, That we, the colored citizens of New Haven, hail with feelings of intense joy and thanksgiving, the recent act of Emancipation, and do hereby return our sincere thanks to those philanthropic, Christian statesmen—Messrs. Hale, Sumner, Wilson and Wade, of the Senate—Messrs. Lovejoy, Potter and Stevens, of the House—and all others to whom we feel indebted for bringing about this great reformatory measure in behalf of our oppressed fellow beings.

Resolved, That in our honored President, Abraham Lincoln, we recognise those noble traits of character which have ever shone resplendent, through an unsullied life—a man in whom we have the most implicit confidence, and whom we will earnestly sustain in carrying out the letter and spirit of the Constitution, by pledging to him and the country our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.

Resolved, That as "American Slavery" is the mainspring of the present rebellion, we are in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war, until the irrepressible conflict between "Liberty" and "Slavery" is forever settled, in the complete overthrow and abolition of this stupendous wrong.

Resolved, That in this righteous edict of "national emancipation," and in the glorious developments of Divine Providence by which so many thousands of our brethren are becoming FREE from their long and cruel bondage, we recognise our new responsibilities and obligations to them and to the world, to develop in ourselves, and to teach them the sacred importance of those holy principles of industry, domestic economy, temperance, moral and intellectual education, civil and religious freedom, upon which, under God, the prosperity and happiness of all mankind depends, welcoming our labors of love, and rejoicing in the hope that soon freedom shall be declared to all inhabitants in the land.

Resolved, That the doings of this meeting be transmitted to the gentlemen embraced in the resolutions, and to the daily press for publication.

The meeting was then addressed by Dr. Creed, Rev. Wm. T. Catto, Dr. Bacon, J. G. Smith, and Rev. J. S. C. Abbott. The speeches were received with repeated bursts of applause, and the joyous people dispersed after joining in the Doxology.

Our readers will share our gratification in reading the brief but comprehensive paragraphs which follow:

REPORTING PUBLIC PRAYERS.

It has become a habit of the daily press to report the prayers offered, or prepared for, certain public occasions of more than ordinary interest. Doubtless, great differences have been noticed in such prayers. Some are complete, others incomplete, often mere fragments. Some are Evangelical in spirit; and, in style, chaste and appropriate. Others are so mutilated as to appear heretical, and so disfigured as to be repulsive. The better class consist chiefly of those which have been carefully prepared—as, for instance, by the Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church. These are copied from the original manuscripts, and are generally printed correctly. The other class consists mostly of extemporaneous effusions; which, however well ordered, are published according to the hearing, judgment, skill, time and room of the reporter, or the amount of vacant space in the paper. These, in many cases, are most mortifyingly misrepresented Illustrations might be furnished which would seem almost incredible. Readers of such prayers should make allowance for all imperfections. It is more likely that they are attributable to careless, hurried, or cramped reporters, or printers, than to reverent and judicious ministers of the Gospel.

STAR-SPANGLED.

"The star-spangled banner, O long may it wave, O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."

Was this compound epithet original with Mr. KEY? If not, whence did he derive it? In COWPER'S HOMER—Iliad, Book XVI.: lines, 158, 9, 60—we find it thus:—

"the hauberk rich
Star-spangled to his breast he bound, of swift
Anacides"—

Webster attributes it to E. EVERETT. Why so?

Again, under "spangle," he gives these examples of use:—

"For the rich spangles that adorn the sky."—Waller.

"What stores do spangle heaven with such beauty."—Shakespeare.

There is a brave and brisk sparkling, a sort of sprightly snap and ring, in the collocation—"The star-spangled banner," that admirably suits the tune and temper of the National Chorus.

TEMPERANCE IN THE ARMY.

It is said that 42,000 of our men have signed the pledge. In August last, 740 members of one regiment signed it, and up to December only four of them had broken it. One agent in this good work has sent home, at the request of soldiers, and to their families, $70,000.

PRAYER the private approbation of the wise and good, but the publicity of the vain and fond.

DAVISS "DONE GONE"

We have a curious and interesting picture on exhibition in Bell and Black's window that I think you would be pleased with. It is an oil-painting by W. M. Davis, of Port Jefferson, Long Island, the author of several other ingenious works, and entirely a self taught artist. The execution is good, and would do credit to any painter, but the design is what I wish at present to notice. The title of the picture is "Done Gone," and it adumbrates the grave of Secession. Any one who has been in the South, or if not, who is familiar with Uncle Tom's Cabin, or the Negro Minstrels, knows that the phrase "Done Gone," is a cant term of the negroes, indicative of a total conclusion and final winding up of anything. It is therefore, appropriately borrowed from Negrodom, as a felicitous, if not a classical phrase, to signify the dying out of the insurrection whose object was to make Slavery the corner-stone of the Constitution.

Standing prominently in the centre of the canvass is a tombstone, on which is engraved the epitaph "Hic jacet Secesh." I know not whether the painter meant to intimate that this tombstone is the veritable corner-stone before alluded to, but if he did, it was a good hit, sly, humorous, and delicate. Over the stone is flung a tattered military cloak, part blue and part red. Some of the red lining so trails on the ground as to look like a puddle of blood. Around are strewed various odds and ends. Some have thought that the design was suggested by Hogarth's picture, "The End of All Things," in which he has grouped together fragments of everything imaginable. But I do not believe that Mr. Davis' invention is so poverty-stricken. Let him have full credit for originality. On one side of the stone is an old straw hat, with a hole in the crown, through which the ordinance of Secession is thrust. Under it lie a pair of worn-out boots. A bent bayonet is stuck in the ground, which had been made to do duty as a candlestick, the candle end being burnt to the socket. On the other side is a demijohn overturned, from which the last drop has been exhausted. By it lies a letter from a Southern nymph, to her hero, "P. S.—Dear Alec. be sure and kill a Yankee for your affectionate Dellah." In the foreground is a Confederate shinplaster for the value of "One Fip" By it lies the stump of a segar, vulgarly called "an old soldier." Near is a sarcasm, with two grains left on one end. Whether this is a symbol of Cobb, of Georgia, effectually shelled out, I leave to your fancy. A rusty bowie-knife with the point broken off, is a conspicuous object. Then we see some of the means by which the chivalry diverted their weary hours and drove away ennui. There are a couple of cards, one partly lying over the other. The lowest is the King of Clubs, with the word "Cotton" pencilled underneath. Over it lies the Ace of Spades, denoting King Cotton is dethroned. Labor is uppermost. To complete the whole we have the literature of the camp; a yellow covered pamphlet entitled "The Pretty Milkmaid," the color and the title conveying to the mind doubts whether the production ever emanated from the press of the American Tract Society.

The Standard, (Dr. Nevin's.)

SCOTCH CLERICAL ANECDOTE.

Mr. —— was a well-known wag, though an excellent man and diligent pastor. There was a sort of infidel and scoffing character in the town where he lived, commonly called "Jock Hammond." Jock had a nickname for Mr. ——, which, though profane, had reference to the well-known evangelical character of his ministry. 'There's the grace of God,' he would say, as he saw the good man passing by; and he usually talked of him under that designation. It so happened that Mr. —— had, on one occasion, consented to take the chair at some public meeting The hour of meeting was past, the place of meeting filled, but no Mr. —— appeared. Symptoms of impatience were manifested, when a voice was heard from one corner of the hall: "My friends, there will be no 'grace o' God' here the night." Just at this moment the door opened, and Mr —— appeared, casting, as he entered, a rather knowing look upon Jock Hammond, as he ejaculated these words. On taking the chair, Mr. —— apologized for his being so late. "I had," he said, "to go into the country to preside in the examination of Mr. ——'s school, and really the young folks conducted themselves so well that I could scarce get away from them. If you please, I will just give you a specimen of the examination. I called up an intelligent-looking girl, and asked her if she had ever heard of any one who had erected a gallows for another, and who had been hanged on it himself. 'Yes,' replied the girl: 'it was Haman.' With that, up started another little girl, and she said, 'Eh! minister, that's no true; Hammond's no hanged yet; for I saw him at the public house door this forenoon, and he was swearing like a trooper.'" Upon this there was considerable tittering among the audience, and eyes were directed to the corner where Jock was sitting. "'You are both quite right,' I replied, with a sort of 'gleikit' look towards the first girl. 'Your Haman was really hanged, as he deserved to be; and (turning toward the other) your Hammond, my lambie, is not hanged yet, by 'the grace o' God.'" The effect of this upon the hearers was electric, and amid roars of laughter, Jock rushed out of the meeting, and, for a time, at least, he ceased to make the minister the object of his scurrilous jokes.—Lawson's Life and Times.

THE HABIT OF GIVING.

There are few sentences in the writings of Edward Burke which better deserve to be pondered upon than his advice to his son, "Not to lose the habit of giving." The number of persons who do not at times part with some portion of their property for the relief or benefit of others, is comparatively small. But this occasional and wholly unreliable giving is widely different from the settled habit of responding to the calls of benevolence. The formation of such a habit is ordinarily the work of time, even on the part of many who mean to be governed by Christian principle Like all habits, it is the result of frequent repetition, and its establishment, therefore, if proceeding from right motives, is evidence of a long series of benevolent acts.

The habit of giving, like every other virtue, is more easily lost than won. What it has been the work of years to establish, a few months, often, are sufficient to destroy. By refusing, for only a short time, to contribute to our wonted objects of benevolence, we become spiritually poorer with a startling rapidity Circumstances, it is true, may put it out of our power to contribute to the same extent as we were accustomed to do, but the cases are very rare in which a Christian cannot give something, even though it be but a trifle, to the various forms in which Christ's kingdom asks his aid. If he withholds this from pride, the fear of poverty, or any other reason, he inflicts an irreparable injury upon himself. He takes an attitude of passive resistance to the objects which should engage his warmest interest. He inevitably becomes estranged from them, and, to a certain degree, from his brethren who are actively carrying forward these plans of Christian love! This coldness to the various forms of benevolent labor is itself a state of inward poverty, which is far more to be feared than any outward want.

The loss of the habit of giving is, therefore, a very great loss, and one against which no pains are too great to guard. Just now the danger is imminent. Some, there is reason to fear, are withholding more than is meet, yielding, perhaps, to idle fears, or the suggestions of a weak and timorous faith. Let all such remember how precious is the habit of meeting the appeals of Christian benevolence with cheerfulness, with how much time and pains it is acquired; how easily it is lost, and how lamentable the loss is, and resolve once for all, that whatever else they may lose, they will not lose the habit of giving.—Christian Herald.

THE EXPEDITION TO PITTSBURGH LANDING.

When the news of the great battle at Pittsburgh Landing, Tenn., reached this place, a meeting was called by our humane and benevolent citizens for the purpose of sending Hospital Stores and the necessary Surgeons and Nurses to the relief of the wounded. The expense of this merciful undertaking was cheerfully borne by the community, although it was known that few, if any of the Penns. Regiments were in the engagement. As the details of this expedition are very interesting, and their perusal may serve to guide others in similar efforts for the relief of the sick and wounded during the war; we publish the narrative below, kindly prepared by one of the nurses. We would only yet remark that forty-eight of those still remaining on the Steamers on their arrival at our city were taken to the U. S. Marine Hospital, and the others, to the number of seventeen to the Infirmary of the Deaconesses, where with few exceptions, they are rapidly recovering. The poor fellows are most grateful for the kindness received, and it is really a pleasure to witness their cheerful and thankful spirit, even in the midst of great suffering. One or two have died at the Marine Hospital, but all who are at the Infirmary will probably recover. The soldiers who are here are of various Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Wisconsin and Missouri Regiments.

The battle of Pittsburgh Landing was fought on the 6th and 7th of April, and on the 11th, an expedition started from this city, consisting of the steamboats J. W. Hailman, and Marengo, with a sufficient number of surgeons and nurses, all under the general direction of F. R Brunot, Esq. The names of the ladies and gentlemen composing the expedition have been published.

Ample stores of all kinds were taken, together with material, for making as many cots or bunks, as would fill every available space on both boats. On Saturday the company was divided into working parties To the ladies was assigned the task of making mattresses, pillows, sheets and towels; and that done, the remainder of the muslin was worked up into shirts, to increase the stock we had on hand. They labored with unflagging industry until we arrived at the end of our voyage of twelve hundred miles. To a party of gentlemen was assigned the work of filling mattresses and pillows; to another that of making portable bunks, out of narrow planed stuff shipped for the purpose. The making of over 300 of these gave no small amount of labor. Others were employed in other needful arrangements, and when we arrived at our destination all was ready for the reception of the objects of our mission. It was soon apparent, however, that some of the younger gentlemen of the party had found more and harder labor than they supposed they had bargained for; but, as they were in for it, they did their parts pretty well.

During the trip down the Ohio, and up the Tennessee, the weather was fine, and it was interesting to note the rapid advance in vegetation, as we moved to more southern climes. On the upper Ohio, the forests were as naked as in winter; on the lower Ohio we found vegetation like what it is here in the middle of May; while on the Tennessee the trees were clothed in full foliage, and it looked like June.

THE TENNESSEE RIVER.

As comparatively few of the people of this part of the country have seen this river, a brief sketch of it may not be out of place. Standing on the deck of a steamer at the landing, at Paducah, which stands on the south bank of the Ohio, just below the junction, the Tennessee presents a noble appearance—broad, straight, and, but for the presence of its mighty rival, would be deemed a large river. It is, perhaps, somewhat less than the Ohio, between Pittsburgh and Wheeling, but is considerably larger than the Allegheny. Both were in high flood when we were there. One remarkable feature of the Tennessee, is the straightness of its channel. There are bends, it is true, but they are no where abrupt, as on our rivers. The banks are in many places low, and subject to overflow. In some places hills are visible from the river; but none are high, like those skirting our rivers. In many places the river washes perpendicular limestone bluffs, from forty to seventy feet high. The land, both hill and valley, appears to be very fertile, and is heavily timbered. But the feature of the scenery, that strikes the northern stranger with the most surprise, is the absence of improvement. In some places for miles there is nothing but an unbroken forest; and, when a "clearing" does make its appearance, the total absence of neatness or thrift, and the miserable habitations, all denote the presence of some blighting curse, and we know what that curse is. For a space of more than two hundred and fifty miles, there is not a score of decent dwellings or well tilled farms, and in all that distance there is but one village—poor, poverty-stricken Savannah—the place where so many of our brave fellows have languished and died. It is said that the valley of this river is unhealthy, and I believe it; for so rich a soil, so rank a vegetation, and so much overflowed land, must necessarily cause miasma; but clearing and drainage are all that are needed to cure it of that, and make it one of the most delightful valleys on the continent.

PITTSBURGH LANDING.

On the evening of Wednesday, the 16th, we reached this now celebrated point. It is a mere landing at a road in the woods. There are, if I remember correctly, one or two shabby buildings, but everything else, save the effects of innumerable feet of men and horses, is in a state of nature. About an acre of ground, comparatively level, lies at the landing, bounded on the land side by an abrupt hill, of some sixty feet, which brings us to the general level of the extensive table land on which the battle was fought.

THE BATTLE FIELD.

The rebels, who are better acquainted with the nomenclature of this locality, call this great struggle "the battle of Shiloh," and writers on our side are adopting the same name. I inquired why it was so called, and was told that Shiloh was the name of a church embraced in the extensive area over which the conflict raged, which is probably the fact. The land would, in Pennsylvania, be level, rather than hilly, although it is broken in many places by ravines, with sides so sloping that men and horses could run across them without much impediment. Roads traverse it in various directions, the principal of which is the one leading from the "Landing" to Corinth. The entire battle field, with an exception hardly worth noting, is a forest, but so free from underbrush that cavalry and artillery could move through it in almost any direction. In the four hours that we rambled over it we could not of course see one half of it; for the field of conflict covered probably not less than fifteen square miles; and on that broad and bloody field, trampled to hardness in one place and to mire in another, by fiercely opposing hosts, we found the quiet camps of nearly one hundred thousand men, calm, resolute, and even cheerful, amid the graves of their fallen comrades. It was a sight to stir the soul to its depths. There was music among the tents, but no boisterous mirth. We walked from group to group of "the boys," and talked with them and they with us, with all the cordiality of friends and brethren. Each would recount some incident of the terrible struggle, and many pointed out localities where such and such things took place. I asked several of the men whether they felt ready for another struggle. "Yes, indeed," was the reply, "we want to finish up this business and go home." They are cheerful and hopeful; but not a word of braggadocio did I hear of what they had done or would do. These men of the ranks love their country, but they abhor war. "Will you go back?" I asked several sick and wounded whom we brought away. "I will as soon as I am able," was the unvarying answer.

That battle has been well described, so I need not attempt anything like a description of it, a thing which I could not do if I would. But I cannot but speak of the unpardonable neglect of somebody, which caused the disastrous surprise of Sunday morning So sudden, so unexpected was the attack that one outlying regiment were caught asleep in their tents, the rebel soldiers opening their doors and ordering them to come out. Others were shot down with their towels and combs in their hands. Others were at breakfast, and others preparing for the usual Sunday morning inspection. One company officer, speaking of this matter remarked, "I don't blame anybody; but if I had done what was done, I should have blamed myself very much." Gen. Grant was at Savannah that morning; but whether he was discharging his duty or neglecting it, whether drunk or sober, are questions that are discussed in camp in terms which plainly denote that the men think more than they say. Grant was warned of the impending danger, but he appears to have been one of those who are so let his men fall into the trap and met a disastrous defeat. I was shown a little spot on the bank of the river where more than twenty broken regiments took shelter under a bluff, and under the partial cover of the guns of the boats, where they spent that dreadful night. Yet these men, so entrapped, have been accused of cowardice. It is a slander; for such management on the part of those whose business it was to guard against surprise would dishearten any man. Moreover, when Buell arrived on Monday morning these dispirited troops went into the fight again, and fully retrieved their character for courage

Although thousands had traversed the ground and gathered trophies of various kinds, still when we were there the ground was strewed with balls and broken shells, and few of our party came away without a "secesh" musket. One gentlemen got an enormous Bowie knife, which some bloody-minded Mississippian had carried to the field and left it, together with his own carcase. Hardly a tree was to be seen but bore more or less marks of balls. I was told of one upon which fifty scars were counted. I saw one more than fifteen inches in diameter cut entirely off

THE DEAD REBELS.

On Wednesday evening we observed a few men working on the face of the hill, not far from the boats. We turned aside to see, and found them engaged in digging a grave for a dead rebel soldier, who had lain there for some time wrapped in his blanket. The work was done with little ceremony, but with decent propriety. No ribald word was uttered by anybody. Before he was laid in his lonely resting place we uncovered his face. It was ghastly, but neither swollen nor discolored. He had been rather a good-looking youth of about twenty. That military vow, like Sterne's solitary prisoner, made a sadder impression than whole hecatombs of slain foes. Perchance he had been forced into the unholy service. It may be that a mother and sisters were at that moment weeping for him. Perhaps no human eye of either friend or foe rested upon his mortal agonies, and no hand proffered to his burning lips a cup of cold water. He was an enemy, but he is not so now, and if a tear dropped beside his rude grave, it was not without cause, and I walked away with a deepened impression of the horrible wickedness of this rebellion.

THE SICK AND WOUNDED.

All the wounded had been removed from the Landing, except one rebel, who was carried on board the "Marengo." He was mortally wounded, and died the next day. He was kindly treated, but his life could not be saved. The Hailman remained at the Landing until evening, to gather what sick were there, while the Marengo dropped down a few miles to a place called Crump's Landing, where there was a hospital barge crowded with sick men. Here we took on board about a hundred, some of whom were evidently past recovery. But the majority of the poor fellows soon began to improve under the kind attentions of our lady nurses, who, as soon as they were laid upon their clean and comfortable beds, with basins, towels and combs, soon made them feel as if they were at home. Several of them remarked that it was like home. To the sick

CHRISTIAN LIBERTY: THE INDIVIDUAL, THE CONGREGATION AND THE CHURCH.

It is very evident that as a congregation is a body of individuals whose views and preferences conflict on many points, and as the Church embraces many congregations, which, if they consulted only their own wishes, would seriously differ, there must be some principles by which Christian liberty regulates itself, so that the freedom of the individual does not take from the congregation what belongs to its freedom as a whole, nor the freedom of the congregation take from the church what belongs to its freedom as a whole. Let us illustrate the point from our civil liberty. We are the free citizens of free States, which are bound together as a free country. The individual has liberty, the State has liberty, and our whole land has liberty; but, this liberty is regulated by one general principle—and that is that the whole is greater than a part. The individual liberty is limited by the liberty of the State; that of the State by the liberty of the nation. The theory of equal rights prevents one person from settling questions which equally interest others, or one State from deciding, even for herself, matters which will involve the interests of the other States. It might be very clearly the interest of some individuals in this city, to have particular things arranged with reference to their wishes, as for example, the local taxes; but as the interests of others are also involved, these matters are settled, not by individual freedom, but by the freedom of the city as a whole, represented in the City Councils, chosen by the whole city. It might be to the interest of Philadelphia to control certain things for herself, but as they involve the interests of other cities and parts of the State, they are regulated, not by her freedom, but by that of the State, represented by the Legislature, chosen by the whole State. It might be to the interest of Pennsylvania, to have certain things in a certain way, as for instance, a particular rate of duties; but these matters affect the interests of all the States, and therefore, they are settled, not by the exercise of our State freedom, but by the freedom of all the States, represented by men chosen by the whole land. The liberty of one is limited by the equal liberty of others; two do not yield to one, but one yields to two. The part is limited by the whole; the less ratio by the larger ratio; the narrower interests by the wider; the local yields to the general; the particular to the universal; the minority to the majority. Nor is this inconsistent with true freedom. One pound is as heavy as another; but if the one is associated with nine pounds, and the other is alone, the one sinks in the balance with the nine, and the other strikes the beam by itself. The principle is as simple as this, that though one is one, two are twice one.

And this simple principle regulates Christian freedom. The freedom of the individual is limited by that of the congregation; the freedom of the congregation by that of the church. The individual uses his freedom to determine what involves himself only; the congregational freedom settles congregational questions, and the freedom of the church determines what interests her as a whole; the individual gives way to the congregation on congregational questions, as the congregation does to the church on church questions. The individual is not to exercise a liberty inconsistent with that of the congregation with which he freely remains associated, nor is the congregation to exercise a freedom inconsistent with that of the denomination with which it remains freely attached.

Now apply these principles. The liberty of the Christian individual in regard to matters of order which involve himself only is unlimited. He may conduct his private and family devotions as he will; make them as long or as short as he pleases. He may pray as often as he pleases, and in whatever attitude he pleases; he may use a book of prayers or dispense with it; sing what hymns to what tunes he pleases; sing with an instrument or without it, as he deems best; and no congregation, no Synod, no authority on earth, has the right to prescribe to him. But he dare not go out of this sphere to make his liberty a law to others—to prescribe thus they in their homes shall do things in his way. He is not to assume what belongs to the congregation as a whole, or to the council which has been chosen by the church, and whose decisions, therefore, are those of the congregation. If an hour is fixed for public worship, he must not make it the hour of his secret devotions, and remain away from the church. He must not say because he prefers kneeling at home, that the congregation shall not stand in the sanctuary, or refuse to stand with them; he must not say because he prefers singing at home without an instrument, that the congregation shall not sing with an organ; that because he prefers dispensing with all forms at home, the congregation shall not unite in using the Liturgy of the church.

On the same general principle the liberty of the congregation is defined. Whatever relates exclusively to its interests and rights as a congregation, belongs to its freedom. Within the congregation, the council, for the purposes constitutionally determined, is the congregation representatively, as a Legislature, in its constitutional functions, is representatively the people of a State, and as Congress, with the same limitation, is the people of the United States. Whatever is done by the council, in accordance with the constitution of the congregation, is done by the congregation itself. In the constitution of most churches there is an arrangement by which, if the council violate the constitution or misrepresent the people, the people can be called together to express their views to the council; and even when there is no such provision, there is always the power of redress connected with a new election: the congregation can refuse to elect again those that have not served them well. The pastor has the freedom of any other Christian in matters which relate to him as a private individual; and as a pastor, he has the control of all matters connected with the ordinances, which are not determined either by the congregation or council, in its sphere, or by the church in her larger sphere. When he is ordained, he declares his faith in the doctrines of the church and his determination to be loyal to her principles. If a conflict arises between the demands of the church as a whole and the demands of a congregation, he is bound to respect the demands of the church; but he has no rights which conflict with the proper rights of the congregation, as laid down in its constitution, or of the individuals in it, as on the other hand, they have none which conflict with his. Finally, on this point, the freedom of the church or denomination as a whole, is one which regulates all matters which pertain to her common interest as a whole. When a body chosen by the whole church and, therefore, representing it, makes decisions on points of order which affect the whole, the congregation are bound by them. No congregation has the right to isolate itself by usages inconsistent with the good of the other congregations, and such a course is not only an abuse of its own liberty, but also, a violation of theirs. The bodies which the church clothes with authority may determine points of order by resolutions, but, in most cases, in an Ancient Church like ours there are usages as deeply rooted, so well established, that even although they were unwritten, they would come with all the well-defined characteristics of law; such, for instance, as the usage of pastoral confirmation.

THE BLOOD OF CHRIST.

(From the German of Krummacher.)

What avails the blood of Christ? It avails, what mountains of good works heaped up by us—what columns of the incense of prayer curling up from our lips toward heaven—and what streams of tears of penitence gushing from our eyelids, never could avail. "The blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth us from all sin." "Helps us to cleanse ourselves, perhaps?" No, cleanseth us. "Furnishes the motive and the obligation for us to cleanse ourselves?" No, it cleanseth us. "Cleanseth us from the desire to sin?" No, cleanseth us from sin itself. "Cleanseth us from the sin of inactivity in the work of personal improvement?" No, from all sin. "But did you say the blood does this?" Yes, the blood. "The doctrine of Christ you must mean?" No, his blood. "His example, it is?" No, his blood, his blood. Oh what timidity the world still betrays toward this essential element of Christianity! Can anything be stated more plainly in language than the entire word of God declares that our redemption from sin is by the blood of Christ? And yet what strenuous efforts are constantly made to set aside this plain, essential, wonderful, and most glorious truth, that the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin!

Yorktown Evacuated!

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,

Fortress Monroe, May 4.—Yorktown was evacuated by the rebels last night, and our troops now occupy the enemy's works.

A large amount of camp equipage and guns, which they could not destroy for fear of being seen, were left behind.

Headquarters Army of the Potomac,
May 4th, 9 o'clock, A. M.

To Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War:

We have the enemy's ramparts, their guns, ammunition, camp equipage, etc., and hold the entire line of his works, which the engineers report as being very strong.

I have thrown all my cavalry and horse artillery in pursuit, supported by infantry. I move General Franklin's Division, and as much more as I can, by water up to West Point to-day. No time shall be lost. Our gunboats have gone up York river.

I omitted to state that Gloucester is also in our possession. I shall pursue the enemy to the wall.

G. B. McCLELLAN,
Major-General.

It is certain that the rebels received reinforcements by steamer from Richmond on Thursday last, but they did not disembark.

The rebels are badly demoralized, and evince symptoms of mutiny on account of the retreat.

Everything was found to be in utter confusion, as though they left in great haste. Between forty and fifty pieces of heavy artillery have been left in their works, after being spiked, together with a large amount of ammunition, medical stores, camp equipage, tents, and the private property of their officers.

A negro who was left in the town states that the rebels threw a large amount of ordnance stores into the river to prevent them from falling into our hands.

Magruder Swears.—The order was given to evacuate by General Johnston, on Thursday—to commence the following morning, which was accordingly done.

General Magruder is said to have most strenuously opposed the measure, stating that if they could not whip the Federals here, there was no other place in Virginia where they could, and that he swore in the presence of his men, who vociferously cheered him, having complete control of himself.

The Merrimac.—Fortress Monroe, May 4th.—The Merrimac made her appearance beyond Sewell's Point at 1 o'clock to-day.

Opinions of the Leading Papers on the Evacuation of Yorktown.—The Philadelphia Press says: "This news, so startling, so glorious, and, in a degree, so unexpected, will surprise both loyalists and traitors. But, while the former will hail it as the herald of returning peace, the promise of a mighty land restored to greatness, and a new proof of the immutability of the Union, the latter, overwhelmed with dismay, and so terribly awakened to the madness of their guilt, must shortly abandon a struggle so hopeless in its aspect, and quietly lay down their arms. The army which we have driven from Yorktown can be an army now in little but in name and numbers. It is disheartened, dispirited, and defeated. It is convinced that its leaders, to use the language of Jefferson Davis, 'have undertaken more than they can accomplish,' and we should not be surprised to hear of its disbandment before many months have passed. The capture of Yorktown points most conclusively to such a termination of the contest.

"After months of confident preparation, after the laborious building of fortifications, and the mounting of hundreds of heavy guns, after the transportation of thousands of trains of supplies and ammunition to this depot, after the concentration of the 'flower' of rebeldom into one of the grandest armies, in point of numbers, that the world has ever witnessed—after all the boasting of the South, and the anxiety, not to say trepidation, of the more desponding in the North, the prospect of a bloody victory has passed away with the flight of a wily and craven enemy."

The Inquirer regards it as demonstrating "the total demoralization of the Confederate cause:" the North American characterizes it as "welcome tidings:" the News says, "it created one of the most agreeable sensations of the season."

The Ledger:—"The rebels at Yorktown have done what Cornwallis tried to do, but failed. Finding their position becoming untenable, in consequence of the skilful siege operations of McClellan, they silently and secretly evacuated Yorktown on Friday night, leaving a large amount of guns and camp equipage behind them, and the National forces now occupy Yorktown without a fight. But the abandonment of this stronghold, which has been fortified more formidably than any place which they can retreat to, and which has been attended with such a loss of war material to the rebels, is one of the highest compliments to the skill of the Union Commander, and a certain proof that they dread an encounter with him more than with any other General of our forces. The retreat proves that Richmond is to be abandoned to its fate, for at no place this side of that city can as successful a defence be made as at Yorktown. The flight of the rebel Congress, a few days ago, from Richmond, was only a precursor of what the army before Yorktown intended to do. The flight of both Congress and the army is a plain confession that the rebels find themselves unequal to the task of defending themselves, according to their long-matured plans, and have now to change their whole policy and positions before the victorious armies of the Government."

The New York World:—"The news which we publish this morning will be read with breathless interest. It will be received with great exultation, but not without some intermixture of disappointment. The country had counted on a terrible and sanguinary spectacle. Our troops were thirsting for an opportunity to rival the valiant and brilliant fighting of their fellow-soldiers in the West. We miss the furious cannonade and the triumphant storming of the enemy's works under a galling and murderous fire. But we hold their ramparts, we have taken seventy-one heavy siege guns, together with a large amount of ammunition and camp equipage, and our cavalry is hanging on their heels in hot and determined pursuit.

But why were the rebels permitted to escape from Yorktown at all? The answer is at hand, and the time has come when it should be made public. The rebel army has escaped only because Gen. McClellan's plan was interfered with, and in an essential particular upset, by the Secretary of War. General McClellan proceeded down the Potomac with the understanding that General McDowell was to follow him with his corps d'armee. It was intended that the operations against Yorktown should be proceeded by the taking of Gloucester Point by McDowell. Had this plan been adhered to, retreat would have been impossible. It is the Secretary of War who is to be execrable for the escape of Johnson's army."

The New York Times:—"The whole extraordinary operation, which has startled the public by its unexpected occurrence—to say nothing of its inexplicable motive—appears to have been conducted with an expedition little short of a complete panic, from fear of the consequences of remaining a single hour longer."

New York Tribune:—"We presume they have retreated to a new and stronger line of defences, which they have been constructing while General McClellan was preparing to take that before which he had sat down. We wish they had staid and tried conclusions at Yorktown, though the retrograde movement must tend to demoralize their rank and file, besides depleting their county stores. Gen. McClellan would probably have opened fire on them this morning had they remained. He will follow them up steadily, and bring them to a speedy issue if possible."

In the Herald, the Washington correspondent says "After Yorktown there is no spot on the peninsula where the rebels can have half the chances for a successful defence; besides, there is no better position to which they can retreat. Richmond, with its three lines of circumvallation, is a mere earthwork to the defences at Yorktown, and may be satisfied simultaneously on all sides by a combination of the Union forces now threatening it. Those who have studied most closely the [illegible] regard the evacuation of Yorktown as about the most fortunate [illegible] in the East, and rejoice that it has been attained without the immense loss of life and blood that was anticipated. It makes the victory of General McClellan ten times more glorious that it was bloodless."

In an editorial it says, "We open to-day a most eventful week, with the glorious news of the fall of Yorktown and the preliminaries of a disaster to the rebel arms which, ere long must bring this odious rebellion to a close."

Guerilla War.—The rebel leaders threaten a system of guerilla war in the rebel States, and especial [illegible] measures which will be exhausting and ruinous to the federal government; and they point with savage exultation to La Vendee and Spain, but they forget the wide difference between the inhabitants of the United States and the people who have carried on a protracted guerilla warfare. The Spaniards and the French in La Vendee had never enjoyed the advantages of citizenship in the United States government; they had no commercial habits or commercial interests; their customs and nature were in accordance with the savage feelings that engender and keep up an irregular warfare; whereas, the peasants that have brought on the rebellion are in conflict with the genius and the customs of the people.

Latest News from the South.—The Confederate Congress—Subject Exhausted. The Richmond Examiner ridicules the idea that the rebel Congress adjourned for the want of business. It says:

"We hope that all other persons in Richmond who intend to prefer flight to fight, should the city ever be in danger, will do what they can in that way—like Congress—without "apprehension" or panic. If Richmond falls it will not be a sudden tumble. There is not the least danger that their precious carcasses will be caught under a mash trap. Abundant time for an adjournment will always be afforded by the operations of such officers as both parties have in the field. No large city, defended by extensive lines and several great armies, ever was or can be surprised. Richmond will always be open on one side, and those who want to get out of it can do so at any time. It is hoped that here, at least, the Confederate armies will not bounce off after burning a steamboat or two, and a bridge, the moment they learn the enemy are in the neighborhood, without knowing how many they are, nor whether they are not worse frightened than themselves.

The Pursuit

DESPATCHES FROM GEN. M'CLELLAN.

Washington, May 5.—The following despatch has been received at the War Department:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
May 4, 7 o'clock, P. M.

To the Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War:

Our cavalry and horse artillery came up with the enemy's rear guard in their intrenchments, about two miles this side of Williamsburg.

A brisk fight ensued. Just as my aid left, Gen. Smith's Division of infantry arrived on the ground, and, I presume, carried the enemy's works, though I have not heard.

The enemy's rear is strong, but I have force enough up there to answer all purposes.

We have, thus far, seventy-one heavy guns, and large amounts of tents and ammunition.

All along the lines their works prove to have been most formidable, and I am now fully satisfied of the correctness of the course I have pursued.

There shall be no delay in following up the rebels.

The rebels have been guilty of the most murderous and barbarous conduct in placing torpedoes within the abandoned works, near wells, near springs, near flag-staffs, magazines, and telegraph offices, and in carpet-bags, barrels of flour, etc.

Fortunately we have not lost many men in this manner. Some four or five have been killed, and perhaps a dozen wounded.

I shall make the prisoners remove them at their own peril.

G. B. McCLELLAN,
Major-General.

Beauregard's Loss.—Beauregard lost not less than 23,000 men in killed, wounded, and prisoners, and the sick, used up, and panic-stricken, during his movement from Corinth upon Pittsburg Landing.

North Carolina.—The best harbor in North Carolina, and a most excellent base of operations, is now in the undisturbed possession of General Burnside, the guns of Fort Macon having been silenced, and its garrison made prisoners, by that indefatigable officer. Beaufort is connected by railroad with Goldsboro', Raleigh, and Greensboro', the last named one of the most important points on the southward railroad communication of the rebels.

Yorktown.—On Wednesday, several of General McClellan's batteries opened fire on the rebel works at Yorktown and Gloucester, and their shipping. The rebels replied, and the cannonading was kept up for some time. The damage done the enemy is not known. Nobody on our side was hurt.

General Smith and Temperance.—The Press has some good remarks on the subject of Temperance, though we are sorry to see them qualified in a way which takes from them almost all their practical value. The following will be universally approved:

We are in the midst of an interminable discussion as to whether General Smith was intoxicated or not on the occasion of that unfortunate and inexplicable affair at Lee's Mills. Mr. Representative Morrill's very proper inquiry suggested it, and every officer in General Smith's Division seems disposed to continue the investigation. If slaves to this pernicious habit are permitted to lead our armies, there will be charges more bloody than the charge of the Light Brigade, and disasters more dreadful than any we have yet encountered. As a military reform, therefore, we welcome the temperance agitation.

The Isabel.—The rebel steamer Isabel, now called the Kika Worley, which has made itself notorious in running the blockade, has been captured at last. She was taken by the steamer St. Jago de Cuba while attempting to run the blockade. She was heavily laden with Enfield rifles and other implements of war.

Beauregard Retreating.—The report that Beauregard was retreating from Corinth has been confirmed by late rebel papers. The rebel general was daily sending his troops southward, part by rail and part on foot, but refuses to make any explanations of his course, stating that Jeff. Davis understands his movements.

Mitchell.—General Mitchell has just made another brilliant movement. Hearing that Gen. Kirby Smith was at Bridgeport, Alabama, General Mitchell marched against him, and, after a short engagement, routed his whole force, capturing 300 prisoners and two cannon.

Skirmish at Farmington.—General Paine's Division, having made a reconnoissance to that place, were confronted by nearly five thousand rebels, but after a short skirmish, our troops cleared the field at the point of the bayonet, capturing a large amount of stores, ammunition, and camp equipage, together with a number of prisoners.

The Norfolk Day Book Hints at Treachery in New Orleans.—It says: "The telegraph tells this morning the most deplorable tale ever heard in America, or, we believe, in the whole world. Two contemptible little steamers have come up to the great city of New Orleans inhabited by a population of two hundred thousand souls, defended by miles upon miles of columbiads and rifled cannon, possessing six floating batteries of immense power, and containing within her bosom not less than thirty thousand disciplined troops—and have commanded the authorities to haul down the Confederate flag! As we write, there had been no intelligence of its having been hauled down; but we are prepared to expect the worst.

"Sailing through miles of the heaviest artillery, it does not appear that so much as a single shot was fired at these two little steamers. On the contrary, everything seems to have been prepared beforehand for their quiet reception. The troops were immediately withdrawn lest they might feel disposed to demur, all the defences on the lake were dismantled, the guns were thrown down without being injured, the steamboats, that could have gotten up steam in an hour and been off, were burned, and the defenders were drawn off to a distant point.

"Never since the world began was there such a transaction—so dark, so mysterious, so altogether unaccountable."

John Brown, Jr., writes that his company have liberated [illegible] slaves in the last four months. They operate in Western Missouri.

Wife of General Scott.—His wife arrived in Rome last Sabbath, and is stopping at present at the Hotel de Londres, her friends being busy in looking up apartments for her. As the family is Catholic, and have been in Rome several times, they will no doubt, secure much attention from the Government, that is, if his Holiness lasts a little longer."

Dr Beecher (and it necessary for his health to take a certain amount of exercise, in walking or riding every day. Run on Sabbaths, to avoid the scandal it will example, he [illegible] out, and descended into his cellar, where he shovelled a load of sand from one side to the other and back again. A hale, hearty, serviceable veteran he continued to be till the unavoidable infirmities of old age crept upon him.

The Oswego (N. Y) Times says Peter Rozelle, of that city, has reached the extraordinary age of 106 years! He never wore glasses, and can read without their use. He converses readily, and retains his memory perfectly.

Rev. B W. Chidlaw, the efficient and popular chaplain of the Thirty-ninth Regiment, O. V., has been compelled by ill health to resign. This will be deeply regretted by the officers and men of his regiment.

Rev. D Magill, of the O. S. Church in this city, and afterwards in Boston, has gone home to Ireland. He recently delivered a lecture in Belfast, on the country in which he said: "America has been a grand sham and a hypocrisy, all through her history since the Revolution."

Foreign Summary.

The Factory Statistics of Great Britain and Ireland for 1861, show a total of 6,378 factories, which contain 30,170,000 spindles, and 430,000 power-looms, which engaged 230,564 hand loom weavers. The number of hands employed was 776,614, whereof 388,275 were males, and 357,325 females, an average of 121 hands to each description of factory. In England and Wales, there were 5,652 factories, the whole number of hands engaged being 642,607. Ireland had 158 factories, which gave employment to 37,872 persons. Scotland reckoned about one-tenth the number of England's factories. Lancashire alone contains one-third of the factories, two-thirds of the spindles, and three-fourths of the power-looms of the United Kingdom, her factories, for every spot of cattle production, numbering 2,144; her spindles, 12,007,193; and her power looms, 361,611.

At the latest accounts the Sumter was still at Gibraltar, and the United States steamer Tuscarora remained off Algeciras. The one-sided "neutrality" of the British government seems to allow the rebel war vessels or privateers, which enter their ports, every privilege they desire, while the restrictions are made to operate against the vessels of the United States government.

Australia.—The ministerial strength of the various Churches in this colony, is reported thus:—Church of England, 117 ministers; Presbyterian, 52; Church of Rome, 44; Wesleyan Methodists, 38; Independents, 9; Primitive Methodists, 6; Baptists, 5; Independent Methodist, 1; Unitarian, 1. The Sabbath school statistics of the various denominations show the Wesleyans have 7,096 scholars; the Church of England, 6,005; Roman Catholics, 3,880; Presbyterians, 1,578; Congregationalists, 1,537; Primitive Methodists, 706; Baptists, 191; Unitarians, 45.

Shanghai has been fortified, in view of the impending attack of the rebel forces in China. Five British, two French, and two Russian war vessels are also before the city, and four thousand armed foreigners will aid in its defence.

Additional despatches from Bombay, March 27th, announces that Lord Elgin was installed Viceroy of India, March 12th. Mugul Bey had been hanged in front of the palace of Delhi. A widespread Mahratta conspiracy had been discovered and suppressed at Hyderabad, in the Deccan.

Cotton Seed, planted at the close of the rainy season in Liberia, springs up so rapidly that in six weeks ripe cotton balls can be gathered. The yield is very large, and the plants bear several years, ripening nearly all the year round.

Pilgrimage by Railroad.—The heathen priests in India are discussing the question with great interest, since the introduction of railroads into that country, how far the merit of pilgrimage to celebrated shrines is affected by this new facility in travelling. There is certainly much less penance in riding comfortably at the rate of thirty miles an hour, than in slowly footing it at four or five, and the merit of the thing must be vastly lessened!

Abolition of Dutch Slavery.—Another blow has been struck at the anathristian system of holding property in man. Holland has offered to her West India colonies assistance in emancipating their slaves, which has been accepted. A Surinam paper thus states the final result:—

"The slave question in the Dutch West India colonies has been settled. All slaves in those colonies will be set free on the 1st of July, 1863, under the following conditions: 1. Compensation of three hundred guilders for each slave—man, woman, or child—to be paid to the owner. 2. Slaves to remain under apprenticeship on the estates for a term of three years, during which time they are to be paid wages for their work, half of such wages to accrue to governments."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

IMPROVEMENTS made in the machinery for manufacturing Gold Pens, and secured to the subscriber by Letters Patent, have enabled him to overcome the many imperfections hitherto unavoidable in their production, and also to bring their cost within the reach of all. The writing public should know the following facts:—

Constant writing for six months is done cheaper with Gold Pens than with steel; therefore, it is economy to use Gold Pens.

The Gold Pen remains unchanged by years of continued use, while the Steel Pen is ever changed by corrosion and wear; therefore, perfect uniformity of writing is obtained only by the use of the Gold pens.

The Gold Pen is always ready and reliable, while the steel Pen must be often condemned and a new one selected; therefore there is great saving of time in the use of the Gold Pen.

Gold is capable of receiving any degree of elasticity, so that the Gold Pen is exactly adapted to the hand of the writer; therefore, the nerves of the hand and the arm are not injured, as is known to be the case by the use of Steel Pens.

He is now selling Gold Pens at prices varying from 25 cents to $1, according to size, the average wear of every one of which will far outlast a gross of the best Steel Pens.

Sold by all dealers in the line throughout the country. Wholesale and retail at the store No. 25 Maiden Lane, where all orders, enclosing cash or post-stamps, will receive prompt attention, and a Pen or Pens corresponding in value, and selected according to description, will immediately be sent by mail or otherwise, as directed.

THY NAME THE MAGIC SPELL.

BY MRS NORTON TO HER HUSBAND AFTER HE HAD BITTERLY DIVORCED HER

Thy name was once the magic spell
By which my heart was bound,
And burning dreams of light and love
Were waken'd by that sound.
My heart beat quick when stranger tongues,
With idle praise or blame,
Awoke its deepest thrill of life
To tremble at thy name

Long years, long years have passed away,
And altered looks have been,
And we whom we so fondly once
Must meet as strangers now.
The friends of yore cause round me still
But talk no more of thee;
'Tis idle e'en to wish it now,
For what art thou to me?

Yet still thy name, thy blessed name,
My lonely bosom fills,
Like an echo that hath lost itself
Among the distant hills,
Which still, with melancholy note,
Keeps faintly lingering on,
When the joyous sound that woke it first
Is gone, forever gone.

CLEANING THE LIPS.

No feature on the face of a child is lovelier than the lips, with rows of pearly teeth playing hide-and-seek behind them. But, ah! sometimes mouths which look like rosebuds send forth words unfit for a mother's ear, unfit for the ear of heaven. Some boys, who would not dare to take God's name in vain, say what is coarse and impure, forgetting that this, also, is a sin.

We know a dear old lady who, many years ago, taught a little private school in a certain town. Her heart was pure, and therefore her words were sweet. She loved the blessed Saviour, and cared most tenderly for the lambs of his fold. She seemed to live in the little children's world, rejoicing and suffering with them. She had always something pleasant to say, and a flower or kiss to give, so that the scholars loved the school-house next best to "mother's room" at home.

They never had to be sent to school, but ran off cheerfully before nine o'clock, that they might speak to her before the little bell rang. She believed what Solomon said about the "rod of correction;" but in some way she got along without using it very often. Once her heart was deeply wounded by hearing that a little fellow had spoken impure words while out at play. When forced to punish very little ones, she used to take them to her lap; but, as Master Charlie was nine years old, she called him to stand before her. Taking both his hands between her own, and looking into his blue eyes, she asked:

"Have you been using wicked words to-day, my dear?"

"I didn't swear," whimpered Charlie.

"Are you willing to go home and repeat all you said in your mother's presence?"

Charlie hung his head, and colored deeply, and whispered—

"No, ma'am, because it would grieve her."

"And have you forgotten, my dear boy, that One who is far holier than she has heard in heaven those naughty words which came from those lips to-day? I am afraid there is something unclean in your heart; but as I cannot reach that myself I will ask God to do it. I can reach your lips, and as I am sure they are not fit to give your mother the good-night kiss, nor to say your prayers, I will clean them for you."

She then took from her desk a bowl of water, a tiny bit of soap, and a small sponge, and bidding Charlie open his mouth, she washed it well—teeth, tongue, lips, and all! She then wiped them dry with a soft napkin and bathed his tear-stained face, on which she pressed the tear of forgiveness. This simple punishment, and the real sorrow of her who inflicted it, made a deep impression on the minds of her scholars. Charlie is now almost a man, but never since that day has an impure word escaped his lips. At the very thought of such a word he fancies he tastes soap, and that he hears again the gentle rebuke of his first teacher.

THE THIRTY DOLLARS.

BY MARY J. CROSSMAN.

"There are thirty dollars," said my husband, the other day, throwing a small roll of bills into my lap, and after making several circles around the room with the baby on his shoulder, he put on his cap and fare deliberately to go back to his office. He heard was on the door-knob.

"Please tell me, Harry, what I'm to do with the money," I said, which I am aware was a very unwomanly request.

"Use it for benevolent purposes, or get you a new silk, as you like." The door had closed, when Harry put back his face and repeated, "It is more blessed to give than to receive," for he knew that I had a decided fondness for silk dresses.

The baby soon dropped asleep, and I went into the kitchen to increase my acquaintance with Bridget McFarland, who the afternoon before, had been inducted into my service with suitable ceremonies and the "best of references."

"It's not very say work this, mum—making such wet, wathery wood into fire," said she, her face heated to a blaze from exertion and anger Going to the wood room I told her which fuel was wet, which was dry, and suggested that the fires be made of the latter and replenished with the former, and then returned to my own thoughts and the baby's merino which I was embroidering.

The day before I had been out on a shopping excursion, and all I could do the patterns of new silks, some fair and fanciful, others rich and varied, or plain and enduring, kept flitting before me as I remembered the bills in my pocket, and the fashionable wedding that was to come off in brother James' family in four weeks.

And then I thought of the toiling, starving, suffering poor; of cold, bare rooms, of dark, dingy alleys, almost within shadow of the palace homes of the rich. I heard the plaintive cry of children for food, of the sick and dying for a little comfort, of the weary for rest, even the rest of the grave. The great mass were unmoved by the pale faces and pitiful voices of the wronged:

"Alas for the rarity
Of Christian charity
Under the sun."

"What color is the new dress to be?" asked Harry, when he came in to dinner; "I suppose the sleeve pattern, style of trimming, and all the et ceteras, are determined, and the dress-maker spoken to by this time."

It's true all those points had passed through my mind and been decided upon, but I wasn't foolish enough to tell him though.

"Come, dinner is ready and waiting," said I, shutting not to notice his question.

"Let's see, where is the organ of benevolence," said Harry, laughingly, as he placed his hand on a particularly flat portion of my head.

During dinner we talked of passing and prospective events; the first including the coffee and pudding upon our table which was evidently passing as well as a band of musicians upon the street and the last was the wedding and dress before hinted at.

"Been down street yet?" were Harry's first words as he entered the sitting-room and took up the baby from the crib.

"I'll tell you in a week," said I, "how that money is disposed of."

"Let patience have her perfect work," was the reply.

Harry did not forget when the week expired—"Bring on your dress," said he, "I've a woman's curiosity on the subject."

I brought from the closet the article in question. He looked it over carefully, and then pronounced it a fine, tasty article.

"A brown silk flounced and trimmed with blue—I know it will become you; you always looked so well in your old brown."

"But don't you see, Harry, this is my old brown dress repaired and newly trimmed! and isn't it a beauty? Now you sit down and listen," said I, turning the dress and hanging it in the closet. "You see how five dollars of my money was expended, with two other fives I bought two nice blanket shawls for sister Wright and sister Wilkins—they had nothing to wear around them to church but some old faded cotton ones which were both unsightly and uncomfortable, and I gave Jack Horton four dollars to pay his tuition for the coming term—the last three months he has loaned his expenses by making fires, but as that privilege alternates among poor students, he was going to seek a cheaper and poorer school. His teacher assured me he was doing remarkably well in his studies, and stood high in the department. I bought four dollars' worth of clothes for the widow Jones and her little girl—three dollars' worth of provisions for the sick woman on Wall Street—three cords of wood for my washerwoman and five pairs of calf-skin shoes for as many little charity scholars at the mission school. You told me if was more blessed to give than to receive,' and I have found the words verified; rich and beautiful flowers, rare as if born under tropical suns, have adorned my pathway, even though it led me into the abodes of misery and want. Many thanks, Harry, for the money, and may God help me in the future yet many times to go and do likewise."

JAMIE'S STRUGGLE.

BY LYNDE PALMER.

"Where's Jamie?" asked Madge, timidly, coming into the room, cheery with its pretty crimson coal-fire, and bright, yellow jets of gas light.

Her cousin looked up coldly at the question, Uncle Gould frowned ominously over his paper, and Aunt Gould just said, very drily—"In his room."

Madge looked uneasily from one to the other, but no single pair of eyes turned upon her with sympathy or explanation, and after a few moments of irresolution, she laid down her school-books, and stole from the room. In the hall she met the house-maid.

"Oh! Betty, please tell me, has anything happened? and why didn't Jamie come to school this afternoon?"

Betty shook her head. "Well, Miss, I don't like to grieve you, but your brother has done a shocking thing, and if he was a poor boy now, I suppose he'd be looking through iron bars to-night in the county jail."

"Oh, Betty, what do you mean!" said Madge, turning quite pale.

"Well, Miss," said Betty, sinking her voice to a whisper, "you'd have to know it some time, I suppose, and the best is he's just been stealin' money out of master's drawer!—a hundred dollars, more or less!"

"It isn't so!" cried Madge, in a loud, sharp tone, which almost startled herself. "What! Jamie steal! It's a wicked lie!" and she burst into tears.

"Very well," said the offended Betty, "you'll soon find whether I tell a lie or no. I believe he's none too good to be a thief, nor you either, with your mincing, saint ways."

But Madge was out of hearing—two steps at a time up the broad stairs, till she reached a little room at the farther end of the third story corridor. She burst in without ceremony, but all was still in the cold winter twilight, except the dismal dashing of sleet against the window panes. "Jamie?" she called, anxiously.

At first there was no reply, and then a little movement behind the dingy brown curtain betrayed him, and Madge was at his side, with her arms flung around his neck.

"I knew you had heard it all the minute you called me," faltered Jamie, trying to smile. "I heard the 'tears in your voice,' you know; but you don't believe it?"

"Never!" cried, Madge, vehemently. "Now tell me all about it. How could any one dare to say so?"

"I hardly know where to begin," said Jamie, with a great effort at self-control. "I'll have to tell you something I've been keeping secret ever since last summer. You see when cousin Bell had her birth-day party last June, and all the girls swept around in such pretty shining silks, or clear dresses half clouds and half cobwebs, and you only had that pink calico—it hurt me—I don't know why. You looked just as sweet as any—the prettiest of all, I thought; but when Fisher Knight said, 'Just look at my sister! Isn't she pretty, and doesn't her dress look as if she'd bought three or four yards of sunset, and had the moon up all night sewing stars on it?' Then the boys laughed, and I said—'And isn't my sister pretty too?' for you did look sweet as a rose, I thought; but that proud Fisher Knight laughed just like a knife—I mean it seemed to cut right into me, and he said—' Oh yes, and how kind Betty was to lend her that dress.' Some of the boys said—'Too bad!' but that only hurt me more, and I crept away pretty soon, and lay behind the thick snow-ball bushes, and looked up into the great, still sky, and wondered why God couldn't have taken you and me too, when mother and father died, and not left us to come to this proud, rich uncle, who does not love us, and who treats us like little beggars."

"Oh don't say so, Jamie,' said Madge, sadly; "I'm sure he's been very kind to us some times."

"I don't remember many times just now," sighed Jamie. "Well, a little while after that I heard Lutie say that her birthday came in the winter, and she meant to have a grand time, and invite every boy and girl she had ever seen. Then I thought to myself—'Now they will want to dress Madge in some ugly brown merino, but I am determined she shall look the prettiest of them all.'" So I began to work after school, doing all kinds of little jobs for anybody who would hire me, and I never spent anything for candy or marbles, you know, so that all the boys began to call me 'miser.' But I didn't mind that, because I thought my pleasure was coming by and by. The money came very slowly, Madge, and often I thought I'd never have enough. But when Aunt gave me money to buy mittens, I just went without and kept my hands in my pockets. Then I got considerable Christmas, you know, and I sold the top that Lutie gave me, and altogether, yesterday I found I had just enough to buy what I wanted. So Mr. Green, who is always so kind to me, excused me from my lessons this morning, and I walked all the way to B——, because I thought I could get nicer things there, and Madge, I bought you the sweetest green silk! it made you think of the woods in spring, and I thought when you had it on, with your sweet, white face, you would look just like a lily coming up out a bed of moss"

"Dear little Jamie!" cried Madge; "did you do all that for me? I'm so sorry. You know I never care what I wear."

"Yes, I know it," said Jamie, "and you're always lovely to me, I suppose it is because, as Mr. Green says, you always wear the jewels which are of great price in the sight of God. I hav'n't a doubt, Madge, but the angels think you are the prettiest girl in the world, but some way, I know it's foolish,—I wanted to have the boys think so too.

"Well, when I came back, just as I got to the hall door with my bundle, feeling so proud that I had earned it all myself, out came Uncle, looking very red, and storming about some money—about twenty dollars, I think—that he said he had left in his desk, and forgot to lock up last night. Nobody knew anything about it, and I was just going on tip-toes up to my room, when he called very suddenly: 'What have you got in that bundle, sir?' 'A dress for Madge.' 'A dress for Madge?' said he, louder yet, 'let me see it;' So I opened it, trying to tell him that I earned the money all myself; but as soon as he saw the pretty silk he caught hold of my arm so I almost screamed, and said, "You earned money to buy such a dress as that? You are telling me a falsehood! Confess now that you took my money.' Then out came Aunt Gould, and Bell, and Lutie, and they held up their hands, and looked so shocked, and wouldn't believe one word I said Then Uncle seemed to try to be kind, and told me that if I confessed, and asked his pardon, he would try to forgive me. But I could not tell a lie, and only said, over and over, that I didn't, couldn't do such a thing, till he called me a hardened, obstinate boy, and ordered me up to my room. And as for the dress, Madge, that I've been thinking about for more than six months," Jamie coughed violently, "I heard Aunt Gould say, 'It wouldn't be quite a loss, for with a yard or two more it would make a dress for Lutie.'"

Madge tried to comfort him, but broke down.

"Never mind," said he, at last, patting her tear-stained cheek. "I am determined you shall have something nice after all. To morrow is the skating match, you know, and I think I'm sure of the second prize at least, and whatever I get shall be given to darling Madge."

"You will be sure to get it," cried Madge, with eager sympathy. "You've skated ever since you could walk," and she remembered with a glow of pride that no one had ever yet caught Jamie in a race, and often when you thought him only playing, he'd be writing his name, with his rather clumsy steel pen, on the great white page of ice, as handsomely as on a leaf of his writing book.

"Yes, you'll be sure of the prize, Jamie," she said, exultingly, "and I know it—will all come right with Uncle too. I'm going to tell him all about it now."

But to her great grief, angry Uncle Gould would not hear a word. "No, child," he said, "no one could make me believe that a boy would go without marbles and candies half a year to buy his sister a dress. And if he did, he never could have saved enough for such a handsome silk. Besides, what settles the matter, Betty saw him in the library at my desk very early this morning, before any one was up. It seems a very clear case, though it grieves me to say so."

The next morning, as after a sleepless night, Jamie stole down stairs with his skates his Uncle met him in the hall.

"You cannot skate to-day," James, said he, almost kindly, as he looked at the boy's flushed, worn face. "I feel it but right that you should have some punishment for such a great fault."

"But I did not do it, sir," said Jamie, imploringly.

Uncle Gould grew quite stern. "Remember that Betty saw you, my child. Either confess or go back to your room"

"Yes, Jamie," said Aunt Gould, appearing from the parlor, "you love Madge dearly, and no doubt the temptation was very great. We have been talking it over, and we wish to be as kind as your own father or mother. Confess your fault, and, as it is the first time, we are all ready to forgive you, and trust you once more. And indeed, since it would make you so very happy, I will even promise to give the dress to Madge."

"Don't be a prig, Jim," whispered Lutie; "just say you did it, and have it done with."

What a terrible struggle went on in poor Jamie's breast. If he told a lie there was love and forgiveness—the skating prize and the pretty dress, if he told the truth, nothing but coldness and contempt, and solitude in his dreary room. What a struggle! The hot passions raged and the terrible fire burned through his cheeks and eyes. He hesitated. Ah! is he going to love the praise of man more than the praise of God? A moment more of silence, and he says firmly—

"I did not do it, Uncle. I cannot tell a lie."

Poor Jamie spent the day in his room, attended by Madge, his faithful shadow. They heard Belle and Lutie going away merrily with their skates, but, strange to say, they did not feel so very miserable, and even smiled as their eyes met.

"Isn't it queer I can be so happy?" said Jamie. "If it wasn't for this headache I should feel light as a feather."

"Do you remember that strange verse that mother used to say?" asked Madge. "'Behold we count them happy which endure.' I believe I understand it better now, Jamie; and what is the rest of it—'ye have seen the end of the Lord, that the Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy.' I am so glad you endured it all, Jamie, and who knows what the end will be? I am quite certain it will all come right at last."

Jamie tried to smile hopefully, and whenever a vivid remembrance of his heavy disappointments came over him, he repeated softly to himself—"Very pitiful, and of tender mercy."

It is a week after, and the night of Lutie's birthday. Madge—can it be possible?—is standing by the piano in that identical green silk, though with that happy flush on her cheeks, she looks more like a moss rose than a lily. And Jamie—was there ever such a radiant face? What can have happened? But here is Madge, eager to tell you all; how "Aunt Gould found the missing roll of bills caught behind the little drawer, and how proud Uncle Gould had actually asked Jamie's pardon, and since had treated him almost as respectfully as if he had been a grown man, and everybody was so kind, and she (Madge) was so proud! Oh! she couldn't begin to tell all she felt!

But who can express Jamie's happiness?—happiness not only that again he is respected and loved—that Madge is acknowledged sweeter than any other boy's sister—that Uncle Gould has already shaken hands with him twice that very evening—but there is a deeper joy—the sweet peace—the consciousness of victory over great temptation. And this it is which makes Madge turn from the merry, sparkling foam to the sweeter light in Jamie's great earnest eyes, and whisper softly—"Behold we count them happy which endure."

THE LITTLE TEACHER.

The next day was bright and sunny, and many a feathered songster lent his sweet carol to make the scene more enchanting without. The girls early sought their brother, and begged him to come immediately into their beautiful garden, among the flowers, and tell them about heaven.

"Yes," exclaimed he, "that is just the very place for us to go, right among God's gifts to us, and with those very gifts praising, and ascribing honor and love to Him. Perhaps we may there also partake of the same enthusiasm, and through nature be led to adore nature's God."

"What do you mean, brother," said Mary, "by saying, 'We go among God's gifts to us, and those gifts praising him?' I do not see what gifts God ever gave us; I'm sure he never gave me either a new dress or a doll."

"Well, Mary," said Joseph, "if I should undertake to tell you half of His gifts to us, it would take me full the allotted time we have given us to-day; and as I intend to tell you, in my poor way, about the beautiful heaven Aunt Lizzie told me of, I will answer your question by saying, that everything we see around us, every breath we draw, and every throb of our pulse, is a gift from Him. Look around you, my little sister, see those exquisitely formed flowers, behold how lovely they are painted! Now, see that fairy-like humming-bird that flits from flower to flower, and yonder come some golden-winged butterflies, to sip with those brown bees the delicate sweets contained in the cells of their corollas; and while they sip, hear the low music of their tiny voices. Now, again, look at those dear little birds above us in the trees! As they flit from bough to bough, they lighten the labor of building their nests and rearing their young by the sweetest strains they can pour forth. And this varied murmur of music is the praises of those creatures to their Maker for his matchless kindness in permitting them to live and enjoy life. Although God does not present your clothes to you ready to make up, if it were not for his means and love to us there would be none to make. Those shoes on your feet are made out of the skin of an animal, which had to go through a process of tanning. Your stockings are made from the cotton plant, which grows in warm climates. Your dress, which is tissue, is half silk and half cotton. The silk is the production of the silk-worm, and God has been the contriver of them all. He has made hundreds and hundreds of animals and plants, and they are all designed for the use and benefit of man."

"But, really, I must begin my subject, or I shall have to give it up to-day also; won't I, little sis?"

"Yes; you may commence in earnest now."

ODDS AND ENDS.

It is better to sleep with an empty stomach than to lie awake with an accusing conscience.

Even a pig upon the spit may console himself; things will take a turn.

Lord Thurlow said, "I divide my work into three parts; part I do, part does itself, and part I leave undone."

Generally speaking, it is not wise to be eccentric. People are usually eccentric about little things not worth fighting about.

DEFINITION OF A CANDLE.—One whose fate is to die of consumption, but who constantly makes light of his misfortune.

"Ma, if you give me an apple, I will be good." "No, my child, you must not be good for pay—you ought to be good for nothing."

Macaulay said that prize essays were very much akin to prize sheep, the latter being only fit to make candles, and the former to light them.

During the last three months the London Critic has counted up eighteen deaths of females clearly attributed to the fashion of wearing crinoline.

The number of performers, vocal and instrumental, for the inauguration music at the opening of the Exhibition, will, it is said, be 1,800.

I put outside my window a large box, filled it with mould, and sowed it with seed. What do you think came up? Wheat, barley or oats? No, a policeman, who ordered me to remove it.

The goods from Prince Edward's Island and Newfoundland have arrived for the Great Exhibition. Amongst the produce of the former is a pole 240 feet long—the longest ever seen. A party of riggers are sent over to hoist it.

A LION IN LOVE.

In one compartment of the cage in which the animals perform at Van Amburgh's beautiful menagerie, is a huge, tawny Asiatic lion. His room-mate is a black female tiger. This tigress is small compared to the regal lion, but is highly valued as a zoological curiosity, and the only specimen of the black tiger in this country. She was purchased by Mr. Van Amburgh two years ago, and has lived with the lion ever since. The attachment between the two is remarkable. When other animals are in the same cage, and any affront is offered to the little tigress, she runs under the lion, and woe be to the animal that dares approach her. No matter how hungry he may be, the lion never touches his share of their daily meal until his little chum has selected her share, and even this he never entirely consumes until certain that she has enough.

All the animals are as fat as moles; but this black tigress is aldermanic in her proportions, and no remedy exists for the matter. She has been twice removed from the lion; but, until she has returned, the generous beast would take neither food nor rest, while the frantic manner in which he dashed at the bars was a sufficient warning that the further detention of the tigress would be a dangerous matter. Should his mate die, the lion would probably pine to death. Once when she was taken away a lioness was substituted. The lion instantly fell upon her, and, at a single bite, broke her spine and crushed some of her ribs. Careful nursing saved her life, and she is still living, but with her hinder parts immovably paralyzed.

THE TANGLED YARN.

A woman had put a hank of yarn upon a reel, intending to wind it into a ball; but as the thread would not run as she wished, she lost patience, and pulled it to and fro. This, however, only made the evil worse, for it multiplied the ends until she no longer knew which to draw. Gotthold looked on in silence, but thought with himself: I now see how it happens that interference of third parties only complicates quarrels. The reason is, because they bring to them more of needless anger and zeal than of judicious moderation and skill. Many a matter might easily be settled if we only knew the right end by which to take hold of whimsical and wilful minds. Worldly disputes are almost all like this yarn; whosoever ventures to meddle with them, except with a meek and sober heart, will do no good. It is folly for any man to expect that all things shall or can be made square with his views. He acts a wiser part who tries to accommodate himself to seasons and circumstances, so far as he can with a safe conscience. Many a one complains of the tangled yarns and whimsical characters with which he has to do, without being conscious that his own hat covers as much oddity, and that that gives other people no less occasion to complain of him.

In my vocation I must daily expect to meet with tangled yarns. Give me, my God, a meek and prudent heart, that I may always find the right end to draw!—Gotthold's Emblems.

On a tombstone in a churchyard in Ulster, England, is the following epitaph:—"Erected to the memory of John Phillips, accidentally shot as a mark of affection by his brother."

THE GRAVE ON THE HILL

Deep in a silent wilderness,
Under the Southern sky,
Far distant from his native isle,
A white man's ashes lie.

A broken, rough-hewn tombstone, marks
The grave—dug long ago,
In shadow of a mighty rock—
On a broad hill, and low.

The grass is short, and scorched, and brown,
On that forsaken tomb;
And there no blossoms ever spring,
To grace it with their bloom.

The daisy from far England's soil
The primrose, pale and sweet;
The violet, dearest gem of all—
None such the eye may greet.

These are for grassy churchyard mounds,
Where Love's wild tears are shed;
And Love's eyes watch, and Love's hands tend
The dwelling of the dead.

Only the thin, parched, summer grass,
And dark-green thistles wave,
Where lies beneath the hill-side rock,
The exile's lonely grave;

For, when Death's awful presence cast
A sacred terror here,
Love's hand, and eye, and heart, were far
From the rude, heaty bier.

And since the storms of thirty years
Have swept about the spot;
The sun has glowed, the chill rain poured,
But Love has known it not.

And yet, it may be far away
Still beats some faithful heart,
For which that wild neglected grave
Holds life's most sacred part.

Love that has never failed nor died,
Unspent, may linger still
In some true breast—and all for him
Whose grave is on the hill.

INSECT MUSIC.—All that we read is not gospel. Buffon, Goldsmith and others tell us that flying insects like mosquitos, locusts, and so on, make the humming noise they do by beating the air with their wings. It's all a mistake. They sing just like ourselves, only their vocal organs are depainted not in their throats, but along the sides of their bodies. They use (as the microscope assures us) a wind pipe, the outlet of which is furnished with a vibrating valve like that employed on the accordion, but there is man has only one of these arrangements, while most insects have at least a dozen, and through each of the dozen as they fly, the air is made to rush with prodigious effect, and some degree of melody

C. F. Holzer's Improved Original Gas Saving Regulator.

C. WILSON FOSS AND WM. D. REICHNER, PATENTEES, MANUFACTURERS, AND PROPRIETORS.

No. 104 N. Tenth St., above Arch, Philadelphia.

This superior Regulator and Economizer of gas is so simple and practically effective in its operation that it at once commends itself to the hearty approval of many scientific and practical gentlemen of this city and elsewhere. The great advantageous of this invention over all others is that its operative principle, a conical spring which accommodates itself to the slowest pressure, being connected with a steam valve, it is fully protected from the corrosive and injurious effects of the gas and therefore is not liable to get out of order—its working is ever perfect, securing to the consumer a saving of gas, from 20 to 30 per cent. with a clearer, more pleasant and steady light, free from all blowing. Saving no other irregularity to the flame, affording a soft, mellow light, far less hurtful, and more desirable to the sight.

SEWING MACHINES.

SEWING & GIBBS WILCOX & MACHINES.

Price with Hemmer and Feller, $35 00.

THIS MACHINE HAS POINTS OF SUPERIORITY PECULIARLY ITS OWN.

Stitching, Hemming, and Felling with a Single Thread.

It forms a flat, even, and elastic seam which is warranted not to rip in wear, strong in the seam itself, neat in texture, and also under all circumstances "to survive the wash-tub"

A patented device of great utility in hemmers, prevents the possibility of the machine being run in the wrong direction, or the hemming wheel wearing a lady's dress

Another feature which deserves particular attention is the Two Thread Patent Needle cannot be set wrong.

Two thousand stitches or two yards of work, can be done in one minute without dropping a stitch

These Machines are simple and accurate in their construction, supersede the use of the shuttle, and with one thread produce all the practical results of the two thread machines, and more, for these belt with the seams, and how the finest muslin or the heaviest cloth.

Although at about half the price of the other first class machines they will accomplish double the sewing in a given time

"It is emphatically the good, low priced Family Sewing Machine that the public have long been waiting for."—Boston Transcript

"It is indeed a wonderful production, and for family use especially no other will bear any comparison with it."—Philadelphia Evening Journal.

"A mechanical wonder."—Scientific American

Boston, July 3, 1855.

The undersigned, during eighteen months, has had in almost constant use, in his family, a Wilcox & Gibbs Sewing Machine, upon which has been made the clothes of his large family—from muslin to pilot cloth—including the clothing required by his several boys and to me gave the crown to their ambition in hard service. The machine now in use is the same originally purchased, and is, in all respects, well appointed still best and durable.

FAME.

What shall I render to my God
For all his gifts to me?
Sing heaven and earth, rejoice and praise
His glorious majesty.

In Thee I live, and move, and am;
Thou deal'st me out my days;
As thou renew'st my being, Lord,
Let me renew thy praise.

Of Thee I am, through Thee I am,
And for Thee I must be;
'Twere better for me not to live,
Than not to live to Thee.

My God, thou art my glorious Sun,
By whose bright beams I shine:
As thou, Lord, ever art with me,
Let me be ever thine.

Thou art my living Fountain, Lord,
Whose streams on me do flow:
Myself I render unto Thee,
To whom myself I owe.

As thou, Lord, an immortal soul
Hast breathed into me;
So let my soul be breathing forth,
Immortal thanks to Thee.

JOHN MASON, ET. 1694.

THE ANCHOR WITHIN THE VEIL.

Amid the shadows and the fears
That overcloud this home of tears,
Amid my poverty and sin,
The tempest and the war within,
I cast my soul on thee.
Mighty to save even me,
Jesus, thou Son of God!

Drifting across a careless sea,
Cold, heavy mist encumbering me;
Toiling along life's broken road,
With snares around and foes abroad,
I cast my soul on thee,
Mighty to save even me,
Jesus, thou Son of God!

Mine is a day of fear and strife,
A needy soul, a needy life,
A needy world, a needy age,
Yet, in my perilous pilgrimage,
I cast my soul on thee,
Mighty to save even me,
Jesus, thou Son of God!

To thee I come—oh! only thou
Canst wipe the sweat from off this brow;
Thou, only thou canst make me whole,
And sooth the fever of my soul;
I cast my soul on thee,
Mighty to save even me,
Jesus, thou Son of God!

On thee I rest—thy love and grace
Are my sole rock and resting-place;
In thee my thirst and hunger sure,
Lord, but me quench forevermore.
I cast my soul on thee,
Mighty to save even me,
Jesus, thou Son of God!

'Tis earth, not heaven; 'tis night, not noon;
The sorrowless is coming soon;
But till the morn of love appears,
Which ends the travail and the tears,
I cast my soul on thee,
Mighty to save even me,
Jesus, thou Son of God!

THE NATURE OF FAITH.

BY DR. J. W. ALEXANDER.

Many fogs and mists have been gathered around these familiar operations of all human minds, by the ingenious speculations of philosophic theology. Angry controversies have often been maintained during generations, about the definition of terms which express states or acts of which we are hourly and directly conscious. Simple phenomena have thus been made complicated, and humble souls have not seldom been perplexed. If faith, about which we are now speaking, were so inscrutable, undistinguishable, and complex a product of our nativity, as many suppose, we might have expected numerous and most guarded definitions of it in the Scriptures. As faith is the instrument of salvation, we might expect that no doubtful as not of the soul would be set forth by numerous distinctive tests. If the faith of true experience is so utterly diverse from all the believings of mankind about all other things, we might confidently look for certain marks of difference. On the contrary, often as believing, belief, and faith, are mentioned in the Scriptures, they are always introduced as if with a presumption that the words are to be taken in their ordinary sense. This gives us much reason to conclude that evangelical faith is a simpler thing, and more familiar to us every day, than theologians sometimes teach. The fear of such theologians is, lest faith shall be made so easy, and so little diverse from common natural acts of men, that careless and unconverted sinners will flatter themselves that they have faith when they have none. They therefore interpose numberless cautions, to prevent mistake as to faith. They sedulously distinguish various kinds of faith. They refer faith to various so called faculties or powers of the soul; the nomenclature of which faculties varies with every system. They dissect the act of faith into several parts, nicely following one another, and of which no one must be wanting, or the faith is spurious. And they succeed in hopelessly confounding some, and landing others on the unscriptural conclusion that faith is something different from believing, or accepting truth as true.

One singular consequence of such refinements is this: As I should be sure of my being safe if I were sure I believed, the most interesting of all questions is, Do I believe? But if faith is so recondite and difficult of discovery, then the very question which is to decide the other, is the hardest of all. And multitudes puzzle and distract themselves with unavailing and unanswerable inquiries as to the sorts of faith, and which sort is theirs; as to the ingredients of faith, and which ingredient is wanting, a species of mental anatomy of which we find no example in holy Scripture.

That unreconciled and irreligious persons have no faith in divine truths which concern their own state and the objects of evangelical Christianity, is sufficiently plain from their lives. It must, however, be our present task to make evident the very obvious and simple notion which the Scripture gives of Faith. The word is perpetually and in the most childlike manner introduced, as just meaning persuasion of the truth. When a statement is true to us, when I see it, not merely as intelligible, but as true, then I have faith. In other words, I believe it. Faith is belief: belief is faith; both import accepting that which is presented as true. Truth and Faith are therefore correlative terms.

The objects of faith are vastly different; and this gives origin to innumerable varieties of believing. That is, the mind believes itself differently in view of one truth believed, and of another truth believed, yet the mind's position is the same. My hand may grasp an empty nutshell or the great diamond, but the act of grasping is the same. My believing thoughts may light on the truth that the thermometer is at 60°, or that the day of judgment has arrived. How vastly different the contingent phenomena! Yet the belief, as belief, is one and the same. This may account for the hurtful error of those who have suffused the colors which come from the object over the eye that beholds it, and thus have made us many faiths as there are orders of things believed. In every possible instance, when I have faith, I hold something to be true. The immediate consequences may vary. The same proposition believed, may carry very different emotions to different hearts. Tell one man that the post has arrived, and he is indifferent; but his next neighbor rejoices—it brings news of his long absent son; a third is speechless with horror, for it comes with tidings of his ruin. The proposition believed being the same, two men may believe it with different intensity, for faith has degrees. But still the simple essential act of faith is one with which we are perfectly familiar, and of which we are conscious every hour. Let us see this for ourselves in Scripture. "Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed," John xx. 29. Here the truth accepted is, that the person before Thomas is the very Jesus who was crucified. A train of other believings followed this. God says to Abraham, "Thy seed shall be as the stars in yonder heavens." "And he believed in the Lord; and he counted it to him for righteousness." Gen. xv. 6. "If ye believe not that I am he, [said Jesus] ye shall die in your sins." Here the truth to be accepted is, that Jesus is the Messiah, the fundamental fact of Christianity. So 1 John v. 1, "Whoso believeth that Jesus is the Messiah, is of God." In none of these cases is there any room for the person so believing to go back into his mental operations, to examine the nature of his believing acts. A truth is presented as an object of faith, and he is persuaded of this truth, it is certain to his apprehension. He believes, and knows that he believes. Or rather, he knows what he believes; for the importance of the object entirely takes away his mind from the act of believing.

But there is a variation of the phrase in such New Testament passages as speak of believing on Jesus Christ. These are numerous. In them all, a Person is the object of the believing; and in a particular aspect and relation. We believe on Christ, when we are persuaded that he is such as he claims to be, and such as the Scriptures present and offer him. We apprehend him, and recognise him as the Saviour of sinners, and as able and willing to save us. He who is thus persuaded concerning the Lord, need not vex himself as to the metaphysical character of his mental acts. The more he believes, the less is he likely to ask what is believing. Faith is a kind of inward seeing. He who sees a beautiful countenance, does not much pause to inquire into the process of vision. That countenance fills his eye. In like manner, he who believes on Jesus as his Redeemer, is taken up with that countenance of love. The object of faith occupies the field of vision. For the Jew, reflex acts, such as, "Is this the right sort of faith?" are impossible; for the mind cannot look inward and outward at the same instant. And no man's salvation depends on his believing that he believes. At Cana, the disciples "believed on him." The Jews who saw Lazarus raised by Jesus, "believed on him." "He that believeth on the Son of God, has the witness in himself."

Nothing is harder than to describe in words the simplest acts of the soul. Suppose one had never loved, how would you choose words to convey the notion? Yet you love, and know that you love. We may try manifold phrases. Faith is the whole soul according and assenting to the truth, and embracing it. Faith is admitting and receiving the revelation. Faith is apprehending the true as true, the beautiful as beautiful, the good as good. Faith in Christ is persuasion that Christ is a Saviour. The soul receives and rests upon him alone for salvation as offered in the Gospel. It is not a process, divisible into parts and stages; but an outgoing of the whole soul, to the object, at one time, and, so to speak, by one outlet. It is not wisely determined by some to be an intellectual act solely; because the simplicity of the believing subject is affirmed as much by true philosophy as by Scripture. When Jesus Christ, dying in love for sinners, and radiant with Gospel grace, is full before the soul, so as to appear somewhat as he is, an Almighty and infinitely willing Redeemer, true to his word, then the sinner believes, receives him, has power to be a child of God; though, at the moment, nothing is further from his thoughts than any analysis of this believing. After all, nothing but experience can fully explain what faith is. Believe and Know.

In comparing faith with knowledge, we touch a question which has agitated all the schools from Alexandria downwards. Assurance of truth, certitude, is the same, by whatever process it may be arrived at. But, in some cases, it comes by intuition, in some cases by reasoning, and in some cases by reliance on testimony. This last is more properly faith, and this shows how faith is connected with persons. We may regard this explanation as two fold: (1) I believe the testimony of him who is true. I believe the testimony of God, who is infinitely true. A child is assured that the angle in a semi-circle is a right angle, or that the surface of a sphere is equal to the convex surface of a surrounding cylinder, because his father tells him so. This is faith in its strictest sense. The child becomes a man, and is assured of the same geometrical propositions by irrefragable process of demonstration; this is knowledge by proof, though we sense even this assurance belief, in common parlance. The child, from being a man on earth, becomes a higher intelligence in heaven, and sees the same relations of lines and surfaces, by insight; this is intuition. The things are so and so in Eternal Reason. God sees all things thus, and hence we never speak of God as believing, or as reasoning. In his own infinite Truth he eternally, and with open face, beholds all truths. We are inquiring into the mode of arriving at assured certainty of truth. Most of our certainty, even in common life, is from testimony. Not five in this house have ever seen the Great Desert. Not one in ten has ever seen the Southern Cross. Few of us have ever seen the planet Mercury. None of us have ever seen the planet Neptune. As to those certainties, we believe the testimony of trustworthy persons, even where sight and demonstration are possible. Such, I say, is the case in a great number of common things. But this is, in the first instance, the only way in which we can acquire certain assurance of what transcends human intuition and experience, such as Creation, Redemption, Future Glory. And as none but God, or, what is the same thing, God's messenger, can command our credence on such heads, we come to our persuasion of these truths by simple faith in him who is credible. Faith, receiving such testimony, admits God as true. Faith, receiving such testimony, admits the Lord Jesus Christ as true. Jesus Christ is pre-eminently the Word, the Revealer, the "True Witness." We accredit him as such. Observe, here, how much faith has a personal character. You believe one thing, because a man has proved it to you; this man you may despise and hate, as a liar and a blasphemer. You believe another thing, because your beloved, honored, pure, trustworthy friend has witnessed it. Mark the difference. Here in faith. You believe on him, as well as what he utters. (2.) But we may proceed a step farther. Not only do we behold Christ as a true Witness, and so believe in him, in general, but we behold him as commanding certain truths [illegible] and himself, and so believe on HIM in particular. We might believe on Gabriel in the former and minor sense, as did she who was blessed among women; or as the other Marys believed the other angel testifying of Christ. But Christ himself we believe, testifying concerning himself; and this is in the high and peculiar sense to believe on him, and to believe in his name. He comes to us to tell us who he is, and what he hath wrought, and we believe it, and so believe on him. Doubly, therefore, faith becomes a personal matter, and lays hold of a personal Jesus. First, because I rely on his personal truth, and consequently believe his message; and, secondly, because the message which I believe from his blessed lips, concerns his own person.

THE MODERN PULPIT

Henry Ward Beecher has been preaching a sermon on the "Power of the Pulpit," which has the usual mixture of sterling truth, boastful free thinking, and personal whims. The Independent has done a good thing in opening up its fallacies. We give a specimen of the article below.

But some will ask, How then shall the pulpit regain its power? We answer, the pulpit has not lost its power to the extent nor in the way, that Mr Beecher imagines. He says:

"Why, the pulpit is relatively losing ground. You know, as well as I, that the Sabbath day does not draw forth for religious worship the whole population, nor one quarter of it, nor one-tenth of it, nor one twentieth of it. I venture to say that today there are one hundred men out of church in these cities where there is one in it. I cannot speak with exactitude, but my impression is that the churches in New York and Brooklyn will not average more than six or eight hundred sittings each. I think I may say with certainty that they will not average over a thousand each. And I venture to say that not half of these sittings are regularly occupied. It is not because there is a want of learning, nor because there is a want of sincerity among ministers: it is because they are handcuffed and manacled with the idea that on Sunday they must not talk about anything but doctrines and religious truisms. They are afraid to go beyond the opening up of the nature of truth. So they go on preaching about truth, and about truth, and about truth; and men are tired of hearing about truth, and about truth, and about truth."

In our judgment Mr. Beecher is far wrong here, both as to his facts and his theories. There are different kinds and modes of pulpit power. That is a great power that stirs, quickens, instructs a miscellaneous assembly of two thousand hearers gathered from all parts of the land. We rejoice in it wherever it exists, whether in Mr. Beecher or in Mr. Spurgeon. That is quite another kind of pulpit power, that builds up a stable, resident congregation, in the knowledge and the love of truth, and quickens them in Christian activity and liberality year after year; that makes the church the light and guide, the salt and leaven, of a neighborhood or a community. These two may be combined. Viewing church attendance as an evidence of the power of the ministry;—take four churches in New York, as they were two years ago: Dr. Alexander's, Dr. Tyng's, Dr. Adams', and Dr. Spring's, while Dr Hoge was his colleague. At almost every service, each of these churches was wont to be filled to overflowing; nearly every sitting in each house was taken; the church meetings in the week were fully attended; the additions to the churches by conversion were numerous; the charities of the congregations were most bountiful; mission chapels and mission schools were sustained by each of them, and in all labors of Christian love they were abundant. But in neither of these churches did the pulpit depart from the good old way of preaching the doctrines of the Bible, in their application to all the duties and relation of social and secular life. Mr. Beecher, we think, mistakes as to the fact, that the pulpit is losing power; and still more as to the cause which he assigns for this. Men do not tire of hearing about the truths of the Gospel, when clearly and earnestly presented. The human mind delights in argument more than in story or in fancy; and the ablest reasoning upon a topic of vital interest is its strongest attraction. Where power seems to have declined, the churches are largely to blame. The modern way of building church-edifices with an eye to a financial return from pews alone, instead of consecrating them to Christ by free-will contributions, has a tendency to bring ministers under the temptation to preach for audiences rather than for edification. This makes the usefulness of a minister hinge upon pew-letting, which the very cost of the edifice may hinder. What is needed both in churches and in the ministry, is more of the vital power of God's own truth.

HOW A SKYLARK PREACHED A SERMON

Stories, as well as poems, concerning the skylark abound; but one of the best, both for interest and as showing the constant love of Englishmen for this truly English bird, came to my knowledge a few months ago. As you are doubtless aware, there is no such thing as a song-bird natural to Australia; there are birds who chatter, birds who shriek, but no bird that sings. Well, there was a young man who went out from England as a gold-digger, and was lucky enough to make some money, and prudent enough to keep it. He opened a "store" (a kind of rough shop where everything, from candles to coffins, are sold) at a place called "The Ovens," a celebrated gold field, about 200 miles from Melbourne. Still continuing to prosper, he, like a dutiful son, wrote home for his father and mother to come out to him, and, if they possibly could, to bring with them a lark. So a lark was procured, and in due time the old folks and their feathered charge took ship and departed from England. The old man, however, took the voyage so much to heart that he died, but the old woman and the lark landed in sound health at Melbourne, and were speedily forwarded to Mr Wilsted's store at The Ovens.

It was on a Tuesday when they arrived, and the next morning the lark was hung outside the tent, and at once commenced piping up. The effect was electric. Sturdy diggers—big men with hairy faces and great brown hands—paused in the midst of their work, and listened reverently. Drunken, brutal diggers left unfinished the blasphemous sentence, and looked bewildered and ashamed. Far and near the news spread like lightning—"Have you heard the lark?" "Is it true, mate, that there is a real English skylark up at Jack Wilsted's?" So it went on for three days, and then came Sunday morning. Such a sight had not been seen since the first spadeful of the golden earth had been turned! From every quarter—East, West, North, and South, from far off hills, and from creeks twenty miles away, came a steady concourse of great rough Englishmen, all brushed and washed as decent as possible. The movement was by no means preconcerted, as was evident from the half-ashamed expression of every man's face. There they were, however, and their errand was—to hear the lark! Nor were they disappointed. There, perched in his wood and iron pulpit, was the little minister, and, as though aware of the importance of the task before him, he plumed his crest, and, lifting up his voice, sang them a sermon infinitely more effective than the bishop himself could have preached. It was a wonderful sight to see that three or four hundred men, some reclining on the ground, some sitting with their arms on their knees and their heads on their hands, some leaning against the trees with their eyes closed, so that they might the better fancy themselves at home and in the midst of English woods his own music; but sitting, standing, or lying, all were equally quiet and attentive, and when, after an hour's steady preaching, the lark left off, his audience soberly started off, a little less spiritual, perhaps, but on the whole much happier than when they came.—Berton's Home Pets

RALPH ERSKINE, THE FATHER OF THE SCOTTISH SECESSION.

The only amusement in which this celebrated man indulged was playing on the violin. He was so great a proficient on this instrument, and so often beguiled his leisure hours with it, that the people of Dunfermline believed he composed his sermons to its tones, as a poet writes along to a particular air. They also tell the following traditionary anecdote connected with the subject:—"A poor man in one of the neighboring parishes, having a child to baptise, resolved not to employ his own clergyman, with whom he was at issue on certain points of doctrine, but to have the office performed by some minister of whose tenets fame gave a better report. With the child in his arms, therefore, and attended by the full complement of old and young women who usually minister on such occasions, he proceeded to the manse of ——, some miles off, (not that of Mr. Erskine,) where he inquired if the clergyman was at home. 'No; he's no hame the noo,' answered the servant lass; 'he's down the burn fishing; but I can soon cry him in.' 'Ye needna gie yoursel the trouble,' replied the man, quite shocked at this account of the minister's habits; 'cause a' your fishin' ministers shall bapeeses my baire.' Off he then trudged with his whole train, to the residence of another parochial clergyman, at the distance of some miles. Here, on his inquiring if the minister was at home, the lass answered, 'Deed he's no at hame the day, he's been out since sax i' the morning, at the shooting. Ye needna wait, neither; for he'll be see mirk out (fatigued) when he comes back, that he'll no be able to boo to a calf, let-a-be kirsen a wean!' 'Wait, lassie!' cried the man in a tone of indignant scorn; 'and I wait, d'ye think, to hand up my bairn before a minister that gangs out at sax i' the morning, to shoot God's creatures? I'll awa down to good Mr. Erskine, at Dunfarlan', and he'll be nother out fishing nor shooting, I think.' The whole baptismal train then set off for Dunfermline, sure that the father of the secession, although not now a placed minister would at least be engaged in so unclerical sports, to incapacitate him for performing the sacred ordinance in question. On arriving at the manse, which they did not till late in the evening, the man, on rapping at the door, anticipated that he would not be at home, any more than his brethren, as he heard the strains of a fiddle proceeding from the upper chamber. 'The minister will no be at hame,' he said with a sly smile, to the girl who came to the door, 'or your lad (sweetheart) wadna be playing that gate t'pe on the fiddle.' 'The minister is at hame,' quoth the girl, 'mair be token it's himself that's playing, honest man, he aye takes a tune at night, before gangin' to bed.' 'Deed, there's nae lad o' mine can play that gate; it would be something to tell, if ony o' them could.' 'That the minister playing!' cried the man, in a degree of astonishment and horror far transcending what he had expressed on either of the former occasions. 'If, he does this, what may the rest no do? Weel, I fairly gie them them up a'thegither. I have travelled this hail day in search o' a godly minister, and never mae met wi' mair disappointments in a day's journey. I'll tell you what, gude wife,' he added, turning to the disconsolate party behind, 'we'll awa back to our ain minister after a'! He's no a'thegither sound, it's true; but let him be what he likes in doctrine, deil hae me if I ever heaned him fish, shoot, or play on the fiddle, a' his days.'"

SOME EARLIER AND LATER LAWS AND ORDINANCES RELATING TO THE SABBATH.

The chief value of these laws and ordinances lies in their showing what was the state of sentiment in relation to the Sabbath, through a long tract of time, amongst those who had some regard for human welfare, as well as for the honor of God. Our immediate authorities are Willison, Kingsbury, Mocheim, and Blackstone.

When the Emperor Constantine embraced Christianity, about the year A. D. 315, he "appointed that the Lord's Day should be consecrated to prayer, and commanded through all the Roman Empire that they should forbear to labor or do any work on the Lord's day."

About the year 440 the Emperor Leo declared: "It is our will and pleasure that the holy day dedicated to the Most High God should not be spent in sensual recreations, or otherwise profaned by suits of law." Speaking of farmers, he says: "As to the pretence that, by this rest, an opportunity may be lost, (of saving crops,) this is a poor reason, considering that the fruits of the earth do not depend so much on the diligence and pains of men as on the efficacy of the sun and the blessing of God."

In the 6th century, the Emperor Charlemagne convened the clergy of France and Hungary to make canons for the keeping of the Sabbath, and published his own royal edict, which commences thus: "We ordain (as is required in the law of God) that no man do any servile work on the Lord's day," &c.

In the early Synod of Illiberis it was ordained that if any man, dwelling in a city where there are churches, keep himself three Lord's days from church, he should be suspended from communion with the church.

About the year 360, the Council of Laodicea, after publishing a remonstrance against Judaizing, that is, observing the Sabbath day as the Sabbath, adds—"But they ought to put especial honor on the Lord's day by refraining from labor as Christians."

Lord Mansfield says: "As early as 517 a canon was made to prevent judicial business being done on the Lord's day, or first day of the week; that this canon was made a part of the Imperial Constitution by Theodosius; re-decreed and adopted by the Emperors Carolus and Ludovicus; taken into the book of the canon law by Gratian, and a forwards copied by William the Conqueror and Henry the Second, (of England,) and so became a part of the common law."

There were many ancient laws made by the kings of England, "prohibiting all kinds of work, merchandise, or traffic, on the Lord's day," as that made by King Ina, 688; King Alfred, in the year 876; and by Edward, his son, in the year 912.

About the year 1685, the Bishop of Ely is said to have collected many canons of ecclesiastical Synods and Courts in France, England, Germany, and other nations, to revive and enforce the observance of the Lord's day.

In the year 1180, great concern was manifested for the right observance of the Lord's day by a convocation of Scottish clergy at Perth. They ordained that every Saturday, from 12 o'clock, should be set apart for preparation for the Lord's day, and that at the sound of the bells, all the people should engage in prayer, and should abstain from worldly labor till Monday morning.

In the Parliament of England, under Charles I., it was ordained that, "Forasmuch as there is nothing more acceptable to God than the true and sincere worship of Him according to His holy will, and that the keeping of the Sabbath is a principal part of His worship,—and whereas, the Sabbath was greatly profaned by disorderly people, therefore, there shall be no more assemblies or meetings of the people for any sports and pastimes whatever. Subsequent laws were enacted forbidding tradesmen, artificers and mechanics from pursuing their ordinary labors on the Sabbath."

(Charles' father, James I., encouraged these sports and pastimes on the Sabbath. Those who thus spent their Sabbaths instead of learning the duties which they owed to both God and man, were not likely to "consult affairs of state,"—a kind of "meddling with his prerogative," which was peculiarly odious to James, as it is to all absolute monarchs, and to all the laws of despotism. Charles would have encouraged these sports and pastimes, had he been permitted to take his own way. But the Parliament had now become a power. All that class of politicians who care little for the people, but do care much for their votes, have no objections to, but, rather, a fondness for, such sports and pastimes on the Sabbath. They are schools in which are trained up an ignorant, unthinking, regardless description of people, who are just fit to be used for any purpose which the wily demagogue has in view.)

In the reign of James VI., the Parliament of Scotland enacted, "That there shall be no markets on the Sabbath day, and no gaming, playing, going to taverns or ale-houses, or selling of meat and drink, or wilful removing from the parish kirk in the time of sermons and prayers."

(This was the James who was afterwards known as James the I. of England. He was famous for what Brown of Haddington calls "religious fits:" sometimes he was a zealous Presbyterian. Perhaps he, at the time, approved the act of his Parliament. But he afterwards fell out with the Presbyterians and their Sabbath. He thought he saw a strong tendency towards republicanism among the Presbyterian clergy, he fell deeply in love with Episcopacy; and had it for a common saying, "No Bishop, no king." The Sabbath of Peter Heylin and such High Churchmen suited him exactly—a Sabbath which was over when the formal services in the church were ended.)

From 1639 to 1708, the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland took notice of the prevailing Sabbath profanation, bewailed it, exhorted the people to avoid it, &c., pronouncing them censurable who engaged in sundry employments and recreations, and calling for the concurrence and aid of the civil magistrate, &c.

The Fourth Commandment has a positive and a negative part. The positive is, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." The civil magistrate can do nothing to enforce obedience to this. He can bring no "aid" to the Church. Sabbath sanctification can be promoted only by the blessing of God on the faithful teachings of the Church. The negative part is, "on it," that is, the Sabbath, "thou shalt not do any work." Here the civil magistrate may, and can, and should, do something. He should prevent, or, at least, curb Sabbath profanation—all such profanation as tends to disturb the quietness and order of the Sabbath, prohibiting all such employments and recreations on the Sabbath as have a direct tendency to lessen the influence of religion and morality on the public mind.

Take now an extract from "Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England," of which the American Editor says: "The great principles which they unfold remain the same," and adds that "many of the modern improvements in England and in the United States were suggested by him." He says:

"Profanation of the Lord's day, vulgarly (but improperly) called Sabbath-breaking, is a ninth offence against God and religion, punished by the municipal law of England. For, besides the notorious indecency and scandal of permitting any secular business to be publicly transacted on that day, in a country professing Christianity, and the corruption of morals which usually follows its profanation, the keeping one day in the seven holy, as a time of relaxation and refreshment, as well as for public worship, is of admirable service to a state, considered merely as a civil institution. It humanizes, by the help of conversation and society, the manners of the lower classes—which would otherwise degenerate into a sordid ferocity and savage selfishness of spirit; it enables the industrious workman to pursue his occupation in the ensuing week with health and cheerfulness; it imprints on the minds of the people that sense of their duty to God, so necessary to make them good citizens, but which yet would be worn out and defaced by an unremitted continuance of labor without any stated times of recalling them to the worship of their Maker."

This witness is true, and it accords with the testimony of General Washington, the "Father of his Country," when he declared that religion and morality are the pillars or supports of national prosperity and happiness. As a "civil institution," and because it tends to make good citizens, the Sabbath is not unworthy of the notice of the civil legislator. It is as a blessing to society—and because it tends to national happiness, it falls under his jurisdiction. But all he can do is to prevent or curb such a profanation of it as tends to the depravation of the morals of the people. He cannot compel Sabbath sanctification, or the godly observance of the Sabbath. This can be effected only by the word and Spirit of God; and this lies within the province of the Church. It is chiefly as a religious institution, which is necessary to prepare men for keeping an eternal Sabbath with God in heaven, that the Church has to do with it. The means she is to use are the "word of God and prayer," warning every man and teaching every man. It is believed that, in times past, among the distinguishing characteristics of the two bodies which now form the United Presbyterian Church, one of the most important was their obedience to the commandment, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." Is there no danger of our losing this characteristic? Let us beware.

Every lawyer that is a lawyer is a disciple of Blackstone. If he does not believe Blackstone's moral teachings, he has no regard for anything he says, further than it may enable him to gain his "cases" in court. D.

A LAUGHABLE FRENCH MIRACLE

The well known French missionary, Father Brisaine, was always poor, for the simple reason that he gave away everything that he had. One evening he asked for a night's lodging of the curate of the village through which he passed, and the worthy man, having only one bed, shared it with him. At daybreak Father Brisaine rose, according to his custom, and went to say his prayers at the neighboring church. Returning from his sacred duty, he met a beggar, who asked alms. "Alas, my friend, I have nothing!" said the good priest, mechanically putting his hands into his breeches pocket, where, to his astonishment, he found something hard, wrapped up in a paper, which he knew he had not left there. He hastily opened the paper, and seeing four half-crowns in it, cried out that it was a miracle. He gave the money to the beggar, and hastened to the church to return thanks to God. The curate soon after arrived there, and Father Brisaine related the miracle with the greatest unction; the curate turned pale, put his hand in his pocket, and in an instant perceived that Father Brisaine, in getting up in the dark, had taken the wrong pair of breeches, he had performed the miracle with the curate's crowns.

THE TONGUE.

"And the tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity."

Who will take time to think of the tongue as an instrument of so much evil; and yet it is daily scattering its firebrands everywhere, disturbing the peace and comfort of families and communities. It was first given to man for good, to magnify and praise God; but it has been perverted to the base purpose of decrying his being, and falsifying his word. It has been employed, and is still employed by many to utter the errors of atheism, infidelity, profanity, lowdness, and other deadly heresies, which pollute and ruin the soul. These are evils too gross to be charged against those who read this paper.

There are other evils still, of which the tongue is guilty, that every true Christian will abhor, but which are found in the words of those who are called Christians. There is a contradiction in the terms. Yet there are those who bear the Christian name, who can lie, slander, and backbite their neighbors, although it is declared in the Scriptures that all such characters are excluded from heaven (Psalm xv 1-5, Rev. xxii. 8.)

There is another class of tongue-sins, chargeable against those who may be called whisperers. I suppose they are those whom we often meet, and who have always some evil thing to say against their neighbors, but in a kind of whisper, as if they were afraid to have it publicly known, and will accompany the communication with a request that it should be kept a secret, when their sole motive in the matter is to have it widely circulated.

There is another class of people who use the tongue very injuriously, to themselves especially. They may be termed tattlers. They will take up the supposed and trifling mistakes of their neighbors very freely, and make them the subjects of ridicule and laughter, for the amusement of their associates. A friend, to whom they may give very strong evidence of unfeigned friendship, will answer their purpose as well as an enemy. An instance of this came under my own observation not long since, in a city not a thousand miles from Philadelphia—the city of Brotherly Love. The family and a few friends were partaking of creature comforts, as they surrounded the domestic board. An absent lady friend, then in the country, was the subject of conversation. She had lately visited the city, and received the hospitality of this family as a highly esteemed friend; but during her visit, and in transacting some business, she had made some trifling blunders, on account of her not being acquainted with city customs. This little matter was brought up at the time referred to, with great zest, and was made the subject of much merry-making to all present who could take pleasure in such scenes. The individual who was called upon to relate the circumstance, felt it was wrong, and said he would not, for the world, that his friend should hear that he had spoken as he did. Might not the friends who were then present, justly expect that their mistakes, if they would happen to make any, would be brought up by the same party for the amusement of other guests? Is there any excuse for such conduct? I say there is not. Will Christian principles justify such a cause? I answer no! Will the rules of well regulated society approve of such procedures? They will not. They will condemn it, as worthy of contempt and reprobation.

Reader, keep a watch over the unruly member. If you cannot speak any good of your fellow-men, you should be silent, especially if the subject of detraction be an absent one. Think of the golden rule, and you will not feel at liberty to amuse yourselves, or your company, at the expense of friend or foe. (Mass. ex. 36.)

LARGE FEES.

The largest fee Sir Astley Cooper ever received was paid him by a West India millionaire named Hyatt. This gentleman having occasion to undergo a painful and perilous operative, was attended by Drs. Lettsom and Nelson as physicians, and Sir Astley as chirurgeon. The wealthy patient, his treatment having resulted most successfully, was so delighted that he fee'd his physicians with 300 guineas each. "But you, sir," cried the grateful old man, sitting up in his bed, and speaking to his surgeon, "shall have something better. There, sir—take that." The that was the convalescent's nightcap, which he flung at the dexterous operator. "Sir," replied Sir Astley, picking up the cap, "I'll pocket the affront." It was well he did so, for on reaching home he found in the cap a draft for 1000 guineas. This story has been told in various ways, but all its tellers agree as to the amount of the prize.

Catherine, the Empress of Russia, was even more munificent than the West India planter. When Dr. Dimsdale, for many years a Hertford physician, and subsequently the parliamentary representative of that borough, went over to Russia and inoculated the Empress and her son, in the year 1768, he was rewarded with a fee of £12,000, a pension for life of £500 per annum, and the rank of Baron of the Empire. But if Catherine paid thus handsomely for increased security of life, a modern emperor of Austria put down a yet more royal fee for his death-warrant. When on his death-bed, the Emperor Joseph asked Quarin his opinion of his case, the physician told the monarch that he could not possibly live forty-eight hours. In acknowledgment of this frank declaration of the truth, the Emperor created Quarin a Baron, and gave him a pension of more than £2000 per annum to support the rank with.—Book about Doctors.

THE LARGEST CITY—POPULATION AND COMMERCE OF JEDDO.

A very erroneous idea is indulged in by many people in relation to the largest city in the world, many confidently asserting that London, or, as it is frequently termed, the Great Metropolis, is far superior, both in size and number of inhabitants. But such is not the case. Jeddo, the capital of Japan, is, without exception, the largest and most populous city in the world.

It contains the vast number of 1,500,000 dwellings, and 5,000,000 of human souls. Many of the streets are nineteen japaneserls in length, which is equivalent to twenty-two English miles.

The commerce of Japan far exceeds that of any other city in the world, and the sea along its coast is constantly white with the sails of ships. "Their vessels sail to the southern portion of the empire, where they are laden with rice, tea, sea-coal, tobacco, silk, cotton, and tropical fruits, all of which find a ready market in the north, and then return freighted with corn, salt, oil, isinglass, and various other productions of the north, which have a market in the south." Cantilla Forks, March, 1862.

A WONDERFUL STORY.

The following is related in the Courrier des Etats Unis by a Parisian correspondent:

"The Emperor was reviewing a body of infantry one day, when his eye was caught by a drummer with only one arm, but who was, nevertheless, still playing.

"'Where is your left arm?'

"'At Solferino, sire.'

"'You shall have a pension of four hundred francs from my private purse.'

"'And if I should leave the other on the same road, sire?'

"'This,' replied Napoleon, pointing to his own cuirette of an officer of the Legion of Honor.

"'The cross!' exclaimed the soldier; and carried away by a transport of enthusiasm, the new Porsenna, with the remaining arm, drew his sabre, and at one vigorous blow cut it clear off."

This is the modern version of the legend of the saint who kissed his own head after it was cut off.

TEACHING IN SUNDAY SCHOOL.

The Superintendent of a Sunday School was questioning his pupils concerning the addresses made to them during the previous session.

"Children, what did Mr. Phonsy tell you this morning?"

No answer was made.

"Can't any one tell me what he said? Susie, can't you remember?"

Susie, a bright little one of seven years, arose, and with one finger in her mouth, bashfully lisped out:

"Pleathe, thir, he talked and he talked, and he thed uth how he loved uth, and he talked—and—and—we all thought he wath a-goin' to thay thumthing, but he didn't thay nothing."

This is not quite as unfortunate as the experiences of a clergyman in Maine, who was opposed to having any mirth in Sunday School. He thought it injurious to all, and unnecessary for the entertainment of the children. He offered to address the school, and show that they could be well entertained seriously. I am credibly assured that the following dialogue ensued:

"Children, I am going to tell you about Pe

CONFERENCE REPORT.

We left our place of residence in Philadelphia on the morning of May 10th, en route for the seat of the Conference in Trenton, and fell in with Rev. Brothers Gardiner, Berney, Smith, Schureman, and J. Smith, who accompanied us. The cars landed us all safe in Trenton at about eight o'clock in the morning, making the trip from Philadelphia in two hours. The omnibus drove us to the residence of Rev. Brother Campbell. That gentleman not being in at the time, his good lady, who is ever active and thoughtful in such matters, immediately informed the driver where to take each one of us. Having made ourself acquainted with the family at whose house we stopped, we repaired to the church, where we met with the most of the brethren who are members of the Conference.

Bishop Nazrey opened by singing a hymn, and the reading of the 25th chapter of Matthew, and addressing a prayer to the throne of grace, after which he (Bishop Nazrey) addressed the Conference in relation to certain rumors affecting the interests of the Church, concerning his Episcopal relation.

In this statement Bishop Nazrey declared that he had tendered his resignation to the B. M. E. Church, as directed by the A. M. E. General Conference of 1860, and that he was willing to submit the case relative to his relationship with the B. M. E. Church to the bench of Bishops for decision—and that, whatever their decision might be, he was willing to abide by it.

Bishop Quinn stated, for the satisfaction of the Conference, by request of Bishop Nazrey, what he had heard expressed in Canada. He stated that Bishop Nazrey announced before an audience that he was Bishop of the States; but, according to the doings of the General Conference and the doings of the Canadians, they had made him the Bishop of the B. M. E. Church!—but he had not acted there as Bishop since his resignation was presented to the B. M. E. Church, &c.

Bishop Nazrey again resumed the floor, and stated that he had not acted in the B. M. E. Church, since his resignation, up to the present date.

On motion of Rev. J. P. Campbell, that the statements of Bishops Nazrey and Quinn be considered as a satisfactory answer to the following questions:

1. Does he (Bishop Nazrey) exercise Episcopal authority in the B. M. E. Church—either by person or proxy?

2. Is he holding any claim to Episcopal authority in the B. M. E. Church?

Carried unanimously.

On motion of Rev J. P. Campbell, that, inasmuch as the peaceable interests of our connexion is greatly affected by certain rumors relative to the Episcopacy, so much so as to require the presence of all our Bishops jointly, therefore,

Resolved, That we, the Philadelphia Annual Conference, do request the presence of Bishop Payne, in order that the interests of our Church may be subserved, and the following question of law decided:

What Episcopal relation does Bishop Nazrey sustain to the B. M. E. Church, if any?

Carried.

On motion of Rev. J. P. Campbell, that, inasmuch as we have as yet seen no violation of law in the acts of Bishop Nazrey; therefore,

Resolved, That we, as a Conference, sustain him as one of the Bishops of the A. M. E. Church, so long as nothing tangible is found.

Carried.

On motion of P. Gardiner, that the Secretaries send word to Bishop Payne this day that his presence is required.

Carried.

Rev. A. L. Stanford was appointed Secretary, and Rev. W. D. Schureman assistant. The hour fixed for meeting was 9 o'clock, A. M., and that of adjournment, 12 o'clock, M., to meet again at 2 o'clock, P. M.

Of the appointments for Sabbath, we will only speak of the names of the brethren who preached in the church where Conference is held. At 10½ o'clock, A. M., the Rev. Richard Roberson, one of the oldest ministers in the A. M. E. Church, preached. His text will be found at the forty-eighth verse of the twenty-fourth chapter of Luke. Father Roberson gave us a profound, logical, sublime, practical discourse, holding his audience as if by some magic spell for an hour, more or less. He stated, in his own graphic and peculiar style, that it had been twenty-five years since he had been on the Trenton circuit. At three o'clock, P. M., Rev. William Moore, of the New York Conference, preached, taking for his subject the eighth verse and third chapter of Ephesians. Brother Moore also is among the oldest elders in our connexion. He stated that he was appointed Father Roberson's successor, which, of course, had been little less than twenty-five years. He did not come to preach, but to see the people. Those who know Brother Moore, know him to be a superior minister of his school, after the order of the Apostles. Everybody seemed well pleased.

At 7½ o'clock, P. M., Rev. A. L. Stanford read for his text the twelfth verse of the nineteenth chapter of Revelation, which reads—"On his head are many crowns." Brother Stanford gave us, we may say, a scientific discourse; he showed clearly that he understood the subject as a logician should, and, we must add, it was the most masterly discourse by far that we ever heard from Brother Stanford. We felt proud to see our young men showing themselves as workmen capable of dividing error from truth.

MONDAY MORNING, MAY 12

Conference met at 9 o'clock, A. M., Bishop Nazrey in the chair, assisted by Bishop Quinn. Conference was opened by reading, singing and prayer. The roll was called, and Minutes read and approved. A motion was made to adopt some rules to govern the Conference, which was passed. By motion, the remainder of the rules for governing the Conference be submitted to a Committee of three. Carried.

The Bishop then entered upon the Discipline, page 62, on the financial reports. The brethren having made their reports, a resolution was offered by Rev. J. P. Campbell, that the ten-cent system was the plan for the Philadelphia district to raise the Bishop's Apportionments. After it was discussed by Campbell, Eldy, Stanford, Weaver and Roberson, A. L. Stanford offered an amendment, that, in case of a failure, public collection be substituted. Motion prevailed, after some remarks from the Bishop.

Conference adjourned by singing and the benediction, to meet to-morrow morning at nine o'clock.

TUESDAY MORNING, MAY 13

Conference met per adjournment. Bp Nazrey presided, assisted by Bishop Quinn. Conference was opened by Bishop Quinn by singing the hymn,

"Come ye that love the Lord
And let your joys be known," and an address to the throne of grace. The roll was then called, and the Minutes read and approved.

By motion, Rev J. P. Campbell offered a series of resolutions. The first was read and adopted, as was also the second and fourth, after which Bishop Nazrey arose to deliver his annual address, giving a very interesting statement of his travels through the district, and the necessary wants of the people. He found it to be a benefit by his being present. He also recommended the urgent necessity of making or introducing some important changes, viz.: the cutting off some points, and making them into stations, &c. Conference adjourned till 2 P. M.

2 o'clock, P. M.—Conference met per adjournment, Bishop Nazrey in the chair, assisted by Bp Quinn. Conference proceeded to the investigation of the complaints against some of the brethren. The case of Rev. Barney has been brought before the Committee just as we are closing this brief summary in time for the mail.—Ed.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, MAY 14

Conference met at nine o'clock, A. M., Bishop Nazrey in the chair, assisted by Bishop Quinn. E. WEAVER opened Conference with singing, prayer and reading. The roll was then called, and Minutes read and approved. On motion the following Committees were appointed:

Three on Orders and Reception
" Letters and Memorials.
" Sabbath Schools.
" Temperance
" Missions

At this juncture the Bishop presented to the Conference a letter from Bishop Payne, to the effect that he could not meet on the day specified in the despatch requesting his presence, but, if it was necessary, he would be present to-day (saturday.) Conference determined on telegraphing to him immediately.

After sundry other motions had been made, the Conference proceeded to the marks against certain individuals. Having completed this task, the Bishop took up the question on page 62 of the New Discipline.

A number of candidates for the itinerant service were presented, and also several for Conference membership. A motion was made to receive John R. V. Morgan. Considerable discussion here ensued in reference to whether he had come in according to the requirements of Discipline. Those who took part in the discussion were Messrs. Wayman, Roberson, Moore, Shorter and Schureman, after which Conference adjourned with singing and the benediction, to meet at two o'clock, P. M.

2 o'clock, P. M.—Conference met per adjournment, Bishop Nazrey presiding. The case of bro. Morgan, after some remarks from brothers Campbell, Smith, and Weaver, was finally decided by the Conference laying the motion aside and refusing to receive him. Conference then proceeded to the unfinished business of receiving members for Conference membership and the itinerancy, and continued thus occupied up to the sixteenth question, whereat brethren commenced making out the report of the members of the district, and several other matters in the church—we take breakfast at our lodgings.

In relation to the arrangements and accommodations of Trenton, we would here take occasion to say that there are between fifty and sixty ministers at present here, and more still coming in. The friends all appear to be very kind and hospitable. There are brethren here from a great many quarters—some from Baltimore, (viz.: Revs. A. W. Wayman, Waters, Sluby, and Rhodes;) also, Rev. J. A. Shorter, from the Ohio Conference, and Rev. A. R. Green, of Windsor, Canada West. We would also state that Rev. J. P. Campbell has made ample arrangements for all the brethren to take two meals per day.

The ladies of the Mount Zion Church, together with those of Princeton, Pennington and Louisville, with Mrs. Rachel McNeally as President, are the Committee of Arrangements. Rev. Mrs. Campbell is also one of the most active participants.

We should not neglect saying here that many of our white friends assist materially in carrying out the plan of arrangements.

In conclusion, we would state that the Conference passed off very peacefully and harmoniously, there being very many persons in daily attendance.—Ed

We give the dispatch sent to Bishop Payne.

TO THE RIGHT REV. D. A. PAYNE:

SIR—You are hereby requested to attend the Philadelphia Conference (now in session at Trenton, New Jersey) forthwith, to settle a law question in reference to Bishop Nazrey's relation to the B. M. E. Church, which question is to be answered in open Conference on or before next Thursday.

A WORD FROM CINCINNATI

Cincinnati, May 9th, 1862

MR. RECORDER:—SIR:—I see by your sheet of the 3d, that you reached Washington City in time to meet the Baltimore Conference, and I am happy to see the wise action that body took in regard to the trouble that perplexes our Zion. We failed to erase from the minutes of our Conference the contradictory actions that passed during your presence, but so it is, grave men are not always wise.

The signs of the times are hopeful for our much wronged and suffering race. May the Lord be merciful, for man would devour us. Brother Turner of St. Louis is a live man, I admire the action of his charge. Never mind; I think you will hear from Allen chapel one of these days. Work and wait, faith and patience will do wonders. If this district don't do something this year for the RECORDER, worthy of itself and the cause. If she, (not as the Conference, as an verdant as to recognize upstart officials of at least doubtful authority, in the exuberancy of her youth she ought to sustain her authorized and acknowledged editor.

Victory still perches on the Union banner. Scott's anaconda tightening its folds, rebellion is being crushed. Davis, Beauregard, Johnson and Pillow, are hunting the last ditch in which to die. Hope they may soon find it. So must this hell born treachery end. Yours, ALEPH.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CORRESPONDENCE.

SACER'S LAST LETTER FROM THE D. C.

I suppose I might be excused for writing this, if I only said "good-by." The weather is fine, and the congregations of the various churches of the A. M. E. Connexion, are all astir in order to settle down upon some conclusion as to what manner of men their new pastors are.

Never did preachers enter into fields of labor under more auspicious circumstances than the preachers stationed here by the recent Annual Conference. The colored population of Washington is rapidly increasing by hundreds; business interests are expanding; legislation in behalf of colored people, to relieve them of the crushing disabilities of many years, is in active progress; the war is nearing its close; passions are subsiding, and reason begins to rule; the frenzied excitement is giving place to sober thought, and the prosperity of the community, of the nation, begins to engage the public mind. It is a fact worthy of note, that many of the colored people, and a great many who settle here, are members of the churches.

Alexandria will doubtless be the seat of a great A. M. E. Church. A connexion of the colored Methodists with the whites, while prejudice exists, must eventually be severed. At this very moment, two hundred dollars—perhaps more—could be raised in Washington and Georgetown, D. C., to erect a church edifice in Alexandria.

The colored Presbyterian Church here is without a pastor. This, indeed, is a fine field of labor. The present membership embraces, perhaps, more, or as much mental and moral worth as any other colored congregation in the city—forming a nucleus around which might be clustered a splendid army of Christian warriors. It is hoped that some Presbyterian minister of the North may be found to lead this flock.

Mr. Editor, it may seem a vulgar proposal, but if you will just send down here and get Joseph E. Williams, and exhibit him in Philadelphia, you can make money, even if you ask fifty cents a "see." He is the colored man who sent a memorial to Congress, declaring we could not be a people here—asking the Government to colonize us—asking them not to recognize Hayti or Liberia. He procured signatures to it in two ways: first, representing to persons on the street, who could not read, that it was something to do great good; secondly, by putting down the names of persons on his Satanic majesty's own authority. This African Catiline is doubtless the tool in the hands of that party in Congress who want to have the colored people sent out of the country. To meet the objections of a majority of Republicans—that it is inhuman to send the colored people away against their wills—they penned, or caused to be penned the memorial carried around by Joseph E. Williams, with the understanding that he would get signatures enough to make it appear that the colored people wanted to go. The fellow will be foiled. He has been hissed, scorned, and contemned by every colored man, and it is only the strong religious sentiment of the colored people that has saved him from violent treatment. Induce him, if you can, to come to Philadelphia for exhibition; by this means he can profit himself and his fellow-man.

Rev. H. J. Rhodes is stationed in Georgetown, and no doubt will enable the people here to keep up their interest in the Recorder, which is very strong.

It is said, a funeral took place in the Baltimore Annual Conference, but there are some who believe in the doctrine of the Resurrection.

KEOKUK MISSION.

May 7th, 1862.

BROTHER WEAVER:—Sir,—I here send you one six months' subscriber, Joseph Alexander, Keokuk, Iowa, with his subscription, $4,00. Times continue dull. The interest of the Mission is increasing slowly. We rent a hall for preaching, and to hold our Sabbath School. The Sabbath School is reviving. Last Sabbath we had 45 scholars and 8 teachers. The teachers appear to be interested in their several classes. We have a library of about two hundred volumes. Brother York Anderson is superintendent, and uses a great deal of effort to make the school interesting. The ladies have formed a Sewing Circle, of which Mrs. A. Depugh is President, Mrs. H. Taggart, Vice-President, Miss J. Gray, Secretary, Miss Mary Story, Assistant Secretary, and Mrs America Anderson, Treasurer. Through the industry of this Society, the Mission is sustained chiefly. We have, also, a Society known as the Mission Relief. Its object is to purchase ground and build a house of worship. Its officers are as follows:—Brother H. Depugh, President, Brother York Anderson, Secretary, Mr. D. F. Story, Treasurer. This Society was organized by Brother Dove some three years ago, and has only existed in name for two years; but I thank God that they are now at work again, and will soon show what they are doing. I hope to be able to send you other subscriptions soon. Yours, in behalf of missions,

ABRAHAM T. HALL.

VARIETY IN CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE.

It is very important that young persons, and persons who are just entering upon a Christian life should be taught not to try themselves by other people's evidences. It is supposed that if religion is of God, it will, of course, be just the same in all men. But, in fact, religion is the right using of the whole mind and life. Men are different one from another. They were meant to be. The strength of some lies in the feelings, of others in their intellect, of others in their stability and will. Some men are calm, others excitable. Some are imaginative, and others literal and practical. Some are nervous and quick, others phlegmatic and slow. Besides these constitutional differences, men have had widely different teaching and training, and all these circumstances conspire to make their religious developments personal and peculiar. God leads every soul according to what that soul is, and although love is the one central experience in all, and is that grand and characteristic element which makes all men alike Christians, yet love develops itself in different men—in some gradually, in others suddenly, in some it is transformed with the imagination in others it a very plain and homely emotion. It rushes like a mountain torrent from some hearts; in others it is like a silver spring in a meadow—silent, gentle, and almost invisible.

No man should try to produce in himself another man's experience, unless he first becomes that other man. In an orchestra, the flute, the violin, the clarionet, the horns, all give forth music. But music is not the same sound, nor of the same quality in each of them as in the other. Love God and love men with your nature. And do not lose comfort and growth in grace by wanting to feel like some other Christian. Be a Christian. Consecrate your heart and your life to Christ's service, and then the greater the difference between you and other Christians the better; just as in a flower-garden, the summer is rich, not by having all flowers just like each other, but by having as many different varieties as is possible.

WHOM God chooses, the world refuses.

SELF-CULTURE.

MR. EDITOR:—I wish to direct particular attention to this subject. There are certain principles which should guide us in the work of self-culture; for this is not a work of chance or of accident, but one founded in the nature of the soul, and controlled by laws that the Creator of all mind has established for its discipline and development: it is easy to forget this fact.

The spiritual nature of man is so far removed from material objects, so purely and unearthly in its essence, so open to impulses apparently fitful and irregular, so secret and so subtle in many of its modes of action, that we are prone to overlook its dependence on fixed and permanent principles. But the Creator designs that we should labor intelligently in everything. The pursuit of truth involves order and method at every step; and its use, in whatever form applied, requires the same steady conformity to the plan which Divine wisdom has instituted. The cultivation of mind is our greatest work, and in proportion to its superiority we are under obligation to execute this task with intelligence and success.

First of all, we should recollect that self-culture, as its name implies, is our own work. Its necessity, importance, dignity are derived from ourselves. Its claims are inward, not outward. Its means and aids demand that our will and strength should be infused into them before they can contribute to personal growth; in nothing, is the idea of our individual existence raised so high, and associated with such supremacy, as in self-culture. Here the soul has sovereignty without dispute or rivalry; filled, as the universe is, with influences to promote its enlargement of capacity, and to secure its attainment of excellence, they are utterly powerless, unless the soul itself breathe its own vitality into them.

Not an archangel can cross its sanctuary without its leave. What a fearful prerogative is this; and yet it is not a vaster thought than we need; such is our feebleness of purpose, our indolence and frailty, that we require a momentous sense of responsibility, like this, to arouse and sustain our faculties amidst the multiplied ties that bind us to life, and act on us without our sympathy, amidst those circumstances which so frequently reduce us to a state of passiveness. We are here exalted to a position in which our individuality is perfected. We are separated from the world, we are a world ourselves, the dearest connexions, no less than the coarser bonds, uniting us to material objects, drop away from the spirit, and we are enclosed in the silence and solitude which befit a being ordained to decide its own destiny.

A great thought then meets us at the outset of this work—the thought of self-culture as our own work, to be begun, carried on, consummated, as a peculiar trust, and for which we are amenable to the throne of God. But again: it is pre-eminently our work, not, indeed, that we are to neglect other duties, but the sentiment of self-culture is ever to be uppermost, and is everything done for others the growth of our own moral nature is to be faithfully respected. No man has a right to serve another at the expense of his own improvement. Sacrifices of time, convenience and comfort, we may justly and honorably make for the welfare of others, but the real good of our own being must never be bartered away in exchange for any supposed advantage to society or country.

That is a false philanthropy which would impoverish a human being to enrich the wisdom of the world. Indeed, it cannot enrich them; a man's soul is worth more in its life than in its loss, and the best services that we can possibly render to humanity is to build up such a force of character, to attain such excellence, to embody such a spirit in all our acts as shall tend to awaken the sympathies of others, and draw them to the communion of goodness.

Yet many persons suppose that their own self-culture is to be held secondary to the welfare of others. According to their idea of usefulness they are to practise a kind of self-negation, to forget themselves, and to be simply and solely intent on doing good to the world. We have known some who have fallen into this error. Preachers of the Gospel have sometimes confessed that in their zeal to see others converted, they have quite exhausted their own powers. Teachers we have seen who labor for their pupils until their intellects were brought down to the level of mere machines, all their generous impulses stifled, and their elasticity of soul crushed; and philanthropists have often crossed our path who, in their eagerness to abate evil, have forgotten the duties they owe to themselves, have abandoned all thoughtful meditation, and have lost self-control and self-direction.

This is a deep wrong to one's own heart. It is treachery to their own dignity, and the glory of our nature; the imagination is so easily excited to clothe our philanthropic schemes with delusive aspects, and a sort of moral romance is so apt to lead us off into the regions of extravagance and folly, that we need a wise caution to govern our judgment, to avoid such enterprises. In the eye of truth and justice, no one can be innocent who holds his growth and advancement in goodness subordinate to usefulness. It is nothing less than moral suicide to destroy the aspirations, and deaden the instincts of our inner life for the sake of philanthropic objects. God's martyrs are not found among these ambitious men. Our highest obligation is to implant the image of God within us, to show it in the serene beauty of our actions, and perfect, as far as possible, our own character, and make it the medium of a pure transforming influence on other minds. We are not to look for this state of things in deeds. Deeds are often more splendid than their actors, borrowing a lustre from some adventitious aid, and raising their value by time, place and circumstances.

Or they may fall below the standard of the actors, and by adverse agencies fail to be the exponents of their virtue and energy—viewed in either light, actions are deceptive tests of truth. But character always expresses the certain measure of a man's greatness. It reveals the precise degree of his goodness. It tells how far he has conquered himself and the evil in his pathway, how high he has ascended in the realms of being, how much of the good he has realized. And by this means it takes the rank of the noblest social influences in the world. Men read it as they read no written volume; men listen to it as they listen to no other eloquence; men admire it as they admire nothing else, and by admiration grow into its excellence and become like it.

THE A. M. E. ZION CONFERENCE

Philadelphia, May 16, 1862.

The Annual Conference of the A. M. E. Zion Church in America, for the Philadelphia District, met pursuant to adjournment, at 10 o'clock, Monday morning,—Superintendents Rose and Bishop presiding alternately. After the ordinary preliminaries, the following preamble and resolutions prevailed, to wit:

Whereas, In the order of an all-wise and inscrutable Providence, the present national difficulties in this country are being made to subserve the great interests of justice, humanity, and the Christian religion, by rendering it essential to the existence, prosperity, and future glory of the nation, to inaugurate a policy looking to the ultimate and inevitable extinction of the only system which constitutes our national disgrace, and has mainly contributed to bring on our present national woes, therefore,

Resolved, That we humbly acknowledge our obligation, and confess our gratitude to the divine Being who is so signally defeating the cherished schemes of the wicked and rebellious of the land, at the same time that He is triumphantly vindicating the truth of those very cheering promises, "The needy shall not always be forgotten," "The expectation of the poor shall not perish forever."

Resolved, That while it is our ardent wish, it shall be our fervent prayer that war and bloodshed may speedily terminate, and that peace and prosperity may ensue; yet mindful of the order of divine Providence—"First pure, then peaceable," we will patiently and prayerfully wait the result of whatever process the Almighty may have chosen, with the view of expelling national impurities, and of establishing permanent national peace.

Resolved, That we have abiding confidence in the present administration of the Government, as being wise, patriotic, just, and humane; that its emancipation policy, an earnest of which is seen in the liberation of all slaves in the District of Columbia, commends it to the favorable and prayerful consideration of the Christian world, and that we pledge to it the support of our united prayers to the Almighty, for its future success; and be it farther

Resolved, That, as an evidence of our appreciation of what the Lord has done, and is doing for our down-trodden and long-neglected race, and with the view of preparing our people for those positions to which, in the providence of God, they may be admitted, we hereby pledge ourselves to use our efforts to induce them to adopt such a course as will command them to the favorable consideration of the humane and intelligent everywhere. Adjourned.

LAST DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

Tuesday Morning.—Conference met at nine o'clock,—Superintendents Rose and Bishop presiding alternately. After the ordinary ceremonies, and sundry other matters, a vote of thanks was tendered to the editors of the daily Press, and of the weekly Christian Recorder, for having gratuitously published the proceedings of the Conference. A vote of thanks was tendered to the trustees and members of Wesley Church, particularly to Brother De Cordarver, who attended to the Church during Conference, and to the friends, for their kindness and hospitality to the members of Conference; to the President of the Conference, and his associates, for the able and dignified manner in which they presided over the deliberations of the Conference, and to the Secretaries and reporter, for their faithful performance of duty.

Appointments of preachers for the Philadelphia District, for 1862, are as follows: Wesley Church, Lombard St., Phila., John A. Williams—having the supervision of Mount Zion, Pearl St., Phila., and of Zion Church, Wilmington, Del.; Harrisburgh, Singleton T. Jones; Wilkesbarre, George Johnson; York Circuit, Chas. J. Carter; Chambersburg Circuit, O. J. Scott; Peachbottom Circuit, Robt. A. Gibson; Middletown Circuit, Thos. H. Castor, (in his charge,) Samuel Mathews; Williamsport Circuit, Chas. H. Wallace, (in his charge,) Wm. T. Biddle, Newtown Circuit, Isaac Gassaway, (in his charge,) T. H. Harris; Kaighnsville, Henry H. Blackstone; Phœnixville, Moses Wilcox,—H. H. Blackstone having the oversight; John J. Moore, California Mission; the New Society in California to be supplied; Wm. Young, Missionary for this Conference District; James Temple, Superannuated; Abraham Cole, transferred to the Allegheny Conference District; J. D. Brooks, to the Southern Conference District; Abner Bishop, left without an appointment, because of affliction.

Superintendent Rose delivered a very appropriate valedictory address, to great acceptance. The Conference then adjourned, to meet in Wesley Church, Lombard St., on the second Saturday in May, 1863, at 4 o'clock, P. M.

THE LATE EMANCIPATION ACT.

There was a public meeting held by the people of color, at the A. M. E. Church in the city of Terre Haute, Indiana, on Wednesday evening, May 7th, 1862, for the purpose of returning a tribute of thanks to Almighty God, for the late act of emancipation in the District of Columbia. Rev. T. Strother was called to the chair, and Wm. J. Greenly was appointed Secretary. The chairman called the house to order, and opened the exercises by reading a portion of the 11th chapter of the prophecy of the prophet Daniel, and singing and prayer. The object of the meeting was then stated by the chairman, after which a committee of three was appointed by the chairman to draw up a set of resolutions expressive of the sentiments of the audience. The chairman appointed Wm. Johnson, Wm J. Greenly, and Alfred Cole, as said committee, who, after retiring for a short time, returned with the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas, The Congress of the United States, at its present session, has passed an Act, which has also been signed by the President of the United States, on the 16th of April 1862 freeing the District of Columbia from the curse of human slavery, and thereby emancipating and forever setting free all our brethren in said District of Columbia; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the colored people of Terre Haute, do meet in duty to return our sincere thanks to God, in behalf of our brethren thus freed in said District of Columbia, for the inestimable boon of liberty thus given them.

Resolved, That we also feel grateful to the members of Congress, for their untiring zeal in battling for the downfall of slavery, and the triumph of freedom; that we invoke the blessings of the Almighty upon them and their labors, hoping that their days may be many and useful in the cause of humanity, that their mandates may more rapidly and more in the time now and to be distant when the result of their labors may be seen in the final extinction of slavery throughout these United States.

Resolved, That we view in the person and character of His Excellency, (Abraham Lincoln,) the President of the United States, in all his actions since his inauguration, and through the war which is going on in our country, up to the present time, a man acting with discretion, and aiming to do what is just and right to all men, and having the fear of God before him; therefore, we pray God to bless him in his office, as the chief magistrate of this nation, with a long and useful life, and with all that pertains to make man happy in this world, and with a happy immortality beyond the grave.

Resolved, That we, having been born on American soil, ("The land of the free, and the home of the brave,") feel, as a natural consequence, that this is our home, and therefore we feel an attachment to this country, and will be loyal to its Government; though we have been deprived of many rights and privileges which are ours by nature, yet we feel disposed to persevere in the cultivation of every branch of literature, which is calculated to make us useful and intelligent.

The audience resolved that the above should be published in the CHRISTIAN RECORDER.

REV. T. STROTHER, Pres.

W. J. GREENLY, Sec.

"RELIGION AND LABOR."

Extracts from biography of Harlan Page, Joiner.

Harlan Page believed and lived. He passed the straight gate. He confessed his Saviour. Then he thus evidenced his love of souls: "When I first obtained a hope, I felt that I must labor for souls. I prayed year after year, that God would make me the means of saving souls." This was the purpose to which he consecrated his life, while following his occupation. He carried it out fully, embracing every opportunity of speaking in the name of Christ to perishing sinners. He acted like one who believed that the divine blessing would accompany his efforts; and who amply verified the promise. "Our faith in eternal realities," he said, "is weak, and our sense of duty faint, while we neglect the salvation of our fellow-beings. Let us awake to duty, and while we have a tongue or pen, elevate them to the service of the Most High, not in our own strength, but in strong faith and confidence in Him."

He endeavored to do good in various ways, but the chief were writing letters and speaking to individuals, most solemnly, regarding their eternal state. His words, whether written or spoken, were always pointed, urgent, and tender. "Nothing but love impels me to write," he would add to his appeal.

Letter writing was consecrated by Harlan Page to the highest end—the salvation of souls. Individuals whom he did not personally know, were frequently addressed, as well as those with whom he was acquainted. "I think much of you," he wrote to a female relation, "and long to see you within the ark of safety. Have you reason to hope that your sins are pardoned, through a Saviour's blood? If not, consider your danger; "you are now in an awful crisis; your eternal all may depend on the course you take. The Lord has taught you by his Spirit, that you are a wretched, perishing sinner. You feel that you have no preparation for heaven, and see nothing before you but eternal woe. O, my friend, there is a refuge. The Lord Jesus invites in melting strains: "Look to me and live; come unto me and find rest." O, go to him now, as you value your precious, your immortal soul." To another, "Will you not take up in earnest the great subject of the salvation of your own soul, feel your guilt and danger, and flee to the arms of the blessed Saviour? Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation."

Prayer meetings were the delight of his soul. He was ever ready to join with a few, to supplicate the throne of grace. . . . Tract distribution was also with him a favorite means of doing good. Enclosing them in letters, he would add a word from his pen: "Accept the enclosed from one who earnestly desires your best good; and may I beg the favor that you will read it with candor, and weigh well the sentiments it contains."

Or thus: "Will you and your companion oblige me so much as to give the enclosed an attentive perusal before you go to rest this night?" In 1825, he was appointed depository of the American Tract Society, and returned to New York. There he labored, during the remaining nine years of his life, with such eagerness as if he were in haste to die; nor were his labors merely official; he dealt with the consciences of the persons employed in the tract house, taught Sabbath schools, visited the degraded, kept prayer-meetings, and wrote spirit-stirring letters with increased devotedness. He lived to win souls. He ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears.

Let us mark the result of his labors of love. He was as leaven in the world, and his blessed influence spread far and wide. "Mr Page's conversation first led me to think seriously of my soul and eternity," said one. "But for the efforts of Mr Page, and a dear Christian friend of his in the country, my soul, to all human view, must have been lost," confessed Captain T. Of one hundred and twenty-five of his Sabbath scholars in Coventry, eighty-four are thought to have given evidence of piety, and six are preachers of the Gospel. Of individuals in the same place, with whom he had conversed personally or by letter—and he knew of no young person in the congregation he undealt with by him, thirty embraced the faith. Upwards of one hundred young women were employed in the Tract and Bible house; of these about sixty were brought to Christ, besides binders and printers. "Many sheets of the word of God, and tracts," he says, "as they have been folded and stitched, have been moistened with the tears of the converted sinner, and the broken-hearted penitent, and thence gone out on errands of mercy to a perishing world." What a blessed baptism!

In answer to prayer suggested by Mr. Page, to his fellow-laborers in the work of the Lord, on behalf of eighty-eight individuals in a district of tract distribution in New York, thirty-four hopeful conversions occurred in 1832. Prayer and effort were rewarded. Thirty-two teachers were his hire in Sabbath schools, of whom nine sought the ministry. He himself knew of more than one hundred souls converted by his instrumentality. Thus largely were his early resolutions fulfilled, and his effectual fervent prayers answered. It was the joy of his heart, when he heard of a sinner awakened and brought to the Redeemer. He missed no day without an effort of faith in the salvation of souls, and his reward was according to his zeal. Though an humble man, how dignified was the position of Harlan Page before God; more than some of the highest dignitaries of the visible church, will such a laborer shine in the heavenly firmament. . . . He lived for one object; and though his compeers might deem him fanatical and extreme, he accomplished his work and he went to rest. "He who would do some great things in this short life," says John Foster, "must apply himself to the work with such a concentration of his forces, as to idle spectators, who live only to amuse themselves, looks like insanity."

Thus lived and labored an earnest artisan, a blessing to his generation, and the means of carrying on that blessing to succeeding ages, by the life-seed he sent into the harvest, and the edifying example he left as a heritage to the church.

Christian reader what are you doing for souls? Let Harlan Page counsel you. I doubt not, you feel how great is their danger, and long for their salvation. Do write to them; it may be God may make you the instrument of salvation to their souls. Endeavor to win some to Christ, make some one in whom you have an interest the subject of earnest prayer, affectionate address, or of a printed letter. Thus did this working man, and his minister had often the pleasure of saying, as he welcomed the valued coadjutor with the increase of his flock: "Must you not be an efficient keeper of the word of the Lord?" He that wins souls is wise.

Dear reader, are you saved? It would be direct unfaithfulness to leave this notice of one who, while life was spared to seeking to save the unconverted, without a special appeal. If there was occasion for burning zeal, and unwearied effort, what do you mean by impatience, and unbelief? why will ye die? your soul is precious. Eternity is near. "As though God did beseech you by us, we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God; for he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him."

TUNING THE PULPIT.

Macaulay informs us that in the time of Queen Elizabeth the Court was accustomed to hint to the clergy what they wanted said, and they called it "tuning the pulpit." There is a good deal of this kind of tuning in our times. When a minister is settled, the people do not go and tell him openly that he must preach this and not preach that, but they have far more adroit methods of pitching his tune for him.

Deacon A—— informs him that their former minister destroyed his influence by preaching thus and so, just to give him a hint that he must not preach thus and so, if he would expect to stay any time among them. But Deacon B—— comes with directly the opposite, that he must preach as the old pastor did, that dear, good man, or folks would not like him. Another comes to say that he must let politics alone, which does not mean merely that he shall not be a partisan, but that he shall say nothing to instruct the people in the duties of their civil relations. These relations are an interdicted sphere of human action, upon which the Gospel may not urge its claims. John must not rebuke Herod, nor teach the soldiers to "use no violence," or he will lose his popularity, and even his life. Hence if the minister prays for his country, it is a jarring note, to which a portion of his people will not sing. If any conclusions from well-defined and clearly-stated premises can by construction be made to bear upon the policy of a political party, or upon any of the extant civic questions or agitations, there are numbers who, if they obeyed their impulse, would rise to their feet, and say, "Pastor, pastor, you are out of tune."

"And then there are the chronic grumblers, the sour-natured, the selfish, the men of 'peculiar views,' and 'conscientious scruples,' who seem to to be among the essentials in the moral structure of every finished society. They want to hear the Gospel. Their anxiety for the Gospel is most hopeful. Their solicitude for the church is tenderly affecting. Their lamentations over the degeneracy of the ministry might discourage a very Luther. O, that we had a more Christian church, say they, a holier ministry, a purer Gospel!

President Edwards was driven from Northampton after many years of pastoral success, because the people could not tune him. He rebuked certain irregularities of the people of his congregation, and it turned out that these rebukes fell with special severity on the children of some of the leading families. The consequence was, that the parents in these families were offended, and having influence, they got up such an opposition to the great and good pastor that he made his escape, and went off and preached among the Stockbridge Indians. He was too conscientious a man to be tuned in a case demanding faithfulness. The Northampton people found afterwards that they had made a great mistake in dealing thus with this great and good man, and a Col. Hawkins, one of the leaders in the opposition, could not die in peace till he confessed the great wrong he had done. Such confessions would be appropriate to others who have driven away good pastors because they could not tune them.

Said a pastor to his Deacon in B——, when she latter called to give him a hint about the sayings and doings, "Deacon, I'd have you to know that I came here to teach you, and not to have you teach me." This may not always be the best way to meet a case of this kind; for the minister must be gentle towards all men. He must be willing to take a respectful hint, but having derived the matter of his preaching from the Word and Spirit of God, he should not submit to dictation in the delivery of it. And if he is really serious in manner, earnest in his feeling, and turn not aside "to regard vain words," or to mind the pitch which others would give to his public discourse, there is little danger from their interference. The danger comes from betraying annoyance or attempting to plead his own cause against these intermeddlers. Go on and do your duty, the same as if you had been deaf and knew nothing of the effort which had been made to tune you.—N. Y. Chronicle.

SCARCITY OF CHURCHES IN SOUTHERN MISSOURI.

A correspondent with the army of the Southwest writes: "On coming to Rolla I was struck with the fact that there was neither church nor school house in that town. From there to Springfield, a distance of one hundred and twenty miles, in which there are farming neighborhoods settled over twenty years, I saw but one church—a half-finished building, commenced by the Southern Methodists, and afterwards abandoned—and not a single school-house. At Springfield there were indications of moral, religious and intellectual culture, (churches and academies, temporarily abandoned during the possession of the town by the rebels, some of them destroyed,) but from Springfield to Cassville there was not a church or school-house to be seen. In Cassville, I think, there must have been some obscure place used for religious services, but it was not distinguishable from the other houses. From Cassville to this town, no church or school-house has met my eye."

SADNESS.

There is a mysterious feeling that frequently passes like a cloud over the spirits. It comes upon the soul in the busy bustle of life, in the social circle, in the calm and silent retreats of solitude. Its powers are alike supreme over the weak and the iron-hearted. At one time it is caused by the flitting of a single thought across the mind.—Again, a sound will come booming across the ocean of memory, gloomy and solemn as the death-knell, overshadowing all the bright hopes and sunny feelings of the heart. Who can describe, and yet who has not felt its bewildering influence? Still, it is a delicious sort of sorrow; and like a cloud dimming the sunshine of the river, although causing a momentary shade of gloom, it enhances the beauty of returning brightness.

OLD HUNDRED IN CAMP.—A correspondent writing from our camp before Yorktown, says:—On Sabbath evening, a BIBLE LESSONS FOR THE TIMES: HOW CAESAR GOT HIS FOOTHOLD: THE CHRONICLES OF AN OLD SECESSION.

CHAPTER SECOND.

The result of Rehoboam's harsh reply to the disaffected tribes, was that all hope of a peaceful adjustment vanished. The spirit of the tribe, the spirit of extreme state's rights rose to a fury which destroyed all reflection, and all solicitude about consequences. Rehoboam had looked to the interests of his tribe alone; he ignored the nation as a nation; and now the spirit he exhibits in his selfishness, the disaffected tribes develope in the form suggested by their selfishness. Then the cry of those who, though excluded from the privileges of royalty, had borne their part of the burdens of the state, and had shed their blood in its defence; of those who had maintained the throne of David against rebellion in his own family, their cry was: "What portion have we in David? neither have we inheritance in the son of Jesse: to your tents, O Israel! now see to thine own house, David."

The King of Judah, denying their right to secede, attempted to collect the revenue. For this purpose he sent Adoram, who was over the tribute. The result was, that all Israel stoned Adoram to death. Israel organized a new state, and Jeroboam reigned over them.

The first effort of Rehoboam was designed to bring back by force the seceding states to their allegiance. He gathered an army of one hundred and eighty thousand choice warriors to reduce the seceding states to submission; but to him and his people came the command of the Lord: "Ye shall not go up, nor fight against your brethren."

For three years, the King of Judah, sobered by his reverses, moved with caution, and became strong. His strength made him careless; the King of Egypt invaded his land, humbled it, and made it tributary.

The first effort of Jeroboam, who was at the head of the seceding states, was prompted by his dread that the hearts of the people would be drawn again in love to the Union. His effort was to break the mightiest bond which had united them, the bond of religion. If that had not been weakened, there is little doubt that it would have drawn the people together again. He desired a sectional religion; he rent the church. If the church had kept her unity, the state would have been brought back to its unity, perhaps never would have deserted it. He set up two idols which he declared had been the cause of Israel's prosperity; he gathered a priesthood worthy of the idols, and thus led the people from God. His priesthood was taken from the lowest of the people, from the classes of the debased and the unscrupulous.

In spite of the divine prohibition of civil war, the divided states did not long remain at peace. A war took place in which Israel lost half a million of men; their towns were seized, and so terrible a blow was given them, that they did not recover from it in Abijah's time.

And what is the history of the chosen people from that time? The ten tribes of Israel, weakened by their wars with Judah, were led into captivity, and utterly dispersed, no man knows whither. The flames consumed all their glory, and the winds scattered its very ashes.

Judah, after sufferings of every kind, fearful struggles, insnaring alliances, and unspeakable humiliations, was at length destroyed; her children were led into seventy years' captivity. They returned, but their independence was gone forever. They were ruled by the Persians, ruled by the Greeks, ruled by the Romans, but ruled by themselves no more. There was, indeed, a ray of hope, when the nation, led by the Maccabees, threw off the yoke. The Jewish race rose from the dust, but it only rose to fall more hopelessly. All historians are agreed as to the causes of their ruin. The springs of evil were their internal divisions, their sectarian animosities and the prejudice between races. Religious divisions alienated the people; the hatred of the Jews to the Samaritan and Galilean, destroyed the sense of their human brotherhood. Their spirit of disunion brought them under the Roman yoke. Herod, an Edomite, held the throne of David as a vassal of Rome. And still, though the despising of God and of his law was the cause of their misery, they persevered in their practical atheism, and inhuman spirit of hatred to each other. Their love to God grew no stronger, but their hatred to Cæsar, in the circle of their wounded passions, became more and more violent. Faithful warnings were given them by the Saviour during his earthly ministry, but they were unheeded, and the hour of their final desolation and dispersion burst upon them.

The cup of their doom became full; their city and temple were burned; millions were slaughtered; the temple of Jupiter rose where the living God had been adored; they were driven from the land, and were forbidden on pain of death even to look upon their ancient home. The Pagan, and the Saracen, and the Christian have held the land, but the Jew has never held it again.

Let the generations bear it on their heart forever, that the elect race were ruined by their want of love to God, and of love to each other, by the arrogance of the ruler, and the impatience of the ruled, by violent councils and violent acts. They dissolved the Union which God had meant to be perpetual: the bands of rods, which no power on earth could have broken while it was kept together by the tie with which God had united it, fell to pieces, and the parts were taken up singly, were broken, and flung with scorn, wherever the will of careless and cruel hands might please to throw them. Though the mighty life of the ancient federation still palpitates in the myriad fragments which are scattered among the nations, the bond broken, remains broken. The Jew moves among men, the miracle of history—at once revealing and hiding the profoundest mysteries of the providence of God in our world.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE LUTHERAN GENERAL SYNOD ON THE STATE OF THE COUNTRY.

Whereas, Our beloved country, after having long been favored with a degree of political and religious freedom, security and prosperity unexampled in the history of the world, now finds itself involved in a bloody war to suppress an armed rebellion against its lawfully constituted Government; and whereas, the Word of God, which is the sole rule of our faith and practice, requires loyal subjection to "the powers that be," because they are ordained of God, to be a terror to evil-doers, and a praise to those who do well, and at the same time declares that they who "resist the power" shall receive to themselves condemnation; and whereas, we, the representatives of the Evangelical Lutheran Synods in the United States connected with the General Synod, assembled in Lancaster, Pa., recognize it as our duty to give public expression to our convictions of truth on this subject, and in every proper way to co-operate with our fellow-citizens in sustaining the great interests of law and authority, of liberty and righteousness; be it therefore,

1. Resolved, That it is the deliberate judgment of this Synod that the rebellion against the constitutional Government of this land is most wicked in its inception, unjustifiable in its cause, unnatural in its character, inhuman in its prosecution, oppressive in its aims, and destructive in its results to the highest interests of morality and religion.

2. Resolved, That in the suppression of this rebellion, and in the maintenance of the Constitution and the Union by the sword, we recognize an unavoidable necessity and a sacred duty which the Government owes to the nation and to the world, and that, therefore, we call upon all our people to lift up holy hands in prayer to the God of battles, without personal wrath against the evil-doers on the one hand, and without doubting the righteousness of our cause on the other, that He would give wisdom to the President and his counsellors, and success to the army and navy, that our beloved land may speedily be delivered from treason and anarchy.

3. Resolved, That while we recognise this unhappy war as a righteous judgment of God, visited upon us because of the individual and national sins of which we have been guilty, we nevertheless regard this rebellion as more immediately the natural result of the continuance and spread of domestic slavery in our land, and, therefore, hail with unmingled joy the proposition of our Chief Magistrate, which has received the sanction of Congress, to extend aid from the General Government to any State in which slavery exists, which shall deem fit to initiate a system of constitutional emancipation.

4. Resolved, That we deeply sympathize with all loyal citizens and Christian patriots in the rebellious portions of our country, and we cordially invite their co-operation in offering united supplications at a Throne of Grace, that God would restore peace to our distracted country, re-establish fraternal relations between all the States, and make our land in all time to come the asylum of the oppressed, and the permanent abode of liberty and religion.

5. Resolved, That our devout thanks are due to Almighty God for the success which has crowned our arms, and while we praise and magnify his name for the help and succor he has graciously afforded to our land and naval forces, in enabling them to overcome our enemies, we regard these tokens of his divine favor as cheering indications of the final triumph of our cause.

A committee of five, consisting of Rev. Prof. Sternberg, Rev. Dr. Pohlman, Rev. Dr. G. A. Lintner, J. J. Cochran, and H. H. Van Dyke, was appointed to proceed to Washington, and present the same to President Lincoln with assurances of the heartfelt sympathy of the body in his arduous and responsible office.

SKETCHES FROM WASHINGTON.

Surely "the LORD is on our side." Surely the rebellion will be suppressed. And—never, never, never, can its lessons be forgotten. The sin of man, in whole, is a lesson for the universe, to all eternity; and the wickedness of this rebellion is a lesson for this world, to the end of the world. May the hurt of the serpent never be healed!

Yorktown evacuated, Williamsburg taken, the rebels still retreating, Richmond looming up in sight of three Union armies at the same moment! And then, in the Southwest, Corinth evacuated, and,—what next we must wait to see.

O that the eyes of our Southern brethren might be opened! Notwithstanding all their delusions, and prejudices, and hatreds, and barbarities, I can still honestly style them brethren, and wish nothing so much as their redemption. If ever, since the crucifixion of our LORD, there existed an insurrectionary people, of whom it might be said, "They know not what they do," certainly the people of our Southern States are they. Such deception as has been practised upon them the world never saw. It has taken thirty years to make the complex falsehood generally acceptable among them; but now it seems to be so, and, therefore, they fight to the death to throw off the best Government on which the sun ever shone, and to rivet upon themselves the chains of hopeless thraldom.

Yesterday CAPT. WORDEN, of the MONITOR, was in the Hall of Representatives, and received no little attention. I was happy to learn from him that he expects full renewal of his sight. He wears a shade over his eyes at present; has a modest face, bronzed by sun, sea, and air; looks comparatively healthy, firm, and vigorous; and may be blessed in the course of Providence, with the opportunities of readering his country good service.

Sabbath-worship, in the Capitol, is still sustained by large congregations; and, what is of far more importance, by manifest influences of the Holy Spirit, tending to the salvation of the people. Should not this interest be remembered in the prayers of Christians throughout the land? Here are gathered natives and foreigners representing, it may be, not only the States and Territories of our own Continent, but also, on some occasions, the general range of Christendom. The seed of the Gospel, distributed from this point, may be carried much farther than the seeds distributed by our Agricultural Bureau; receive planting in myriads of human hearts, instead of in different kinds of soil; and bring forth, not fruits, flowers, and vegetables, destined, however rare and valuable, to a short and merely earthly life, but the precious products of saving grace, born on earth to bloom in heaven, forever and ever.

I cannot but admire the course of our PRESIDENT. I see nothing of him, and hear very little. I have never gone alone, with friends, nor with the crowd to visit him; have asked no favor of him, received none, desired none; am no party politician, have no party interest or care, wish only the greatest good of our beloved land and nation. But, just for these reasons, that he keeps himself so quiet, simple, and humble; and devotes himself, as we all have evidence, so purely, so wisely, so patiently, so hopefully, so perseveringly, and so successfully to his high and holy mission, as our Chief Patriot Champion, in this Great Crisis of Republicanism, do I admire him. It is a great blessing that we have a President in whom we can confide as true and incorruptible. The LORD be his guardian and guide!

Religious Intelligence.

Congregational.—From a letter to the Banner of the Covenant, we learn that New York City has in it but four Congregational churches; one of them is Welsh, and one colored. Dr. J. P. Thompson is pastor of the third, and the notorious Dr. Cheever the fourth. His course at present, we are told, is to preach the Gospel in the morning of Sabbath, and Abolition at night.

The Congregational churches in the United States and the British Provinces are 2,672 in number, and ministers, 2,531; members, 247,634; Sabbath Scholars, 206,441.

They publish about ten weekly religious newspapers, and three quarterly reviews.

They have six Theological Seminaries, a Sabbath School Society, and a Board of Publications. The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, which is principally Congregational, has more than one hundred and fifty missionaries preaching Christ among the heathen.

The Southern Lutheran.—The March number of the Southern Lutheran has a look out article for an editor. They do not want a Northern man with Southern principles, but a bona fide Southern man, one who will go into all the measures of their Southern schemes and rebellion.

The Methodist Church in Pennsylvania has a membership of one hundred and five thousand—a gain of sixteen thousand in four years, and church property to the amount of two and a half million of dollars.

It is computed that there are forty-six thousand Methodists at least in the State of New Jersey—over twelve (12) per cent. of the entire adult population.

Reformed Dutch.—On Sabbath, 6th ult., seventy-five persons united with the North Church, Brooklyn, sixty-seven of them on confession. The pastor, Dr. Eimendorf, stated, at the service, that this, he had cause to hope, was but a part of the sheaves which in this blessed harvest were to be gathered. Several besides were rejoicing in Christ, who, for various reasons, had not, at this time, professed his name. And many anxious souls were still in attendance on the inquiry meetings, each one of the latter bringing to light some new proofs of the Spirit's presence in his convincing and converting grace. The work has only been in progress some seven or eight weeks. One hundred and five members have been admitted during the year, and the report to Classis this Spring shows four hundred and fifteen in communion. This church had its beginning with it present pastor in 1851.

Newberry College, S. C.—Rev. T. S. Bonnet is agent for this College. He reports the institution as having a goodly number of students, but in financial difficulties, and appeals to the Church to come up promptly to their help.

Capture of New Orleans.—The mystery surrounding the capture of New Orleans has been dispelled by the arrival of the Columbia from Havana. A terrific and almost unparalleled engagement, lasting six days, had taken place between our flotilla and the rebel forts and vessels, and had wrested an unconditional surrender from the panic-stricken enemy. The victory was not, as at first supposed, a bloodless one, our total loss being 114. The entire loss of the rebels is not known, but four hundred of them are reported captured. Eleven of the rebel gunboats had been destroyed. But two of our gunboats were sunk; the Mariad. Carlton, which was sunk by the guns of the fort, was a schooner of 178 tons. The Union gunboats Varuna had an engagement with the rebel steamer Webster, in which, after a desperate struggle, the two vessels sunk each other, going down together. The Varuna was a new vessel, mounting twelve 32-pounders, and two rifled pivot guns. She was built at the Westervelt yard, N. Y. city, and was commanded by Commander J. L. Boggs, a native of New Jersey, and formerly in command of the mail steamship Illinois. The crew of the Varuna consisted of 148 men. In response to a flag of truce, asking what terms would be demanded, Commodore Porter had informed the rebels that the surrender must be unconditional.

Battle of Williamsburg.—As we receive further accounts of the battle at Williamsburg, we become more impressed with its extent and desperate character, and of the glorious victory won by our troops. Being, as it was, the first battle on the peninsula—for the preceding encounters between the Union and rebel forces rose only to the dignity of skirmishes—it shows the kind of soldiers General McClellan's army is composed of, and to what a degree of drill and discipline they have attained. The battle commenced at an early hour on Monday morning, and was most fiercely contested until afternoon, the rebels being intrenched behind massive earthworks. At three o'clock General McClellan arrived upon the field with fresh troops, thus relieving General Hooker's division, which had borne the brunt of the battle with considerable loss, and driving the rebels from their position. The loss of the enemy was very great, seven hundred of their dead, and many wounded having been left on the field. Our loss is placed at seven hundred wounded, and three hundred killed.

Character of the War in Virginia.—The military operations now being conducted in Virginia are of the most thrilling and wonderful character. The war for the Union increases in interest each day, and as the climax of a complete triumph of its defenders is approached, the ease of the contending armies, the magnitude of their operations, their activity, and the splendor of the achievements of the Union troops, are all enhanced. Whole volumes would not minutely record the events of the last week, and one of the grandest themes of the future historians of our country will be the evacuation of Yorktown, the battles of Williamsburg and West Point, the hot pursuit of the Secessionists by Gen. McClellan's victorious army, the terrific attack made on Sewall's Point by our fleet, under the eye of the President, the capture of Norfolk, and the grand denouement of the destruction of the Merrimac.

Gen McClellan's Advance.—General McClellan's army continues its victorious advance, and at three o'clock on Saturday afternoon the van was within twenty-two miles of the rebel capital.

Glorious News.—Norfolk Surrendered to the United States Troops.—Portsmouth and the Navy Yard Repossessed.—The Merrimac Blown up and Burned.—WASHINGTON, May 11th, 1862.—The following was received at the War Department this morning.

Fortress Monroe, May 10, 12 o'clock at night.—Norfolk is ours, and also Portsmouth and the navy yard.

General Wool, having completed the landing of his forces at Willoughby Point, about 9 o'clock this morning, commenced his march on Norfolk with 5,000 men.

Secretary Chase accompanied the General.

About 3 miles from the landing place, a rebel battery was found on the opposite side of the bridge, over Tanner's creek. After a few discharges of companies of infantry, the rebels burned the bridge. This compelled our forces to march around five miles further. At five o'clock in the afternoon our forces were within a short distance of Norfolk, and were met by a delegation of citizens and the city formally surrendered. Our troops marched in and we now have possession.

General Viele is in command as military governor. The city and navy yard were not burnt. The fires which have been seen for some hours proved to be the woods on fire.

General Wool, with Secretary Chase, returned about 11 o'clock to-night.

General Huger withdrew his forces without a battle.

Com. Rogers' expedition was heard from this afternoon ascending the James river.

The reports from Gen. McClellan are favorable.

EDWIN M. STANTON.

The following has just been received:

Fortress Monroe, May 11.—To the Hon. P. H. Watson, Assistant Secretary of War. The Merrimac was blown up by the rebels at two minutes before five o'clock this morning. She was on fire to about three o'clock. The explosion took place at the time stated. It is said to have been a grand sight by those who saw it.

The Monitor, Stevens, and the gunboats have gone up towards Norfolk.

E. S. SANFORD, Military Supervisor.

Commodore Porter off Mobile!—The Petersburg (Va.) Express, of the 9th instant, publishes the following important despatch:

"Mobile, May 8th.—The advance of Commodore Porter's fleet, consisting of seven vessels, are off Fort Morgan. Ten more are off Horn Island, moving eastward."

A Diamond Wedding.—The Amherst, Mass., Express contains an account of a rare celebration on the 17th inst., the 75th anniversary of the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Asa Raymond, of Shutesbury, near Amherst. Mr. Raymond is now in his 95th year, and Mrs. Raymond in her 94th. A large party of children and grand children assembled on the anniversary at the house of the aged couple, bearing presents, flowers, bridal wreaths, China service, silver and gold goblets, diamond jewels, &c. Such an occasion is worthy of a special record.

The New York Legislature has passed a very stringent law to prevent farm stock from running on the highways. It provides a scale of fines and fees for which the trespassing animal may be seized and sold, and which the owner must pay to redeem it.

In a Divorce Suit, at New York, brought by Mary Ann Singer against Isaac M. Singer, the noted sewing machine needle patentee, the court ordered her an allowance of $4,000 per annum alimony, and her counsel a fee of $750. It was given in evidence that Singer's income was $200,000 a year.

Gen. Scott recently gave the following reminiscence of his earlier life:

"When I resided in Richmond, Va., the Rev. Dr. Buchanan of that city, of the Episcopal Church, and the Rev. Dr. Blair, Presbyterian, were accustomed to associate on terms of the utmost intimacy and harmony. They were always together when their duties permitted. Dr. Buchanan was unmarried, and possessed a large estate, while his friend, Dr. Blair, with a family, was of limited means. Dr. Buchanan used to give all his wedding-fees to Dr Blair; and having during his lifetime lent him several thousand dollars in the days of his necessity, cancelled all these obligations in his last will and testament."

Congress Stampeded.—For fear of accidents on the railroad, the stampeded Congress left yesterday in a number of the strongest and newest canal boats. These boats are drawn by mules of approved sweetness of temper. To protect the stampeders from the snakes and bull frogs that abound along the line of the canal, Gen. Winder has detailed a regiment of ladies to march in advance of the mules and clear the tow-path of the pirates. The regiment is armed with pop-guns of the longest range. Two fifers will accompany the stampeders to a secluded cave in the mountains of Hopedam, and leave them there in charge of the children of the vicinage, until McClellan thinks proper to let them come forth. The ladies return in the defence of their country.—Richmond Whig, April 22.

The Richmond Examiner, of the 22d, says, in effect:—"The destiny of the Confederacy is trembling on the result at Yorktown. If we are successful, it will give us six months for carrying out the conscription act, arming and equipping a large army, and in building a fleet of Merrimacs; but, if unsuccessful, Virginia is lost.

Fighting Clergymen.—The Southwestern Baptist, published at Tuskegee, Ala., says:—We suppose, from the best information we have, that at least one-half of our active pastors are now in the army."

Interesting Document.—The Boston Atheneum has come into possession of the original parchment of one of those seven or eight sub-covenants that were concentrated with the well-known Solemn League and Covenant, signed at Edinburgh in 1643. The parchment is dim with age, written in the ordinary engrossing text, and was the one signed at Glasgow, 1638, and bears the bold signature of Montrose, and some two hundred and fifty others, noblemen and commoners. It has been carefully and handsomely mounted, and forms now an interesting addition to the library catalogue.

Personal.

Thurlow Weed is still in Paris, but leaves in a few days for Holland, thence leaving for England and the United States.

The famous Arctic voyager, Admiral Sir J. C. Ross, is dead, in his 62d year.

Rev. Henry Grattan Guinness, the young Irish preacher, has gone on a tour to the Holy Land, his health having failed from incessant pulpit ministrations.

A son of Sam. Houston, of Texas, was wounded at the Pittsburg battle, and is now a prisoner at St. Louis. Pierre Soule's son is also a prisoner.

Rev. J Wheeler, D. D., President of the University of Vermont, died at Burlington on the 16th ult., aged sixty-four years. Deceased was highly esteemed, and ranked among the foremost men in the State.

Rev. Dr Wentworth.—The doctor arrived in the Samuel Russell on the 3d inst., accompanied by Mrs. Wentworth, whose health required, as her physicians advised, that she quit China at once.

Mr. Slidell is closeted nearly every day with some of the firm of Rothschild, at their banking-house, in the Rue Lafitte, Paris, and is endeavoring to negotiate a loan on behalf of the Confederate States. He is likewise said to be worth three hundred thousand dollars, which he invested, before he "left his country for his country's good," in English and French securities, thus showing that he never intends to return to the "green land he left behind."

Rev. Dr. Bangs, of New York, died May 3d. He was 85 years old, had been 61 years in the ministry of the Methodist Church, and a resident of New York city for 50 years.

Commodore Foote is more seriously ill than has been represented. The wound in his leg, owing to neglect and excessive labors, is much inflamed, and threatens his side. Now, not only his limb, but his life also is in danger.

The Hon. C. C. Cambreling, for eighteen years a member of Congress from this city, and Minister to Russia during the Presidency of Mr. Van Buren, died on April 30th, at West Neck, L. I., aged 70.

PERRY & FITZGERALD'S

PROCESS FOR MAKING LIGHT, NUTRITIOUS, AND UNADULTERATED BREAD, WITHOUT FERMENTATION.

The new process of bread-making, patented by Perry & Fitzgerald, rests on all the principles which have hitherto rendered it impossible to manufacture perfectly pure, sweet and nutritious bread. The entire process is performed by mechanical means, and is eminently cleanly.

The process considers in mixing the flour in a closed vessel, and the application of pure carbonic acid, under pressure, by which the dough came to be thoroughly light, and ready to be thrust into pans, for baking, in the brief space of fifteen or twenty minutes. The "sponge" is usually 30 pounds, and such marking comprises the operation, in all its details, from the putting in of the flour to the discharging of the dough, in from twenty five to forty minutes.

The Invention of Perry & Fitzgerald affects a revolution in the preparation of bread, by establishing a system of wholesome manufacture not subject to the vicissitudes and evils of fermentation, but exact and certain in its results.—A. Sherman, by the substitution of mechanical for manual labor, and to the superior value of the article produced, it promises large profits upon the capital employed. A thousand such establishments, as well as the present one, could be supplied by the patent, giving adequate security against competition. But whilst preventing undue competition it produces none of the evils of a monopoly, because it leaves the consumer at all times in possession of his former means of supply, to be resorted to, should the monopolist become prejudicial.

The application of pure carbonic acid gas, under pressure, to a mechanically kneaded dough-mass, as in the invention of Perry & Fitzgerald, did not occur to Dr Dye, though he seems to have had a clear foreshadowing of the true nature of the artificial aid to the gas, from the states, hypothetically, that "If water, highly impregnated with carbonic acid gas, be used for kneading the dough-mass, the resulting bread will become surprisingly tender, light, and nutritious."—So produced in this way, then, as the sugar would remain undecomposed, the bread would be no more than the genuine article.

What, indeed, is the vast scientific and clearly comprehended chemical truth, but has been practically developed by the brilliant invention of Perry & Fitzgerald. Posterity will hold their names in grateful remembrance, as one of the most eminent benefactors to mankind.

ITS SUPERIORITY.—The superiority of unfermented bread to by no means new. Dr Cullen, who wrote more than seventy years ago, said:—

"In Scotland nine tenths of the lower class of people, and the is the greater part of the whole, live upon unfermented bread, a unfermented bread is in fact more wholesome, and there are not a healthy people anywhere to be found. In the course of fifty years, that I have practised among them, I have had occasion to know this, and have hardly met with a disease, of any consequence, that I could impute to the use of unfermented farinaceous."

At a later period, Professor Thompson, of Glasgow, in his work on the "Food of Animals," after alluding to the fact referred to above by Dr Cullen, and other kindred facts, observes:—

"Such, then, being sufficient evidence in fav r of the wholesomeness of unfermented bread, it becomes important to the inquirer in respect it differs from fermented bread. The result arrived by this process seems to be, that we are enabled to use the whole grain, and the particles of which the flour is composed are thus rendered the more easily divisible by the proper ory organs of digestion. But, on this object is gained at a sacrifice of the nutritive matter of the grain, it becomes a matter of interest to ascertain the amount of the loss sustained in the process."

The result of Professor Thompson's experiments showed a difference in favor of unfermented bread of nearly seven per cent. over that made by the ordinary process. In other words, there was a loss of over one sixteenth of the nutritive properties of the flour, which, by the process of fermentation, was lost in the air and bad.

We see in this a very particular evidence in favor of the superiority of the Bread made without fermentation, as the use of chemical agents, over the Bread made by these processes. Although, from the data we have been added, this superiority appears in small yield contrast, yet the public will be better satisfied to have the points stated specifically, for it only needs that the advantages secured by this method be clearly understood in order to its universal introduction in the manufacture of Bread.

I. ITS CLEANLINESS.—Instead of the dough being mixed by the naked hands or feet (the bread, from the melting of the flour to the completion of the baking, is not, and scarcely can be, touched by any one. "One deliberation attained in its manufacture," says Dr Wilson Parker, "is its entire cleanliness." Says Dr Waverley: "The process is not only purely scientific, but pre-eminently cleanly."

II. ITS PRESERVATION OF ALL THE NUTRITIOUS PROPERTIES OF THE FLOUR.—As the raising of the dough is by the mechanical introduction of pure carbonic acid gas, under pressure, in a closed vessel or receiver, it takes a perfect equivalent or no any texture. All the constituents of the flour remain wholly unchanged, while the process of raising bread by fermentation inevitably sacrifices some of them, as has been already shown.

III. ITS UNIFORM CHARACTER.—Bread made by the New Process is uniformly light, sweet, and nutritious. The conditions being simple, and not liable to variation, no failure can occur in always producing bread of the same quality. It retains its moisture much longer than fermented bread, and may be eaten warm with impunity. The process also insures a perfect freedom from all acidity, even in the hottest weather. Says the Leader, Pennsylvania:—"The objectionable consequences of fermentation being avoided, the constituents of the flour are left both unchanged and uncontaminated, the resulting loaf being also wholesome."

IV. ITS WHOLESOMENESS.—Being free from the deleterious substances which are the product of fermentation or chemical operations, by the old modes, the bread made by the New Process is easy of digestion, and agrees with the most delicate stomach. "No dyspepsia," says Dr Cox, late of the N. Y. Medical College, "will be invariable as they will be able to use it when the fermented manufactured bread has been found to have speedily failed as an article of diet." Says the Leader, in Medical Times and Gazette:—"Since the late decision of the new unleavened bread, there have already been received from members of the medical profession, who have recommended it in their practice as well as from many personal sources, accounts of the really astonishing results that have followed its use in cases of deranged digestion and confirmed debility. Many persons have regained their recovery to health after years of suffering and misery, by the simple use of the bread as a diet. Many cases have also been reported by medical men of positive, in which certain distressing forms of dyspepsia, which had remained irremovable under every kind of treatment, have yielded to it by magic, almost immediately after adopting the use of the unfermented bread."

The beneficial effects of the new bread are attributable to two causes. The one to the absence of the prejudicial matters imparted to ordinary bread by the process of fermentation, and the other to the presence in the bread, unchanged, of those elements which are the essential agents of digestion, as I mentioned."

The most eminent members of the medical profession, both in Great Britain and in the United States, not only speak in the highest terms of the one end which it is designed, and so far as, nourishing qualities, but especially of its peculiar palatableness and wonderful laughing properties. The absence of acidity and other strong flavors, which, in a greater or less degree, are obnoxious properties of fermented bread, renders the new bread particularly delicate to the taste.

V. ITS ECONOMY AND ECONOMY.—By the use of mechanical means instead of manual labor, a barrel of flour is converted into baked loaves in forty-five minutes. Whereas, by the ordinary process, four or five hours are occupied in the operation of the "sponge," and a further time in kneading, raising, and baking the dough.

"The steadiness of the consumption of bread," says a correspondent of the Journal of the Society of Arts, "renders it an article peculiarly suitable to be prepared and supplied by a public company. And since the new process removes all the objections of manufacture, and the expense of the machinery gives a comparative monopoly, the supply of bread is placed at once in the same category with gas, water, or other articles of prime necessity."

OLD AS THE PATRIARCHS

[illegible] declare with all the laws of hu[illegible] told, cannot ever have lived more than 150, or, at the most, 200 years; and a document which assigns them lives of 300, 600, 800, and even 900 years, must be unhistorical, and is either, in respect of its numbers, worthless, or to be ex[illegible] another of the "infallible sciences," which are [illegible] guidance at the present day, but for our intellectual belief as to the occurrences of all past ages. In truth, however, the science of physiology has not spoken on the point before us. Its problem has been, not what length of time it is possible for man ever to have lived, but how long it is possible for him now to live under the present circumstances of the earth, and in the present [illegible] this question it can only answer empirically. It finds the body to be a machine which wears out by use; but it fails to discover any definite rate at which the process of wearing out must proceed. In this difficulty, comparative physiology does not help it, for the law of longevity in the brute creation is capricious in the extreme. All the proposed standards of measurement—the period of gestation, the time occupied in growth, the size of the full grown body—when applied to species severally, fail in certain instances. Physiology then can only say: These human bodies are mortal; death is inevitable; and, so far as modern testimony goes, men do not seem now able to resist the tendency to decay beyond the term of 150, or at the utmost, 200 years. But the possible duration of life, when the species was but recently created, and had its vigor unimpaired by the taint of hereditary disease, is beyond the cognizance of physiological science, which, by the mouth of its most celebrated professors, declines to pronounce a positive judgment. The great Haller, when led to speak on the subject, declared the problem one which could not be solved, on account of the absence of sufficient data, while Buffon accepted the Scriptural account, and thought he could see physical reasons why life should in the early ages have been so greatly extended.

THE TWO DOCTORS OF MEDICINE.

It is a favorite doctrine with some philosophers that every poison in nature has its antidote, and every disease its specific medicine. A similar system of checks and balances is observable in the providential government of God, and social vices, and moral and religious heresies rarely fail to be followed by spiritual agencies of renovating power. If a great genius devotes himself to the defence of error, another genius will soon appear in the support of truth. If wit is prostituted to ridicule religion, it stimulates equal wit to adorn and commend it.

We have found an incidental illustration of this theory, in the pleasure with which we have read Spare Hours, by John Brown, M. D., of Edinburgh, Scotland. In many particulars he reminds one of O. W. Holmes, M D., of our own city. Like him, he is the son of a clergyman, beloved for his virtues, and honored for his talents and industry. Like him, he is a special favorite in a large literary circle, and the generous culture and genial companionship of Edinburgh find their counterpart in the Athens of New England. Like him, too, he is gifted with a sportive humor, a ready wit, and a style of rare grace and fascination.

But here the resemblance ceases, and the religious character and influence come in open contrast. Dr. Holmes has no faith in the inspiration of the Bible. Dr. Brown is a devout believer. Dr. Holmes has little reverence in his nature, while Dr. Brown is filled with awe by the presence of the invisible, and the consciousness of inscrutable mystery everywhere. Dr. Holmes loves to use his sharpest wit in assailing evangelical religion. Dr. Brown brings an inexhaustible degree of humor to the illustration and adornment of true piety, and reserves his sarcasms for vice and irreligion.

It may be hoped that many lovers of light literature will find in the Edinburgh physician, an antidote for the skepticism of the Boston doctor. He has, perhaps, less of sparkling wit, but a richer vein of humour, less of self-consciousness, a tenderer sympathy, and a larger charity than his trans-Atlantic brother. He may not dazzle so much at a first perusal, but will give a higher satisfaction, and make a deeper impression at a second. When many have been ready to bow at that genius, and culture, and wit monopolized by the so-called "liberal school," it is pleasant to find all these enlisted in defence of the sturdy Scotch Presbyterianism so often ridiculed. Our readers who have been repelled from Dr. Holmes by his skepticism, will find amusement and quickening in the pages of Dr. Brown.—Watchman and Reflector.

SINGING FISH

M De Thoron has addressed a curious communication to the Paris Academy of Sciences, on the subject of certain singing fish that inhabit the seas, as well as the rivers of South America. He specially mentions the bay of Pallon, situated north of the province of Esmeraldas, in the Republic of Ecuador, where, being in a boat, he was suddenly startled by a deep humming noise, which he at first attributed to some large insect, but which, upon inquiry, turned out to be a kind of fish called musicus by the people of the country. On proceeding further, the sounds became so strong as to remind him of the strains of a church organ. These fish live both in salt and in fresh water, since they are also met with in the river Metaje. They are not more than ten inches long, their color is white, sprinkled with blue spots, and they will continue their music for hours, without minding any interruption.

STEEL PENS

The process of making steel pens is said to be as follows:—1. The steel is rolled into sheets of the thickness of a pen. 2. These sheets are cut into slips three feet long and four inches broad. 3. The slips are annealed, that is, softened by heating them very hot, and letting them get cool very slowly. 4. They are cleaned, and rolled smooth again. 5. The strips, by means of a stamping machine, are cut into pieces large enough for pens. 6. The hole which terminates the slit is pierced. 7. The pen is shaped so far as to cut away the superfluous metal. 8. The maker's name is stamped on each pen. 9. The pen is bent into its final form, which is done by stamping. 10. The pens are heated red-hot, and suddenly cooled in oil, which restores them to the hardness of steel. 11. They are cleaned of the oil. 12. They are polished in a revolving barrel containing fine sand. 13. The nib is ground. 14. The slit is made by stamping. 15. They are colored brown or blue by subjecting them to fumes of charcoal. 16. They are glossed by immersing them in a solution of lac and naphtha. 17. They are counted and put [illegible] with such rapidity, and on so large a scale, that tolerable steel pens can be bought in Sheffield, by wholesale, as cheap as fourpence for 144 pens, or nine for a farthing.

THE DUKE AND THE TOAD

The following anecdote, which we take, from an English paper, contains a deep lesson:—

The great Duke of Wellington had noticed for several mornings, while standing at a window overlooking the park, a lad eight years old, or thereabouts, stooping down at the butt of an elm tree, and apparently feeding some creature who lived in it. So wondering what the boy could be doing, one morning the Duke went out to see.

"What have you there, my lad?" he said.

"My toad," the boy said. "I come every morning to give him some breakfast."

"Indeed," said the Duke, "that is an odd fancy; boys do not often make pets of toads."

"O! I have done so," replied the lad, not knowing whom he was talking to, "all my holidays. But I am going to school to-morrow, and I shall not be able to feed the poor little fellow any more.

[illegible] will call Arthur Vyse, and, stooping down, the Duke saw the bright eyes of the toad glittering out of the darkness of a hole from which a knurr had fallen.

"Well," said the Duke, "tell me who you are, and where you are going; I will see that your toad is fed. I live near to here, and I can send him food now and then."

"Oh, thank you!" said the boy, with beaming eyes; and so they parted. About a month afterwards a letter came to the school for Arthur with these words in it—

"Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington, thinks [illegible] toad is in good health. It has been regularly fed [illegible] when Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington fed [illegible]

RUSSELL AND MACAULAY

We find in the London Saturday Review a [illegible] damaging [illegible] Macaulay and [illegible] respectively.

"A page of Macaulay is something physically different to look at from a page of a real writer. There are no small capitals, no italics, no inverted commas, except, of course, when the narrative happens to record a dialogue. A foreign word, a fragment of a foreign sentence, is a thing utterly unknown. Compare such a page of pure English with a page of one of our modern smart writers. Here is a [illegible] in inverted commas, a tag from Shakspeare or a tag from Horace; here is a word or two of Latin; here is a word or two of French. These last are generally mere excuses of idleness. It is partly because the writer thinks that Latin and French scraps show off his scholarship, but it is still more, because it is often easier to use them in this way than to translate them into pure English. The writings of the great Special Correspondent exhibit the lowest depth which language can reach in this way. It is hard to find two sentences together which are wholly Mr Russell's own making. Here is a bit of a Latin poet, there is a bit of an English one; here an easy bit of French, there an easy bit of Spanish. After this kind of rubbish, the mere physical look of a page of Macaulay is a hardly less relief to the eye than its contents are a consolation to the understanding."

EARLY PLOWING.

Farmers should be cautious as to plowing their lands too early in the spring, before they become sufficiently dry. Many a field has been sadly injured for the season in this way, and no after treatment will atone for it. In harrowing, small lumps will be the result, rather than fine pulverization. A good rule to be observed is, not to plow when the soil slips off the mould of the plow smoothly, and fails to fall down and crumble. Soils of a clayey nature, of course, are most liable to be thus injured; those with a large proportion of sand always being in a more light and friable state.

The same remarks will apply to the use of the roller, great caution being necessary in the use of this valuable implement on soils not decidedly light. The writer, a few years since, sadly injured a field of clay loam by rolling, so as to nearly lose the season's crop. Indeed, the roller is especially adapted to light soils and lawns, and should rarely be allowed elsewhere.

A QUEER INSECT

Tennent's Natural History of Ceylon gives an account of the Rotifer, a singular creature, which, though it can only truly live in water, inhabits the moss on housetops, dying each time the sun dries up its place of retreat, to revive as often as a shower of rain supplies it with the moisture essential to its existence—thus employing several years to exhaust the eighteen days of life which nature has allotted to it. One savant kept some dead rotifers for twenty-seven years, without moistening in any way the substance in which they lay, and at the end of that time they recovered, upon being immersed in a little water. This must surely have been more satisfactory to them than if they had lived their little span of life all at once.

CHINESE WISE WORDS

The Chinese are very fond of reading. Scraps from authors are put up everywhere, upon public and private buildings, upon shops and temples. Enter the poorest house in the most miserable village, and though you will find a want of the commonest necessaries of life, you will be sure to see some beautiful maxims written upon scrolls of red paper. China might, in a sense, be called an enormous library. These maxims are often finely worded, and full of sense. Here is a specimen:

"One day is worth three, to him who does everything in time."

"Great minds have purposes; others have only wishes."

"Who is the greatest liar? He who talks most of himself."

"We can do without the world, but we need a friend."

"My books speak to my mind, my friend to my heart, heaven to my soul, and all the rest to my ears."

It is this taste for reading which we hope much from, as a means of Christianizing China, when the Bible, and Christian books and tracts, shall freely and generally circulate throughout her vast empire.—Church of England Sabbath School Magazine.

ODDS AND ENDS

Prentice says there is no braver soul on earth than the soul of our Foote.

Prentice asks why is Gen. Floyd like one of the loyal generals upon the Potomac? Because he is a General Hooker.

Prof. F. D Sanborn, formerly of Dartmouth College, writes from St. Louis that Flag Officer Foote prays as though God did everything and fights as though man did everything.

A Nashville paper says that "a few steel cannon are wanted at Bowling Green." We guess that Floyd, if a little inducement were offered him, could steal the iron ones!

The great Eastern, the grand Mogul of sailing craft, is to be converted into a bath-house or floating hospital. It has died of plethora, or what Carlyle styles a kind of "too-muchness."

Beauregard's victory at Pittsburg Landing is very much like that described by John Phœnix. He says: "I held the enemy down by my nose, which I inserted between his teeth for that purpose."

A bar of iron worth $5 may be manufactured into horse shoes worth $10,50; into nails worth $55; into pen-knife blades worth $3,285; into shirt buttons worth $29,180; and into balance springs of watches worth $250,000.

"Do you think," asked Mrs. Pepper, rather sharply, "that a little temper is a bad thing for a woman?" "Certainly not, ma'am," replied the gallant philosopher; "it is a good thing, and she ought never to lose it."

Among the excuses offered for exemption in the drafting in Georgia, some are extremely ludicrous. In Smyth county, one man, in enrolling himself, wrote opposite his name, "one leg two short." The next man that came in, noticing the excuse, and deeming it pretty good, thought he would make his better, and wrote opposite his name, "[illegible]"

Muggins was passing up street, one day, with a friend, when he observed a poor dog, that had been killed, lying in the gutter. Muggins paused, and said, "There is another shipwreck." "Shipwreck! where?" "There's a bark that's lost forever." His companion growled, and passed on.

It is easy enough to make sacrifices for those we love; but for our enemy, we have to struggle, [illegible]

Isaac Mason.—All that we read is not gospel. Buffon, Goldsmith and others tell us that flying insects like mosquitoes, locusts, and so on, make the humming noise they do by beating the air with their wings. It's all a mistake. They sing just like ourselves, only their vocal organs are deposited not in their throats, but along the sides of their bodies. They use (so the microscope assures us) a wind pipe, the outlet of which is furnished with a vibrating valve like that employed on the accordeon: but then a man has only one of these arrangements, while most insects have at least a dozen, and through each of the dozen as they fly, the air is made to rush with prodigious effect, and some degree of melody.

Family Circle.

MY BIRD

Ere last year's moon had left the sky
A birdling sought my Indian nest,
And bolded, oh so lovingly!
Her tiny wings upon my breast.

From morn till evening's purple tinge,
In winsome boldness was she hers;
Two rose-leaves with a silken fringe,
Shut softly on her starry eyes.

There's not in Ind a lovelier bird;
Broad earth owns not a happier nest;
[illegible]
Whose waters never more shall rest!

This beautiful mysterious thing,
[illegible]
This bird with an immortal wing,
To me—to me, Thy hand has given.

The pulse first caught its tiny stroke,
The blood its crimson hue, from mine—
This life which I have dared invoke.
Thenceforth to parallel with Thine.

A silent awe is in my room—
I tremble with delicious fear;
The future with its light and gloom
Time and eternity, are here.

[illegible]
Heart, [illegible] prayer
Room for my bird in Paradise,
And give her angel plumage there!

KITTY AND "PLEASE"

Kitty had of late got a bad tone to her voice. It was a tone of command, very unbecoming a little girl. Instead of saying, "Will you be kind [illegible] or "Will you?" in a gentle tone, she said, "Do this," or "Do that," like a little tyrant. Her mother, as you may well think, was very sorry, and talked with her little girl about this new fault.

One day her shoe came off while she was playing. When it was near dinner-time, she called Bridget to put it on.

"Bridget," she said, "I want my shoe on. Put it on quick, for my pa will come soon."

Bridget was doing something in the closet, and did not immediately come out.

"Bridget," she called again, "don't you hear me? Come, and put my shoe on."

Her mother was in the next room, and overhearing her little daughter, said,

"Say please," Kitty, and Bridget shall put your shoe on."

Kitty pouted, but did not speak. She took her shoe, sat down on the floor, and tried to put it on, herself, which was all very well, had she not done it angrily, for children ought always to help themselves. Kitty tugged and tugged at her shoe; but her little fat foot having grown fatter since the shoe was bought, it fitted in hard, in fact Kitty could not get the shoe on.

Soon she heard her papa's step in the entry, and began to cry.

"Bridget will help you, Kitty," said her mother, looking into the chamber; "ask her, my child."

But Kitty looked "No I sha'n't," though she did not say so in so many words. The dinner-bell rang.

"You can stay here, Kitty, until you can ask Bridget properly to put on your shoe;" and her mother went down stairs.

Kitty turned very red, and burst out into a hard, angry fit of crying. Then she got up, ran into a little dressing room, and shut the door. O, naughty, foolish Kitty. How much trouble she was making herself, and how grieved her parents were to see no dear little Kitty in her own high chair at the table, and for such a reason [illegible]

By and by her papa came up stairs, and not finding her in her mother's room, went to the little room.

"Where, is my Kitty?" he asked, in a sad, sorry tone.

The little girl jumped up from the corner, and going towards him, said,

"O papa, 'please' wouldn't come out of my throat; it staid there; it 'most choked me; but maybe it will now."

She took courage and said; keeping on the shoe, went to find Bridget: and when she found Bridget, she said,

"Please, Bridget, put my shoe on a naughty little girl's foot."

Bridget did it very willingly. Then she ran down stairs, and throwing her arms round her mother's neck, said with a sorry and glad tear in her eye,

"Mamma, 'please' did stay in my throat so long as it felt big, and 'most choked me; but mamma, it's out, and I think it will come out quick next time. Please kiss me, mamma. I'm very sorry."

Kitty did not get choked so again. She found it easy to say "please" afterwards. And please made the little girl a great many friends.—Kitty King.

WHAT SHALL I WEAR?

THE MOTHER'S STORY.

Out in the woods, where trees and flowers grow, and insects hum and hum, and birds sing all day long, there was once a large tree as full of nests as it could hold. And these nests were full of eggs, small and speckled, and blue and white. Over each nest there presided two winged creatures, whose property it was; they were awaiting the day when instead of eggs they should have young birds of their own. They expected nothing less than to see these young birds fly from tree to tree and bough to bough as they had done themselves in the days of their own infancy; free as the air they breathed and joyous as the sunshine. They were to have no cares those little birds of theirs. O no, for cares are not meant for babies. They were never to ask what shall we eat? what shall we drink? what shall we wear? for food and drink and clothing were to be provided them by parental love. But hardly were the little creatures out of the shell than they began to thrust their heads out of their nests to see how their [illegible]

"Eat this worm, my darling," said the mother, as she came flying home with this delicious morsel in her beak.

"I cannot stop to eat," replied the young bird "I am trying to see what our neighbors have on. I am almost sure they have streaks of orange and black on their heads. If they have, it must be the fashion, and I shall choose to wear the same."

"I hope you don't intend to imitate those [illegible] about the fashions. Now there are the Robins! they dress in the sweetest way! Brown and Red. They go to town quite often, and I know they would be particular to get whatever was new."

"For my part," said a third, "I think a dove color, with a shade of green about the throat, and a patch of pure white on each side the neck, is the very latest style. I have seen at least a dozen such costumes, and they are perfectly lovely."

"But I have seen the Blue Jays this very morning!" cried the fourth, "dressed in gray, with trimmings of black and white, blue crossed with black, on the shoulders, and such a splendid head-dress! I could not help speaking to one of them and asking her if hers was the last style."

"And what did she say?" cried the three sisters, eagerly.

"She said something I did not quite understand, about its being her style, but whether the last or the first, she did not care."

"O she is all out of fashion, you may depend, then," said the three sisters. "Her style indeed! As if any of us had a right to set up for a style of our own!"

"It is very tiresome," said the fourth sister, "that we cannot find out what to wear. Every hour of delay is ruinous. Why, our dresses are a [illegible] when we get [illegible]

"Indeed sister, to tell you the truth, I should not wonder if mamma had ordered them all made like hers!" said the youngest.

"Brown and white!" cried all the birds in chorus; and they flapped their wings and held up their claws for want of hands, with which to express their horror.

"Mamma is so old fashioned!" said the eldest, who had a right to speak maturely, as she had been out of the shell nearly twelve hours.

"O mamma!" interrupted Clara, "I never called you old-fashioned!"

"Indeed, my dear, I hope not," returned her mother, smiling.

"Go on, mamma, please go on," said the younger children. "What did their mother say when she heard her little birds talking so?"

"She was almost speechless with surprise. She sat on the edge of the nest with the worm in her mouth, turning her head now this way and now that, at last she cried—

"What misfortune has befallen me? Such birds as you, are surely no children of mine."

"Indeed, mamma, we must be your children, for we were hatched in this very nest under your very wings!" they cried.

"You were changed in the egg! changed in the egg!" said the mother. "Some other bird has robbed me of my eggs and placed her own in their place! Why what talk is this I have been hearing! Unfledged birds studying the fashions! Creatures a day old too busy to eat!"

"Don't be so troubled, mamma," replied her daughters, coolly. "We are no worse than all the other birds in this neighborhood. If you go to the nest next door, you'll hear just such talk as you hear in your own. All young birds in these days are alike. We have spoken to most of our neighbors, and they all agree with us."

"But the mothers are almost all old fashioned," remarked the eldest, "My friend Miss Jenny Wren, says her mother declares that all young birds have to do is to fly from tree to tree, singing and enjoying themselves."

"The idea of birds of our age singing and fly ing," cried the nest-full! "We, who haven't a thing to wear, and who, if we were invited out, should have to decline going for want of dresses!"

"You foolish creatures!" cried the mother, "do not you know that your dresses are already provided for you! Cease this silly talk, and wait in patience till you are old enough to go out."

"I hope you have ordered something pretty for us," said the eldest.

"Something of a delicate brown lighted up with red," said the second.

"Or dove color trimmed with green and white," said the third.

"Or gray set off with blue!" urged the fourth.

"You may as well turn into peacocks and done with it!" said their father, who flying home with another worm, was scandalized to find no mouth open to receive it. "You forget yourselves, children. "Your mother's judgment is to guide yours, and her taste, I am happy to say, is very simple. Brown dresses, with a touch of white, she has always worn, and such as you will wear after her."

The young birds were sufficiently in awe of their father to hold their peace, and they were by this time so hungry that they were each anxious for the worm that had been brought home to them. In process of time they all appeared in "plain brown gowns," neat and well-fitted, but without ornament.

"It is time for you to fly, my children," said their mother, at last. "See how gayly all the birds sing on the boughs and hop from branch to branch. Go forth with them and sport as they do, and leave all anxious cares to your father and to me."

The birds remained silent and pensive.

"We are not fit to go," they said at last.

"You are neatness itself," returned their mother. "[illegible] dressed."

"We care!" they all cried.

"I don't think I do," said the youngest, perching on the edge of the nest and looking, with longing eyes, at the joyous flight of her neighbors.

"I've a good mind to fly off and play with the rest. I do not believe they will mind my dress."

"Indeed they won't!" said the mother, earnestly. "Or if they do, what then?"

"Sure enough, what then!" cried little Miss Matts, and so saying, she spread her wings and flew gayly away, singing as she flew.

"She has a splendid voice!" said her sisters, stretching up their necks to look after her.

"And look! she has already found friends!"

"I declare, all those Wrens that I always thought so aristocratic, are talking with her!"

"And all the Doves are cooing to her!" cried her sister.

"But the Blue Jays are watching her as if they were not sure whether she is fit to associate with them," said the fourth.

"The Blue Jays are an unsocial family," replied her mother. "They would treat a Bird of Paradise just as they treat your little sister. Her dress has nothing whatever to do with it."

"She certainly is getting into good society," said the elder sisters, looking at each other with [illegible]

"And so may you, my daughters, if you will only imitate her simplicity, and fly freely to mingle with those who are able to judge you by something beyond your dress. You have each of you fine voices, and gay spirits, and I cannot help hoping that under your childish folly, lies a little good sense. Come, forget your brown gowns, and join that merry flock on the next tree."

"I don't know. Won't the other birds whisper [illegible]

"If we only had gay head dresses!" sighed the other.

"If you had, every bird would know you were in borrowed plumage," said their mother. "Everybody knows what my views are and what my style is; nobody will admire you for setting up ways of your own, unless it be two or three silly creatures just out of the shell."

"Come! let us go!" cried they all. And with out another word they all spread their wings and flew away, and as their sister had done they sang as they flew.

THE DAUGHTERS' STORY.

DREAMING AND DOING

Daniel Archer and Luke Langer were cousins, and were both of the same age. They went to the same day school, and began to learn cyphering in the same quarter. Two years passed away, by which time Daniel had finished the rule of three and was ready to begin practice; while Luke was scarcely able to mark a sum in division.

When breaking-up day came, and the half-yearly prizes were given, Daniel Archer received a [illegible] Luke Langer was so low in good marks as not to be entitled to any reward.

"How vexing it is!" said Luke; "I meant to have got forward; but, somehow, everything is against me."

"That excuse will not do, Master Langer," said his tutor; "it is quite plain to me that you have not done your best. While others were working, you were idling away your time. You must persevere, Luke, if you intend to be a scholar. Learning will not drop into a dreamer's mouth."

Daniel and Luke had an uncle, Farmer Hodges, who invited them to spend a week at his house in their midsummer holidays. As they lived in a town, they looked forward to the expected visit in the country with great delight.

Uncle Hodges was an old fashioned farmer. He wore a red waistcoat, always rose with the lark, worked as hard as any laborer in his fields, and [illegible]

On the first morning of their visit at the farm, their uncle took them into his rick-yard and orchard, showed them his new barn, and pointed out the finest of his horses, cows and sheep. He then promised that if they would get up early the next morning, he would take them to Brook Meadow, where the haymakers were busy at work, and then, perhaps, for a ride to High-top Hill.

On the morrow, Daniel was up and ready before the clock struck six; and was down in the farm-yard, looking at the pigeons as they flew around the old elm trees, until Uncle Hodges joined him. They waited some time for Luke, but as he did not make his appearance, they set off without him.

Luke lay dreaming in bed till nearly seven, and when he got up he seemed in no hurry to make his way down stairs. At length he appeared, and went out into the cross-road to see if he could find his uncle and Daniel; but before he had walked one hundred yards, he saw them on their way home, both mounted on ponies. They had first been to the hay-fields, and afterwards for a pleasant ride. Luke Linger at once saw that, by his delay, he had lost a treat, while Daniel Archer had got a good appetite for his breakfast, and a fresh glow of health on his cheek.

"How vexed I am, uncle!" cried Luke. "I quite meant to have gone with you to the hay-fields."

"It is all very well, Luke," said Farmer Hodges, "so far as it goes, to intend doing a thing; but a bushel of good intentions is not worth a penny, unless they [illegible]

This was not the only time during the visit that the farmer found out the failing and folly of his nephew, in wishing when he should have been acting, and dreaming when he should have been doing.

One afternoon, Farmer Hodges found Daniel and Luke on a seat in the garden, talking rather loudly.

"Well, my lads," said he, "what is the matter now?"

"Why, uncle," replied Luke, "I was only saying that I wish I had a large farm of my own, with a garden and orchard, and sheep and horses, and plenty of men to do the work for me."

"Dreaming and wishing again?" said the farmer. "That way won't do, Luke; you must try another. Idle wishes are like weeds, which sometimes show their heads on my land; but I root them out, or they would soon spoil my profits.

"You see these hay-ricks. Do you think that by wishing I could ever have got them here? No; the scythe, the rake, and the hay-fork were set to work. We were at it early and late, and made hay while the sun shone; and here the ricks are.

"Look at those piles of corn in the barn yonder. It is part of last year's crop. There are no better in the parish; but how did it all come there? It was not by dreaming about it. I ploughed, and sowed, and in the proper season set to work with the sickle. God, in his goodness, gave the shower and the sunshine, and the corn is now safe in the barn, and will soon be carried to [illegible]

"Look at those peas at the bottom of the garden. If I had not sown them early in the spring, and seen well to them, they would not have yielded such a supply for our table as they do.

"The path along the lane you see yonder, was nothing but mud and mire in wet weather. Some of the farmers said that it would be a good thing if a few loads of stone and gravel were thrown on it. Others declared that they had thought for a long time to propose to the parish to have it put to rights. And one said they meant, some time or other, to attend to the matter themselves, so that it might no longer be a discredit to the village. Thus it went on for years; yet nothing was done; it even got worse and worse; when, one day, I called my men to follow me, and to work we went, and, before the work was over, the old lane looked as clean, and was as passable, as the high road along which we took our morning ride.

"I think, then, Luke, that it is quite clear, if anything is to be done, it should be done without delay; and we must be diligent, whatever we have in hand, whether we be schoolboys or farmers."

As Uncle Hodges spoke in his usual kind and cheerful way, the heart of Luke was touched, and he, as well as Daniel, listened to him with much attention. They now left the garden, and went into the house to tea.

That evening, as the farmer opened his large-print Bible at family worship, he said, looking at the same time at his nephews,—

"If wishing and intending be a bad plan for the things of the world, it is still worse for the great concerns of the world to come. The soul of the sluggard desireth, and hath nothing."

[illegible] the gospel,—and an idle one is worse than an idle farmer. They do nothing to serve and honor their Lord and Master; and they will be found unfaithful stewards at last.

"I hope, my dear lads, that you will not only be true Christians, but active ones. The sum of all I have to tell you is this:—Fall not into the habit of being idle, either in earthly or heavenly things. Show that you belong not to the family of Dreamers, but to the noble band of Doers of [illegible]

CEMENT ROOFING,

The Cheapest and most durable Roofing in use.

IT IS FIRE AND WATER PROOF.

It can be applied to new and old Roofs of all sizes, steep or flat, and to canvas Roofs without removing the Shingles.

The Cost is only about One-Third that of Tin, AND IT IS TRULY A DURABLE ROOF.

This article has been thoroughly tested in New York City and all parts of the United States, extending to the East Indies, and South America, on buildings of all kinds, such as Factories, Foundries, Churches, Rail Road Depots, Cars, and on Public Buildings of the General Government, Custom Houses, Post Offices, Arsenals, Armories, and others, during the past four years, and has proved to be the CHEAPEST and MOST DURABLE ROOFING in use; it is in every respect, A PERFECT WATER, WEATHER and TIME PROOF covering for ROOFS OF ALL KINDS.

This is the ONLY material manufactured in the United States which combines the very desirable properties of Elasticity and Durability, which are universally acknowledged to be possessed by GUTTA PERCHA AND INDIA RUBBER.

No Heat is Required in Making Application

The expense of applying it is trifling, as an ordinary Roof can be covered and finished the same day.

It can be applied by any one, and when finished forms a perfectly WATER PROOF surface, with an elastic body, which cannot be injured by Heat, Cold or Storms, SHRINKING or ROOT BURNING, nor any external action whatever.

LIQUID

GUTTA PERCHA CEMENT.

For Coating Metals of all Kinds when exposed to the Action of the Weather, and

For Preserving and Repairing Metal Roofs OF ALL KINDS.

This is the only Composition known which will remain fully pliable and impervious to moisture, under every change of temperature to which it adheres firmly, forming a body equal to two coats of ordinary paint, costs much less, and will LAST THREE TIMES AS LONG, and from its elasticity is not injured by the contraction and expansion of TIN and other METAL ROOFS, consequent upon sudden changes from extreme heat to extreme cold.

IT KEEPS TIN AND OTHER METAL ROOFS TIGHT IN WARM WEATHER, AND WHEN PROPERLY APPLIED WILL NOT CRACK IN COLD OR RUN IN WARM WEATHER.

These materials are adapted to all climates, and we are prepared to supply orders from any part of the country, at short notice, for GUTTA PERCHA ROOFING in rolls, ready prepared for use, and GUTTA PERCHA CEMENT in barrels, with full printed directions for application.

THE WASHINGTON JUBILEE!

BY J. L. W.

Dost thou hear that glorious sound
That rises on the air?
'Tis not the yell of the train'd blood-hound,
Nor his victim's wild despair.

Hark! hark! 'tis like the roaring sea,
Rushing upon the main;
Like thunders rolling heavily
Across the blue domain.

O, list! the deep, inspiring sound,
Like lofty organ strain!
The sluggish blood doth wildly bound
As comes the loud refrain.

O, never sound was heard like this!
'Tis freedom's thunder tone!
And lofty peals, in notes of bliss,
Reach up to Heaven's throne.

Listening angels catch the notes,
And tune anew their lyres
The freeman's song to heaven floats,
And angel tongue inspires.

The mother holds her own dear child
Securely to her breast;
And O, her joy is almost wild,
As she thinks how she is blest.

Her full, round voice, doth swell and pour
Upon the trembling air;
Her freedom is her only store,
But yet she has no care.

Her heart is light and bounding now,
And radiant beams her eye;
Joy sits enthroned upon her brow—
Escapes her breast no sigh.

She feels the thrill of God's decree;
It sets her blood on fire;
Reviving thoughts of liberty
Her inmost soul inspire

O tyrant, tremble as ye hear
That lofty anthem rise,
And list unto that simple prayer
Now wafted to the skies.

Hath not Ethiop stretch'd her hands,
As God declared she would?
And, Oh! how can ye now withstand
The vengeful ire of God!

These little ones upon the knee
Have cried aloud to God,
And now behold sweet liberty—
The ransomed of the Lord!

Ten thousand souls their voices swell
To-day in jubilee;
To ransom'd ones, from slavery's hell,
Adore sweet liberty!

And let your voices loud prolong,
Till the demon, slavery,
Shall tremble as he hears the song—
The anthem of the free!

THE LORD'S PRAYER

If any be distressed, and fain would gather
Some comfort let him haste unto
Our Father,
For we of hope and help are quite forsaken
Except thou succor us
Who art in Heaven.
Thou showest mercy, therefore for the same
We praise Thee, singing
Hallowed be Thy name
Of all our miseries cast up the sum;
Show us Thy joys and let
Thy kingdom come.
We mortal are, and alter from our birth;
Thou constant art,
Thy will be done on earth
Thou madest the earth as well as planets seven,
Thy name be blessed here
As 'tis in Heaven
Nothing we have to use, or debts to pay,
Except Thou give it us
Give us this day,
Wherewith to clothe us, wherewith to be fed,
For without Thee we want
Our daily bread.
We want, but want no faults, for no day passes
But we do sin—
Forgive us our trespasses
No man from sinning ever free did live,
Forgive us, Lord, our sins,
As we forgive,
If we repent our faults, Thou no'er disdainest us;
We pardon
Them that trespass against us;
Forgive us that is past, a new path tread us;
Direct us always in thy faith,
And lead us
We, Thine own people and Thy chosen nation,
Into all truth, but
Not into temptation.
Thou that of all good graces art the giver,
Suffer us not to wander,
But deliver
Us from the fierce assaults of world and devil,
And flesh so shalt Thou free us
From all evil.
To these petitions let both church and laymen,
With one consent of heart and voice, say
AMEN.

THE PRESS AND THE PAPACY.—Including Austria, the Protestants and Romanists in the German States are nearly numerically equal. It is, however, a remarkable fact, which is fully established in a [illegible] circular which recently appeared in Augsburg, that while there are only some 700 look-[illegible] among them are about 1500 Protestant ones. It is also stated in the same Circular, that among the 2000 to 3000 newspapers which are published [illegible] more than 100 are of a Roman Catholic faith or tendency. Although there are fully 60,000 Catholic priests alone, the circulation of all papers does not reach double this number of subscribers! Figures tell hard truths!

SERMON I.

PREACHED BY REV. JAMES LYNCH, AT WALTER'S CHAPEL, BALTIMORE, SABBATH, MAY 18TH

I will never leave thee nor forsake thee. Heb. xiii 5.

The apostle gives this comfortable assurance to the Hebrews at the same time that he gives them godly admonitions. The timely appropriateness of such assurance can be seen at a glance; the admonitions which are contained in the preceding verses involve self-denial, disregard of natural desire and carnal affections; and, when they are heeded, they expose the faithful to bitter enemies, as well as put them in the face of powerful temptations. Allow an illustration: A traveller passes along a highway at the setting in of night, when the birds have ceased their caroling, and folded their little wings to sleep; when the wild beasts have couched to rest, and quiet reigns, he enters the forest by the silvery light of the moon, so sweetly stealing through the foliage of the trees he finds a little cave: spreading its bottom with dry leaves, he lies him down to rest; into that cave the snake may crawl, the vermin may creep, but of this he thinks not; his only thought is of repose, his only care to shield himself from wild beasts; but the morning comes; the glimmering dawn of day begins to irradiate the darkness of his cave, and he looks around at the place which was so comfortable during the night; now it is extremely uncomfortable; dark, damp, slimy; insects crawling about snakes stealthily making entrance. He looks out of the opening of the cave into the forest; the heavens are "blue without a cloud, white without a speck," lit up with the radiance of the king of day; the foliage of the trees, wet with dew as they seem to weep for joy that the sun—the glory of God—has lifted the black mantle of night; he hears the choral anthem chanted by the warbling birds—nature's emblem of innocence; turning around to look at his cave, the air is now fetid, and he says, "How can I stay in here? I must go out." He makes a step or two, but starts back; he thinks—in the distance, breaking the stillness of the morn—he hears the lion's roar, the yelling of the tiger, the crying of the fierce hyena, the heavy tread of the elephant. He is affrighted and says, What to do I do not know. I'm almost surrounded. If I stay here death may be slow, but it is sure. If I go forward, fight and conquer, I shall live. Taking up the weapons of defence, nerved with courage, he moves forward.

The ungodly man is like unto one in a dark cave; his situation to him is pleasant until he beholds with an eye of faith the Sun of Righteousness arising with healing in his wings; then he will go forward through this wilderness of woe, walking in the road that leads him to glory and to God; but as soon as his feet are "taken out of the horrible pit and miry clay," as soon as he, like the traveller in the dark cave resting, emerges into light, the devil comes towards him, not in the form of the invisible poisonous atmosphere, not in the form of the harmless-looking insect, but in the form of the roaring lion, enraged now, he comes "with hellish malice full;" but the man of God unsheathes his sword, and with the great promises of the great God for his shelter and buckler cries:

> "With my bright sword I mean to fight,
> Till all my foes are put to flight."

These godly admonitions, when obeyed, do make men targets for the world. Let a sailor on the briny ocean get religion, and instead of uttering curses hymn God's praise, his fellow-sailors become his critics; they make him the butt of ridicule, scorn and condemn him, and the poor sailor finds himself in a "weary land." Thank God, he has the "shadow of a great rock," and if you want to know what it is, look! oh look! this morning at the text, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." The importance of this promise is manifest in the mode of expression. Dr. Clarke says: "A literal translation would show five negatives, all agreeing with each other."

I. We may infer from this promise that every thing else will forsake us.

II. None but believers can claim the benefits of this promise.

III. The reliability of the promise. Lastly, by the assistance of Him who "careth much for you," I shall endeavor to make you feel the promise is true.

I. We infer from the text that all things will forsake us. Riches—money the world considers a never-failing friend; but we know wealth sometimes forsakes in a day or week, taking to itself wings it is gone. The torch of the incendiary fires our dwellings, and though the last thing we may have done at night was to look with enraptured gaze upon our possessions, the first thing in the morning may be to look with saddened mien upon a heap of ashes. When the storm-cloud of war recently gathered over this nation, how many thousand fortunes went down, wrecks beneath the surging billows, and left poor mortality who were travelling through the world clinging to them, to struggle alone amid the troubled waters.

Honor vanisheth like the dew of morn; kings possess it to-day, to-morrow it forsakes them, and they are clad all over with shame; thousands may bow at their thrones this week to pay them homage, they may be clamorous for their blood, doom them to the fagot or the rack, and shout over their graves.

Cæsar once knew naught but honor. Honor followed him to deck his brow with laurels, over many gory fields of strife to awful Pharsalia's bloody ground, where crimson gore in torrents flowed, and crowned him conqueror! It followed him to Italia's great capital, where he stood high over all, but then forsook him as he fell mortally stabbed, reeking in his blood and disgrace—branded with the name of tyrant, usurper traitor.

Relatives and friends forsake us. The father forgets his children oftimes, and, caring not for their welfare, he leaves them to the street to get their schooling; to their mother to get their clothes; to the devil to get their training. A mother sometimes bends o'er the wash-tub till the spine aches and the shoulders pain, to rear and educate a son or daughter They to repay neglect, scorn, and even abuse her.

A bride is led by her betrothed to the hymeneal altar; before their God, with a heaven-recorded vow, their faith is plighted to each other, but before many new moons have become full ones they are parted; the blushing bride is thrown upon a cheerless world, and he who should be her protector forsakes her and revels in riotous excesses.

Methinks I see Satan taking the seeker after safety on a tour of observation; he carries him around the world, shows him the gaudy and glittering objects with unrivalled eloquence; with poetic imagery he describes them and tells of their "glories;" he hurries the seeker as he nears that object which is still lifted up in the world; he don't want the wanderer after rest to see it at all. It shines very bright, and Satan attempts to hurry; but the volunteer who has responded to the call of the gospel drum, as its beat was heard from Zion's walls, says, "Stop, Satan, I will enlist, gird on my arms, and fight for liberty," and looking up (Satan trembling) he says, as he beholds

> "Nailed to a shameful tree
> The Saviour of mankind!
> Forever here my rest shall be > Close by thy bleeding side"

Yet once again: The inference from the text is plain and unmistakable—that the promise is everlasting—last forever—glory be to God on high! God and his Son and Spirit will not forsake us when we enter the fold, neither on any part of the journey The terrific swellings of death's cold flood can't drive him from us. He will fix the dreadful stream that we may cross in safety; walking on the great suspension bridge of his mercy, our feet will tread the soil of vernal bliss, our heads will shine with dazzling crowns, "we will be right in his home," and sit down at the table prepared for God's redeemed guests,

> "Where the saints of all ages in harmony meet
> Their Saviour and brethren transported to greet."

Hear it this morning, my dying congregation, hear it! None but believers can claim the promise as theirs. Things cannot forsake each other unless joined, and none but a living faith unites to Christ—the living head. This is proof enough of the second proposition. Oh! Father of infinite and amazing mercy, increase our faith! I know you feel this desire when you say Amen! No man will consent for the foot, the toe, the hand or the finger to be cut off from his body if it be healthy. He only consents when corruption or disease lays hold upon them and endangers the whole body. We are members of Christ's body; he will not consent that we should be cut off while we have in us the healthful life of the religion of our own Lord Jesus Christ.

III. The reliability of the promise:—It is reliable because it was made by Him "in whom there is no variableness nor shadow of turning," who changes not. Millions of ages may roll and never scathe his brow, or plough a furrow upon his divinity. God cannot lie; he has never forsaken his children; he stood by them passing out of Egypt's land, when her chivalry and pride were buried by the rolling flood that raised with Moses' rod. He was with them when Nebuchadnezzar's lurid flame wrapped its fiery coil around them, and they stood as one upon a vernal plain formed by the zephyrs of evening. His goodness tells the promise is true, written on every leaf, wafted by every breeze, glittering in every star, sparkling in every brook, twinkling in every dew-drop, magnified in every flower, it says, "Christian soldier, go! believe the promise true, 'I will not leave thee nor forsake thee.'"

St Augustine declares: "The more desperate my case is, the more I admire my physician." Job says when friends forsook him—when relatives forsook him: "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and he shall stand at the latter day, and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God."

We are to be together this conference year; if life lasts, stand by the ship; Jesus is at the helm when the billows shall heave—the tempest rage, and the voice of our blessed Master will be heard amid the whistling of the winds, the dashing of the waters, saying, "Peace! be still!" Stay aboard! stay aboard! and you and I will arrive at home, where parting shall be no more. Oh! give God all the glory!

RELIGION.

I love to see children grow up in the ways of the Lord; for the habits that are formed during the period between infancy and manhood can never be lost nor forgotten. When hoary age comes creeping o'er the frame, still does the fond recollection of youth spring fresh and green. We all know that we do wrong when we heed not a parent's mandates. We also know that all manner of profane language is contrary to the will and word of God. Our mothers have taught us our prayers; they have tried to teach us the way to heaven, but, alas! how often do we grow up not thinking that we have an immortal and never-dying soul to save. How many have put off the period of embracing religion until it was too late. Then have they regretted their folly, and wished they had hearkened unto the warning voice of the Lord, and wished that they had their life to lead over again. Then would they listen to the word of God. Those that laugh and scorn at His name do so at a fearful peril—for they know not the day nor the hour when the Son of Man shall come. If they knew when their time was to come, they would doubtless try to be better prepared. We know that this world is not always to be our abiding place, for we are all fast passing to the unknown world; our lives are as fleeting shadows—the morn dawns brightly on us—the evening comes, and we are gone.

We see many careless ones who never think about the judgment day, nor about their souls—they curse, swear, lie, and steal, for which they will have to render strict account at the awful tribunal of an angry God. They utter a word for every vain and idle word they utter While every day brings us nearer to death and judgment, let us each see that we are fully prepared to meet our Maker. The more we praise him, the more quiet and peaceful do our souls become; the more we [illegible] never treat his word lightly. We should endeavor to work faithfully for God—work while it is [illegible] The personal pro[illegible] is understood The copula [illegible]

A REJOINDER.

MR. EDITOR:—I ask the privilege of finishing my rejoinder, as my opponent had three trials in his reply. I think I would be ashamed of myself, if I found, in debating with a brother, I had to substitute abuse for argument, as my Brother Campbell has done. I will produce arguments for my assertions; if I did not, I would cease to assert. I could make just as much by making round assertions, as Elder Campbell could; for I have just as many tongues, and I could go just as far from the truth, and act just as unbecoming and as ungentlemanly as he has, were I disposed to do so. But, instead of pursuing a course of that kind, I will produce arguments for what I say, and then I will let the intelligent public judge of the matter. I will not undertake to plead, and then be judge and jury. I will do my part of the business, and leave the matter to be settled by the public.

Mr Editor, I would like to ask Elder Campbell one question at this point. What are we to understand a writer to mean by heading his article with a certain subject?—that he is going to write upon the subject by which his article is headed, or some other? This question I think Elder Campbell will be obliged to answer in the affirmative. Then, the subject upon which I wrote in the 58th No. of the Recorder, was, "A Discovery of Inconsistencies." Now, then, let Elder Campbell show where I have pleaded ignorance of inconsistencies. I defy him to do it. He has said, positively, that I have pleaded ignorance of inconsistencies, or of the subject on which I wrote, which was inconsistencies. I defy the truthful, would be straight forward Elder Campbell to show that I have pleaded ignorance of my subject, as above explained. Upon the subject of inconsistencies, I could not well have pleaded ignorance; for I had Elder Campbell's articles before me, with all the eccentric awkwardness and absurdities which are to be found in their composition. He says: "Brother Strother cannot show one sentence nor word quoted by us from him, and in his name, that he did not alter." Here are thirteen words quoted from me by Elder Campbell, which I never uttered. Now, here they are: "He tells us himself that he does not know what the major proposition is, about which he is writing." The last thirteen words of this sentence are words which I would be qualified I never used; yet it is a quotation, by Elder Campbell, from me, and in my name. What will he do with this matter? Where is his veracity? One might suppose that he had laid it aside until he gets through with this debate. This kind of palpable quibbling, is what I do not understand, coming from the source it does. I farther say that Elder Campbell makes the most painful out, in his grammatical and logical criticisms, that I have ever seen; he makes himself a perfect tyro. He says, in referring to me, that I call the heading of my article both a sentence and a proposition. Elder Campbell seems to wish to ridicule the idea of my doing so. In order to see who is right, let us see what it takes to constitute a sentence. I will give Elder Campbell the best, or as good authority as we have in this country, who is Dr. Kuhner, the author of as good, or the best Greek Grammar that is now in use. He says that a sentence is the expression of a thought in words Now, I would ask Elder Campbell, "or any other man" of common sense, even if he be not very highly cultivated, if there is not a thought expressed in the words, "A Discovery of Inconsistencies." Let any one answer that question Again, let us see, next, what it takes to constitute [illegible] He well-known [illegible] Mr. Hedge, of Harvard University, says a single word may contain a complete proposition, while the subject and copula are both understood. I will arrange the heading of my article logically, [illegible]

THE BISHOP QUESTION

We have a very interesting letter from our Rev. and dear friend, M. M. Clark, on the subject of the troubles in Canada, and the meaning of his resolutions, in which he gives some very good advice. But, as it will do no good, and would bring on a greater discussion than we had before, we shall, very reluctantly, have to suppress it. We hope no one else will write or say anything about the matter until the next General Conference. But, we will be glad to hear from Dr. Clark, and all the rest of our brethren, on questions of a moral and literary character, and on subjects connected with the arts and sciences.

PHILADELPHIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

This Conference has just closed its sessions in Trenton, N. J., after sitting for ten days. We will say here, that we were glad we had all the Bishops present on the occasion, and that, after all, the Conference passed off pleasantly, and was well sustained. We will, however, be glad when the time comes, when questions which do not belong to an Annual Conference, and over which the Conference has no control, will be kept out of its meetings, unless the parties whom they concern, have a fair opportunity to say what is truthful in the matter. Order and arrangement are much needed among us. In relation to any arrangement or suggestion that might be considered necessary, it ought to be sent to the General Committee, when in session, and more especially if it is anything special, for we should sometimes not let our left hand know what our right hand doeth Again, what belongs to a Quarterly Conference, does not belong to an Annual Conference. If this be true, then I ought to keep what I have in my breast, and neither deliver it in person nor by proxy, to the Annual Conference. Let this course be pursued in all deliberative bodies, and we think that we will have but little trouble in any of those bodies.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

MR. EDITOR:—I was much gratified, after reading the column of special notices found in your paper about two months ago; gratified, because the notice about which I will speak, appertained to the progress which some of the young men of the present day are making in the intellectual world. The individual alluded to, was Charles A. Dorsey, A. B. Living but a few miles from the place where he graduated, I had an excellent opportunity of becoming acquainted with his scholarship. As a student, he was earnest; and his intellectual culture was the prize for which he labored, and he has now departed from the halls of learning, in the possession of that for which he so earnestly sought. His graduating speech, entitled "The Functions of Man," was commendable

He is now laboring for the good of his race. I wish that prosperity may be his. The billows of life may roll high, often threatening destruction, but remain firm, and a bright sunshine will be yours. G O P.

A RECOMMENDATION

TO THE DISTRICTS OF PHILADELPHIA, NEW ENGLAND, OHIO, INDIANA, AND MISSOURI, OF THE A. M. E. CHURCH MINISTERS.

Dear Brethren:—As we have a number of Superannuated ministers on the list in said Districts, therefore it will be expected that the ministers and preachers, on their circuits and stations, will do all they can to collect the two cent money; and we also recommend that the Class leaders be instructed to collect and set the amount on the Class book opposite each member's name, as also all the collections called, per Discipline, for the Annual Conference, and publish the same once every quarter, that it may be seen who they are that work for God and his cause. We think it is time to give credit to those of our people who do work, and that God's name may be glorified.

THE ADJOURNMENT OF THE PHILADELPHIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

The adjournment of this body, on Monday morning, May 19th, was attended by a large crowd, both of colored and white persons. The church was filled to its utmost capacity. About half-past 4 o'clock, P. M., Bishop Nazrey arose and made some very interesting remarks in relation to the making out of the appointments, and the material the Conference had put into his hands, and therefore he had to do the best he could. Some circuits he put two on, in order that the people might be attended to. He then proceeded to have the appointments read, which will be found as follows:

THE SONS OF GOD

"Behold! what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God!—therefore, the world knoweth us not, because it knew him not.

"Beloved, now are we the sons of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is"—1 John iii 1, 2.

The Evangelist, John, who wrote this epistle, has been correctly called, "The beloved disciple" He seems to have been peculiarly honored by the Saviour, to lean on his breast while partaking of the last supper with him He, no doubt, from the close communion which he enjoyed with his beloved Master, drank in large draughts of that spirit of love, which we find so eminently characterizing him as an inspired penman. In the former part of this letter to the churches, he is writing to them of the glorious Advocate they have at the throne of the Father, to plead their cause for them, and of the duty of abiding in his love, "that when he shall appear, they may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming In the verses before us, he is speaking of the wonderful love of the Father for us; the blessed privileges it confers upon us here, and the infinitely greater blessedness it has in store for us, "when this mortal shall have put on immortality," and "we shall be ever with the Lord"

Let us consider, first, the exclamation of wonder at this love; secondly, the title conferred upon us by this love; thirdly, the world's ignorance of us under this new title or relationship; fourthly, the present enjoyment of this relationship; fifthly, our imperfect knowledge of its future blessedness; and, lastly, what we do know concerning it

I. The exclamation of wonder. "Behold! what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us." The angels are represented as "desiring to look into these things," that is, the manifestations of this wondrous love to guilty men. Can we wonder, then, when the angels, those bright and holy messengers of the Most High, "who do his bidding," and who are constantly employed in his service, crying, "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty," are amazed at this exhibition of his love, and are earnestly engaged in studying the length, and breadth, and height and depth of this marvellous love, that the apostle should break out in this exclamation, and say, "Behold! what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us!" Now, as to the "manner" of this love.

1st. It was a great love. The apostle Paul tells us, in his Epistle to the Ephesians, 2d ch., 4th verse, "God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us." The Saviour himself says, in his address to his disciples, as recorded in John xv. 13, "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." We are told, in ancient history, of one friend being willing to give up his life to save the life of another; "but God commendeth his love towards us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." O! the wonderful greatness of this love! While we were rebels against our lawful sovereign, Jehovah gave his only begotten Son, "that whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have everlasting life."

2d. It was a self-sacrificing love. The Father freely consented to give up the brightest jewel in his crown, his Isaac, his only begotten, his well-beloved, the apple of his eye, so to speak, that we might be called "the sons of God." The Son voluntarily offered himself, saying, when, the inquiry was put forth, Who shall assume the sinner's law place, suffer in his room and stead?—"Here am I, send me! In the volume of the book it is written of me, I delight to do thy will, O, God!" The Holy Spirit offered himself as the Divine Agent to "take of the things of Christ," and reveal them unto his people. Thus we see that this love was so great, that the three persons of the Trinity were engaged in it.

3d. It is an everlasting love. Paul, in his letter to the Romans, viii. 38, 39, speaking of this love, says: "For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." "The Lord hath appeared of old unto me, saying, Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love; therefore, with loving-kindness have I drawn thee"—Jer. xxi. 3

II. The title conferred upon us by this love "That we should be called the sons of God." Men think it a great thing to be called the sons of distinguished earthly characters. We, as Americans, feel proud to be called the sons of Washington, and justly so; for Washington was raised up by Providence to be the earthly deliverer of his country from the yoke of foreign tyranny and oppression. He is justly styled "the Father of his country." But what is the mere earthly deliverance of this country compared with the deliverance of our souls from eternal ruin, and their adoption into the family of God? Think, how infinitely superior God is to any earthly monarch! He is "the King of kings, and Lord of lords." Let us, then, see what this title includes in it. It includes,

1st. Adoption into the family of God. By nature we were all estranged from God, children of the wicked one, led captive by Satan at his will, "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, having no hope, and without God in the world." What strange, surprising love is this, that of a rebel makes a son? Can we ever, my brethren, sufficiently admire the greatness of that love, which adopts us into the family of God, and makes Jehovah himself say unto us, "I will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters?"

2d. Joint heirship with Jesus. As if it were not honor enough conferred upon his people to adopt them into his family, and make them sons, he makes them heirs also. Hear what the apostle says: "And if children, then heirs, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ." And what is this heirship or inheritance here spoken of? Peter tells us, in his first epistle, 1st chapter, 4th and 5th verses, that it is "an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you who are kept by the power of God, through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time." What a glorious title is this, that not only blesses us with adoption into God's family, but gives us a title deed to heaven—to those mansions which Jesus has gone to prepare for his children! Let us, then, look up, dear brethren, and not be cast down by the trials and troubles that beset us here, seeing "the day of our redemption draweth nigh."

III. The world's ignorance of us under this new title or relationship. This blessed title or relationship we have been setting before you is spiritual, being effected by the agency of the Holy Spirit. "Therefore, the world knoweth us not, because it knew Him not" In our natural state we are all ignorant of God, and "desire not a knowledge of his ways" The apostle tells us, that "The carnal mind is enmity against God, for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." We ourselves were ignorant of this blessed relationship, until God, in his wondrous love, sent his Spirit to "translate us from darkness into the kingdom of his dear Son." Then we behold "wondrous things out of his law, and a new song was put into our mouths, even salvation to our God."

IV. Our present enjoyment of this relationship. "Beloved, now are we the sons of God! One charming feature of this relationship is that we can enjoy it while in this "waste, howling wilderness" we roam How often, in the midst of deep affliction, have we felt the sweetness of that exhortation recorded in the 12th chapter of Hebrews, 5th and 6th verses: "My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him: for whom the Lord loveth, he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." And when we have felt weak, and almost ready to give up our hope, and say, "All these things are against me," how has the burden been rolled off our back, when we have thought of those cheering words, "All things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose." Blessed be God for the present enjoyment of this relationship!

V. Our imperfect knowledge of its future blessedness. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be." The eternal happiness of the redeemed, is so grand and glorious, that finite minds cannot grasp it. We cannot, while in the flesh, have a full conception of the glories of the redeemed in the Paradise of God. We are told that "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."—1 Cor ii. 9. And the Master himself tells us, "Ye shall see greater things than these."

VI. What shall we know concerning it? "We shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." We there "shall be like him," in that we shall be freed from all sin,—as the poet Watts has so beautifully expressed it:

"Those holy gates forever bar
Pollution, sin, and shame,
And none shall be admitted there,
But followers of the Lamb!"

We shall then, with the sweet singer of Israel, "be satisfied," for we shall "awake in his likeness, and see him as he is." Spurgeon beautifully says, speaking on this subject in his sermon on the Foretastes of Heaven, 3d series, p. 145: "You look forward to heaven as the place where you shall

'See, and hear, and know
All you desire and wish below'

You are now looking at it darkly through a glass: there you shall see face to face. Christ looks down on the Bible, and the Bible is his looking-glass. You look into it, and see the face of Christ, as in a mirror, darkly; but soon you shall look upon himself, and see him face to face. You expect heaven as a place of peculiar manifestation. You believe that he will unveil his face to you; that

'Millions of years your wondering eyes
Shall o'er your Saviour's beauties rove'

You are expecting to see his face, and never, never sin. You are longing to know the secrets of his heart. You believe that in that day you shall see him as he is, and be like him in the world of spirits." W. H F.

LETTER FROM ST. LOUIS

St. Louis, Mo., May 6th. 1862.

Since my last communication, I have had the pleasure of making two visits to Jefferson city, the capital of this State. We had been hearing the cry of our brethren at that place for some time, as that of the Macedonians, "Come over and help us." On our first visit there, March the 13th, we saw an opening for good, and for benefiting our brethren. We preached five sermons, set our stakes, &c., and returned home. On the 23d of April we returned to said city, and on the 24th succeeded in organising a church there, of thirty-two members, embracing a majority of the wealthy and intelligent portion of the colored population. Their church edifice is a hewed log one. The ground on which it stands belongs to colored men. One of them is a member of the church, and the other his brother-in-law in the flesh. They are ready at any time to donate as much ground as we may require for church purposes. You may see by this our cause is spreading in Missouri.

It is unknown what the issue of the present troubles will be. In the city there is a strong anti-slavery feeling, which is constantly increasing. Also, an emancipation club is formed here, with Judge Crum, a very influential man, at its head. Their numbers are rapidly growing. Our prayer is that God, who holds the destiny of nations in his hands, would bring order out of confusion. Our people here are in fine spirits, business is becoming very brisk in our city, and money plenty Queen Victoria Visiting the Sick.—The following anecdote is related of Queen Victoria:—The incumbent of Osborne had occasion to visit an aged parishioner. Upon his arrival at the house, as he entered the door where the invalid was, he saw sitting by the bed side a lady in deep mourning, reading the Word of God. He was about to retire, when the lady remarked, 'Pray remain. I should not wish the invalid to lose the comfort which a clergyman might afford.' The lady retired, and the clergyman found lying on the bed a book with the texts of Scripture adapted to the sick; and he found that out of [illegible] lady in black. That lady was the Queen of England."

JOHN TURNER

George B. Emerson, LL.D., of Boston has been nominated for the office of President of Harvard College. Mr. Emerson is a son of the late Dr. Samuel Emerson, a respectable physician of Kennebunk, Me., in which town he was born on the 12th of September, 1797, and is therefore 64 years of age. He graduated at Harvard in 1817, with [illegible] honors. His father was also a graduate at Cambridge in 1775

We learn that Rev C M Butler, D D, has accepted the chaplaincy of the American Church at Rome.

Hon. Edward Stanley, of California, is en route for Washington, for the purpose of taking the office of Military Governor of North Carolina, his native State. The Administration have already one or two prominent gentlemen in view to occupy the same position in Louisiana.

A FESTIVAL

The ladies of the Central Presbyterian Church, Lombard Street, held an entertainment for the benefit of their church, on the 21st inst. They [illegible] and members [illegible] who had just returned from the Conference, we accepted of the invitation and attended on the occasion. It went off very pleasantly indeed. Dr Brainerd delivered an address, which was short, but pertinent, after which the ladies and gentlemen enjoyed themselves much. The Committee deserve credit for their activity.

UNDERTAKER.

Our friend, Mr. Charnock, whose advertisement will be found in another column of our paper, is a gentleman, and is always ready to accommodate any friend, or friends, at the shortest notice. He is situated just two doors south of Bethel Church, Sixth Street, Philadelphia

BOOK CONCERN.

The General Committee held their annual meeting during the sitting of the Annual Conference. On motion, Rev. Wm. Moore was elected President, and Rev James Shorter, Secretary. We had a very pleasant and harmonious meeting. It was recommended that the publication of the Christian Recorder be continued, and that Rev. Elisha Weaver be the Editor. We hope now that all barriers are out of the way, and that everybody will help to support the paper and Book Concern. Trustees were elected, to hold and defend the real estate, as follows:—Rev. Elisha Weaver, Abraham Field, Rev Stephen Smith, Isaiah Weir, Rev. Richard Roberson, Rev. Henry Davis, and J. Hollen. It was also recommended to all of our Annual Conferences the importance of doing all in their power to advance the interests of the paper and Book Concern.

DAUGHTERS OF CONFERENCE

The Daughters of Conference, of Bethel Church, had their annual sermon preached on Thursday evening, the 22d inst., by Rev. A. W. Wayman, of Baltimore. The Little Wesley Church, after the discourse, gave a nice little refreshment to the ministers, and then gave each one of us an equal share of the proceeds of what they have made since the last Annual Conference. May the blessing of our God ever rest upon them!

GEN. WARREN.

THE MORNING BEFORE THE BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL

I met recently a mother in Israel, over four score years of age, who gave me some interesting facts connected with the last hours of General Joseph Warren, the first eminent victim in the Revolutionary war. A young man was employed as his servant who subsequently became a deacon in the First Baptist Church, Boston; and from his lips our informant had often heard the following narrative

When General Warren retired, on the night before the battle of Bunker Hill, he gave directions to his servant to call him early in the morning, as he intended to join the army in the intrenchments. The servant called him about two o'clock, and the General remarked he had had a troubled sleep, and was full of forebodings for the issue of the day's struggle. He then read a portion of Scripture, and kneeled in prayer. The young man said that he never heard such a prayer, in the pulpit or elsewhere; it seemed like wrestling with God as Jacob at Peniel. He prayed for himself,—that God would keep him from peril, or make him a willing sacrifice on his country's altar. He prayed for his family—that they might submit with serene trust to the Divine will, if it should doom them to sorrow. He prayed above all for his country; that God would guide it through storm, and gloom, and defeat, to ultimate victory and freedom. The minutes rolled on, but still the prayer continued; occasionally the voice was hushed, as if from exhaustion, but the body was bowed in worship, and soon the earnest pleading commenced anew.

The servant listened in wonder, which gradually passed into awe and deep reverence. He seemed to be in the very presence of God, and dared not move, or breathe loudly, lest the wonderful solemnity should be profanely broken. At length General Warren rose from his knees and the prayer was ended. There was no anxiety brooding on his face; all was serene peace and joyful trust in God. He gave a few simple directions, took a cup of coffee and a light breakfast, left for the lines on Bunker Hill, where his life was given up, as he had prayed, a cheerful sacrifice for his country. On looking at his watch, the servant found the prayer had occupied two full hours. He was a gay stripling, finding his whole pleasure in worldly pursuits and recreations; but that prayer made a deep impression on his mind, which nothing could remove. When his master was brought back lifeless from the field, he felt the beauty and worth of piety, and the remembrance of that prayer haunted him continually, till he learned to pray himself, and found at the mercy seat pardon and peace, and the elements of a new life

It is cheering to know that Joseph Warren was a praying man, and that, like Havelock and Com Foote, he felt that the best preparation for battle was [illegible] with God — Watchman and Reflector

An Interesting Chapter read to a Congregation.—It was the practice of an eccentric Irish divine to read a chapter before the sermon; and, to the amazement of his auditory, he read one day the first chapter of Nehemiah. He might as well have asked them to read the first twenty seven verses of a Sanscrit lexicon. But the Dr. went on with the chapter, and, as he announced, in his own [illegible] way, "Nehemiah—Magplash [illegible] to the pulpit, hardly a soul, for sheer wonderment, ventured to draw his breath. At the end of the last verse, the reader put on one of his grimmest looks: "You will have got as much good" I ever claimed, "my attentive hearers, from this chapter, as ye seem to have got from any I ever read to you, and ye will carry home as much of it; and ye will carry as much of it in your daily practice."

Little Sins.—Little sins have a fearful power of eating out the Christian heart. The ants of a tropical climate will surround their prey, and after destroying it, eat it out so thoroughly, and yet delicately, that at a distance it may appear still alive. Yet when the storm comes, it crumbles. So falls the professor whose inner life has been destroyed by little sins

Swedes in Minnesota.—A correspondent in Minnesota communicates the following intelligence concerning the Scandinavian interest in this State. "The Augustana Scandinavian Synod is expected to meet in one of the Churches of Pastor Norelius, near Red Wing, Goodhue Co. Minn., in the month of June. The question in regard to the location of the Seminary will then come up for settlement, and this, with other questions relating to the more perfect and efficient organization of our missionary work, will make this one of the most important meetings yet held. Nothing has been finally decided in regard to the Scandinavian Colony, which it is proposed to locate in Iowa or one of the Western States, as the seat for an Institution. Some of us who have had considerable experience in pioneer life are not sanguine, while a few of our dear brethren below are very hopeful In this state notwithstanding the war pressure and the ill health of several of our pastors, the cause of religion is making progress. In the district of the Rev. P. Beckman, of Carnon Falls, two small frame Swedish Lutheran Churches are in progress of erection, and a third is being built in the country congregation of Rev. E. Norelius. Several others are projected in the charges of our Swedish and Norwegian brethren in other parts of the State.

The Tactics of Infidelity.—"The Pilgrim of Saxony" gives the following illustration of the way in which the old philosophical Rationalism is sinking to vulgar Infidelity: In the city of Dresden, a weekly paper has been published since January, with the title "Satanicus Augustus," "The little Devil" Under the title head of the paper, a group of little devils appears with tails, horns, hoofs, &c. In a late number, the first article had the heading: "Letters from the Devil to his grandmother"—and was followed by this answer of the grandmother, telegraphic despatches from the lower world! In a word, the whole object of the paper seems to be to pour contempt upon the teachings of the Scriptures, and to ridicule, and the most vulgar wit to weaken its authority in the public mind. Truly, the great enemy, "goeth about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour."

A German Work on Odd Fellowship.—The "Young Men's Society" of the German Lutheran Church, of Pastor Kugler, of Baltimore, Md., have made a German translation of the Rev. J. T. Cooper's (United Pres. Pastor in Philadelphia,) book, in which Odd Fellowship is examined in the light of the Holy Scriptures and Reason, and are about to publish it for general circulation among the German Churches. The proposed work will contain 300 pages, and will be sold to subscribers for the moderate price of 50 cts. Persons sending four subscribers will receive the fifth copy gratuitously. All communications on the subject are to be addressed to A. Schlitt, Box 1471, Baltimore, Md.

Jewish Sabbath Schools.—The New York correspondent of the American Presbyterian states that the Jews in that city, numbering some 25,000, with nearly a dozen Synagogues, are opening Sabbath Schools. They themselves designate these gatherings in this manner, and they are held, not on the Jewish Sabbath, Saturday, but on the Christian Sabbath. It is estimated that there are 5,000 Jewish children adapted to this sort of instruction in New York, and three Schools, with about 500 scholars—most of the teachers being Jewish ladies—are already in operation. Sabbath before last was the first anniversary of the oldest school—Beni Israel, in Forsyth street. The celebration was not unlike those of the Christians in manner and spirit. Singing was a prominent and agreeable feature, with various addresses by distinguished Jewish Rabbis, but the religious exercises and instructions were wholly connected with the Old Testament, Jewish festivals, creeds, history, &c. A present made to one of the pupils, for diligence and fidelity, was a perfect copy of the Bible, from the press of the American Bible Society. Mr R G Pardee, the efficient and energetic agent of the New York Sabbath School Union, was present, and was cordially invited to share in the proceedings.

A CONVERT IN SIAM

The Home and Foreign Record of the Presbyterian church relates the following:

About the first of July, a very intelligent man, named Kon (Kawo,) from a neighboring village, visited the mission, professing to be a Christian, and desiring to place his son, who accompanied him under regular religious instruction. A longer acquaintance has confirmed the sincerity of his profession, and the hopes which were then awakened on his behalf. The following particulars have been learned in reference to him: He was the son of respectable parents; had been a pupil in a temple, when a boy, and afterwards a priest. He was wild and depraved in his youth. About twelve years ago his father received a book from a missionary, which he gave to his son. It seems to have made no particular impression on the father's mind, except that it was correct Siamese. It was that portion of the Old Testament history which contains the life of Moses, and the giving of the law. The reading of it produced in his mind a deep conviction of the folly of idolatry, and the truth of religion. From that time he began to search for books, and some one to converse with; but living in an out-country village, it was so that he did not visit Bangkok but once afterwards, and failed to have an interview with one then. Some time after this he got from a neighbor, who did not value it, a copy of the Gospel of John, and subsequently the Acts of the Apostles and some tracts. All of these he had studied, until he can repeat chapter after chapter from memory. Nor does it appear to be a mere theoretical knowledge. He loves the truth, and the truth has made him free. He has studied it with earnest prayer for guidance and light, and has been, we believe, savingly taught of God. For the last four years he believes he has been a Christian, though very much needing some one with whom to converse, and give him farther instruction His joy at finding the missionaries was intense, and he has listened with eagerness to all their instructions. He has walked five miles nearly every Sabbath since, to attend worship, and has given every evidence of his love to the Saviour and his [illegible] He [illegible] of his own family and countrymen, and has already engaged with much earnestness in the distribution of books, and bids fair to be an invaluable assistant in the work.

What one Convert can do.—About five years ago, a Chinese convert came [illegible] from Hok lo, a town about a hundred miles in the interior, in the Quang-tong province. He had been converted through the labors of a colporteur, and sought the missionaries for advice and instruction. He was baptized and instructed, and shortly returned to his native town. The next year he came again, bringing with him a new convert who had been [illegible] teaching: the next year, and the next, he came again, each time with two converts. Early in 1860 he came a fifth time, bringing nine converts for baptism, and in the spring of that year a missionary visited the place, and baptized forty four [illegible] year the aged Christian came again, with sixteen [illegible] pared for the Lord. A great number offered themselves for admission, and a chapel and mission-house were to be purchased and fitted up at once, the Chinese in Hong Kong furnishing the means. [illegible] Chioa, and we may well hope it is but the precursor of still more glorious progress for the truth [illegible]

The Missionaries from China.—If any suppose that returned missionaries lead a life of ease they may dismiss all such thoughts; for if any of these "laborers" leave the "harvest" with any strength remaining in them, coming home is but to get into the pantings of the laborers of a certain Pennsylvania farmer. This man, calling his men from the harvest-field to rest in the barn during the heat of the day, said to them after they had entered: "Now, while we rest, let us thresh." Dr Wentworth and Rev S Lockwood [illegible] in a full day's work in the city of Brooklyn, Sabbath, April 27th, each preaching twice, and between them addressing three Sabbath-schools

Progress of Protestant Missions.—At a recent meeting of the Church Missionary Society, the Rev [illegible] Royston the Society's Corresponding Secretary at Madras, stated his impressions as to the progress of the South-India Missions during the six and a half years that he had been connected with them. The number of native agents, congregations, and communicants had considerably increased during that period. Ten thousand souls had been added to the Church in Tinnevelly. The Harris school, at Madras, was succeeding in attracting a large number of young Muhammedans, and was most hopeful; but an additional missionary was much needed, to devote himself to direct preaching among the Mussulman population of Triplicane.

From India we have news of the death of Mrs. Mullens, the daughter of a missionary, and author of "Phulmani and Karuna," a religious work, which has become to the native church what the Pilgrim's Progress of Bunyan has been to the masses of England. This work, written in exquisite Bengali, has been translated into every vernacular of India.

Germany.—In a letter from Rev. L. S Jacoby to the Corresponding Secretary, dated Zurich, Switzerland, April 23d, he says: "It is now three weeks since I left home. I have visited Saxony, Wurtemberg, Zurich, and two other appointments on this circuit, and I praise God that he is carrying on his work so gloriously, for the power of God is manifested all the time in the conversion of souls. I shall now visit Biel, Lausanne, and Friedrichsdorf-on-the-Main, and then give you a short report after the Lord has brought me safe home."

Murder of an American Missionary in Turkey.—Minister Morris announces, from Constantinople, to Secretary Seward, the death of the American Missionary, J. Coffing, who was assassinated, with his two guides, about the first of April, on the route from Adana to Aleppo.

The region of the country where he had been pursuing his pious labors is one of the most lawless and savage districts of the Turkish empire. The inhabitants are of the Gregorian creed, and remarkable for their bigoted aversion to all other Christian sects. They are merely nominal subjects of the Porte, who exercises but little authority among them, owing to which several travellers, have of late years, lost their lives in this region, and no Egropean Christian can venture there but at great personal risk. Mr. Morris has taken measures to secure the arrest of the guilty parties by the local authorities, and stimulate them to action. He says the animosities of race and religion render the preservation of order very difficult.

A VISIT TO THE HOSPITAL AT QUINCY, ILL

Having been summoned to Quincy by the dangerous condition of a beloved son, made such by many wounds received in the battle of Pittsburg Landing, I propose to put on record a few facts which occurred by the way as matters of history and instruction. A new country, though desolate and unattractive to some at least in the interest of novelty; but the flourishing towns of Ohio and Illinois, the vigorous activity of their teeming population, the vast and fertile prairies, and the father of waters, seen for the first time, called forth, even under sorrowful circumstances, the liveliest emotions.

QUINCY.

I will not delay to describe this city, except to say that it is beautifully situated on a commanding bluff overlooking the majestic Mississippi, and that it looks much like some of our large inland towns in Pennsylvania. It is home-like and comfortable in appearance, whilst the exuberant kindness of its citizens, compel you to feel that you are among the kindest and best of friends.

THE HOSPITAL

Here are brought together the horrors of war and the blessings of Christianity. We read of battle-fields and victories, and of the wounded brought into hospitals; but language in this case fails to express the truth, and the imagination brings no picture before the mind so terrible to the senses. Here is a poor fellow whose head has been opened by a fragment of a shell, and the brain has forced itself out of the opening, so that it appears like a cushion on the side of his head. He is already in a comatose state. He says in reply to a question, "I am a Christian, pray for me." There, in another part of the ward, is a young man whose face and head are swelled up to an [illegible] proportion, and as he sees you pass along he exclaims, "Oh! do come and speak to me, I am so miserable." On such, words of instruction and comfort are not lost. From another ward you hear the piercing exclamation repeated again and again, "Oh! God, be merciful!" It comes from a young artillerist, just brought from Savannah, and undergoing the painful process of dressing his wound. His leg was taken off below the knee, and seems to have been mismanaged in the bandaging, and now, in order to repair the evil, he suffers excruciating pain. Here you meet with a smiling face. The arm, indeed, is off; but it is healing rapidly, and the current of life is carrying health and vigor to every part of the system. There, quietly and without pain, a precious soul is passing into the eternal world. Oh! how the heart saddens and sickens and suffers under such terrible scenes, and kind nature opens the fountain of tears that the breaking heart may find relief through this opened channel.

There are more cheerful and cheering scenes than these to meet the eye, and sweeter sounds to charm the ear. Take the following as an illustration:

Do you love the Saviour?" is a question put to an interesting young man, slowly recovering from a wound, who is reading his Testament. "I think I [illegible] a member of any church?" "Yes" "Then I presume that you have maintained your Christian integrity, and have not abandoned your religious habits." "I can say honestly, I have kept myself from evil, although it was hard." Brave and noble young man! In the midst of abounding sin you have been faithful to your Master. Take another. "Were you not afraid to go into the battle, since you are no Christian?" "Oh, no! Father prayed for us, (my brother is on the Potomac) and he told us we would not be killed." Some may smile incredulously at the confidence of this young man in his father. But that is the kind of confidence which rests in the promises of God, and pleads them with [illegible]

Capt. W———, a noble young man, with a brave and loving heart, expecting to die, was resting sweetly on the merits of our dear Saviour. "Oh, he exclaims, "sing to me!" Some one began,

"How sweet the name of Jesus sounds," but soon broke down in tears. Then another began another of the songs of Zion, and likewise broke down, until we were all in tears. Then the dying [illegible] was good to be there. Presently a young man who [illegible] said, "I am no professing Christian; but I now see the power of Christianity as I never saw it before

[illegible]

I have said that the horrors of war and the blessings of Christianity are brought together in the hospital. I may here also add the latter triumphs over the former. If the world was astonished at the uprising of almost a million of soldiers to defend the freedom of their country, the uprising of an equal [illegible] wounded and comfort the mourners, is equally astonishing. This war has developed the latent power of Christianity, and has made it active and energetic. Enter the hospital at Quincy, almost any time of day, and you will see ladies of refined and polished [illegible] they are. The response probably will be, "They are the Needle Pickets." This is a society of ladies, formed a year ago, for the purpose of promoting the comfort and ministering to the wants of sick, wounded, [illegible] of all ages and creeds, and all are animated by the [illegible]

During the last year they have collected between two and three thousand dollars, and have expended it at the hospitals in Quincy, Cairo, Ironton, Pilot Knob, Dunleith, Pittsburg, Savannah and various other localities. They have employed nurses, who have followed the army to those different places. [illegible] whole regiments of [illegible] soldiers on their way, they have employed their time by day and by night in plying the needle, and in preparing garments for the wounded in the West and South. They have also a home for convalescent soldiers, and thus relieve both the soldiers and the hospital. One feature of their labors struck me as peculiarly thoughtful When soldiers are discharged they are often without funds to carry them home. The Pickets" loan money to the soldiers to enable them to return to their friends, and thus send them on their way [illegible]

Mrs P. C. Keller, Quincy, Ill., is an active member of this association. Any gratuity in the form of money, clothing, &c., &c., directed to her will be properly applied to the object for which it is given. I know of no object which, at the present time, is more worthy of the support of the benevolent. If it were needful, I would plead for this association, but feel that what has been written is sufficient.

I ought not to omit to mention that there is another association of ladies called "The Good Samaritans" who, I am informed, are engaged in the same good work. Not having been brought into contact with them as I was with the other society, I could not write of them with the same freedom. The parents who have sons lying in the hospital at Quincy may rest assured that they are well cared for. The superintendent [illegible] and Dorris [illegible] are skilful and attentive and when needed, have the aid of the whole faculty of the city. The nurses are kind and obliging, and the sick are supplied by the ostlesse and by the Pickets with all that they can need under the circumstances. I cannot refrain from recording the kindness of P. C. Keller, Esq., of which I was the recipient for two weeks, and that of Mr. Moore, which came under my notice daily in the hospital. The record of the Master is: "I was a stranger, and ye took me in; I was sick, and ye visited me. Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy." H. L. BARONESS.

APPEAL OF THE LADIES AID SOCIETY IN BEHALF OF OUR SOLDIERS

This appeal speaks for itself, and we gladly give it a place

We have worked with energy, perseverance and singleness of purpose, and with the blessing of Him from whom cometh every good gift accomplished much, but our work is not done. Many thousands of our sons and brothers are still voluntary exiles from their peaceful, happy homes, exposed to suffering, danger, and death in an ungenial clime, in defence of that Government to which we, as women, owe so much. Consider, too, the character of the men engaged in this terrible conflict, the sacrifices they make of pecuniary means and cherished plans. Many have left lucrative employments, others have laid aside their books, forgetting their longings for literary distinction or scientific attainments, and gone forth with heroic firmness to suffer, and, if needs be, die, that the nation may live and be at peace.

Pass through a military hospital, or a battle-field after an engagement, and listen and be instructed. No murmurings, no repinings are heard from the brave fellows, at the sight of whose mutilated limbs your heart sickens, and your eyes grow dim. Regrets you may hear, not that they have suffered, but that they can suffer no more for their country.

Shall we be less heroic? Have we less at stake than they?

Our treasury is nearly exhausted, whilst the demands

Domestic Items.

The Great Fire in Troy, New York.—We glean from the Troy (N. Y.) Whig the following items in reference to the destructive fire which occurred in that city on Saturday last: At 12, M., it broke out in the rear of the wooden buildings extending to the Hudson river. It was speedily in a sheet of flame, and communicated to the [illegible] and rapid destruction. Attention was then [illegible] the property in the neighborhood. The embers were carried in every direction, setting fire to dozens of buildings. For most of the time the fire raged from west to east, and all the efforts of the firemen failed to check its devouring progress. Nor did it cease its raging until hundreds of buildings and millions of property were consumed to ashes.

From estimates made, and as accurate as possible under the circumstances, it is probable that the aggregate losses will approximate three million of dollars, and the aggregate insurance about one million four hundred thousand dollars. The bridge and depot cost some three hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars. The Sixth Street Presbyterian Church near fifty thousand dollars; the Fifth Street Baptist, fifteen to twenty thousand dollars. The Union House cost forty thousand dollars, and the furniture thirty thousand!

A large number of public and charitable institutions were destroyed, including the Troy Orphan Asylum, the Church Asylum, the Warren Female Charity School, the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, the Troy Academy, and the Free Chapel. The shipping in the river narrowly escaped, as the large burning fragments of the bridge floated down among the vessels, and kept all hands busy warding them off.

As far as ascertained, nine persons were burned to death, and a large number were more or less burned, and otherwise injured.

The two following Proclamations are mutually explanatory of each other:

Proclamation by the President.

To the People of the Confederate States of America

An enemy, waging war in a manner violative of the usage of civilized nations, has invaded our country. With the presumptuous reliance on superior numbers, he has declared his purpose to reduce us to submission. We struggle to preserve our birthright of constitutional freedom. Our trust is in the justice of our cause and the protection of our God.

Recent disaster has spread gloom over the land, and sorrow sits at the hearth-stones of our countrymen; but a people conscious of rectitude, and faithfully relying on their Father in Heaven, may be cast down, but cannot be dismayed. They may mourn the loss of the martyre whose lives have been sacrificed in their defence, but they receive this dispensation of Divine Providence with humble submission and reverent faith. And now that our hosts are again going forth to battle, and loving hearts at home are filled with anxious solicitude for their safety, it is meet that the whole people should turn imploringly to their Almighty Father, and be seech his all powerful protection.

To this end, therefore, I, JEFFERSON DAVIS, President of the Confederate States of America, do issue my proclamation, inviting all the people to unite, at their several places of worship, on Friday, the 16th day of the present month of May, in humble supplication to Almighty God, that he will vouchsafe His blessings on our beloved country; that He will strengthen and protect our armies; that He will watch over and protect our people from the machinations of their enemies; and that He will, in His own good time, restore to us the blessings of peace and security under His sheltering care.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Confederate States, at Richmond, on the third day of May, A. D. 1862. JEFFERSON DAVIS.

A Proclamation.

By the President of the United States of America:

Whereas, by the proclamation of the nineteenth of April, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, it was declared that the ports of certain States, including those of Beaufort, in the State of North Carolina, Port Royal, in the State of South Carolina, and New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, were, for reasons therein set forth, intended to be placed under blockade; and whereas, the said ports of Beaufort, Port Royal, and New Orleans have since been blockaded; but as the blockade of the same ports may now be safely relaxed with advantage to the interests of commerce:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, ABRAHAM LINCOLN, President of the United States, pursuant to the authority in me vested by the fifth section of the act of Congress, approved on the 13th of July last, entitled, "An Act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, and for other purposes," do hereby declare that the blockade of the said ports of Beaufort, Port Royal and New Orleans, shall so far cease, and determine, from and after the 1st day of June next, that commercial intercourse with those ports, except as to persons, and things, and information contraband of war, may from that time be carried on, subject to the laws of the United States, and to the limitations and in pursuance of the regulations which are prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury in his order of this date, which is appended to this proclamation.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

South Carolina, Florida and Georgia Under Martial law.—General Hunter Declares the Slaves Forever Free.—General Hunter, it will be seen by the following order, has declared the States comprised in his Division under martial law. This will enable the General to operate more efficiently in the reduction of those States to loyalty:

"HEADQUARTERS, Department of the South, Hilton Head, South Carolina, May 9, 1862.—General Orders, No. 11.—The three States of Georgia, Florida and South Carolina, comprising the military department of the South, having deliberately declared themselves no longer under the protection of the United States of America, and having taken up arms against the said United States, it becomes a military necessity to declare them under martial law. This was accordingly done on the 25th day of April, 1862. Slavery and martial law in a free country are altogether incompatible; the persons in these three States—Georgia, Florida and South Carolina—heretofore held as slaves, are, therefore, declared forever freed. {Official} "DAVID HUNTER.

"ED. W. SMITH, Acting Assistant-General."

Arom Com. Foote's Flotilla.—Flag Officer Foote's Farewell to his Boys.—A quiet, unassuming invalid, with the aid of a pair of crutches and the support of the faithful "Orderly," Com. Davis, Capt. Phelps, and Lieutenant Bishop merge from "Old Flag's" room on the starboard. The invalid, after hobbling to the front, says:

OFFICERS AND MEN:—It has now become my painful duty to inform you I am to leave you, though I trust only for a short time. Commodore Davis, whom the Department has seen fit to appoint my successor for the time being, is a gentleman of talent and scientific, as well as Naval ability, known as such not only in this but in foreign lands. He very deservedly enjoys a character which, as yet, and I know and feel will ever remain unsullied, and is the man whom I mentioned to the Department above all others to fill for my temporary relief. [Here, from exhaustion and a choked utterance, he was overcome. He soon rallied, and, turning to Commodore Davis, continued.]—Commodore Davis, I can only say these gallant officers—men of the East, West, North, South, and of foreign climes—who now stand before you, are men on whom you can depend in any emergency. I have tried one and all, and know it, and although they may never receive the reward due their gallant and manly bearing, we have the proud satisfaction of knowing, in our interior life, that our conscience is right—that we have done our duty.

Providence has seen fit to afflict me in our triumphal hour—just as the great work allotted us is being crowned; but I trust that I may regain my failing strength, in body and mind, and be enabled to rejoin you.

The difficulties consequent in improving a squadron like this without means at all adequate to the work required, have been even greater than the signal victories in vindication of our glorious Union. But the work may be said to be finished, as we must, in a few days, occupy Fort Pillow, while a majority of Union people are awaiting to hail our arrival at Memphis with rejoicing and from thence opening the Mississippi south to New Orleans and the like.

The painful duty is now over. I wish that I was able to [illegible] more towards others, but I am so weak. (Touched to tears.) I introduce you to Mr. Duffy, Mr. Hixby and—(here Captain Phelps relieves him by introducing Commodore Davis to each officer singly.) Turning to the seamen he Flag Officer says:—These men, too, you can always depend upon in any emergency. They are ever anxious to get into a fight; they will never surrender to the enemy. If you don't hold them back, they will be in ahead of you before the enemy. They can run faster than I can, you see—(Casting his eyes to his wounded foot.) Officers and men, one and all, farewell.

Prisoners of War.—A despatch from Fortress Monroe informs us that 625 released Union prisoners were to leave that point for Baltimore. Ninety rebel prisoners, who were to be returned in exchange, respectfully "declined the honor," although earnestly urged and threatened by their officers, but took the oath of allegiance to the United States. Another despatch from Washington conveys the still more gratifying intelligence that five hundred rebels, belonging to a Virginia regiment, had deserted their [illegible], an Taken the oath of allegiance to the Federal government. In [illegible] refused [illegible] down their arms. [illegible] advised that the hearts of [illegible] after with their treacherous [illegible] assistance is needed that a [illegible] the war will meet with its adequate reward.

Union Men in Tennessee.—We are glad to learn that some of the most distinguished citizens of Tennessee have united in issuing an address to their fellow citizens of the same State, inviting them to meet at the capitol, in Nashville, on the 12th inst., for the purpose of taking such steps as will restore Tennessee to her former status with the Federal [illegible] Among the signers to the call are such persons as Andrew Johnson, Wm B. Campbell, Balie Peyton, Wm B Stokes, Wm. S. Cheatham. This is a move in the right direction, and as it is in such capable hands we [illegible]

New Orleans. By Southern papers received in this city, we have intelligence from New Orleans to the 3d inst. In consequence of the scarcity of [illegible] the greatest distress prevails in that city. Mayor Monroe and all the aldermen, on refusing to take the oath of allegiance to the Federal government were arrested and conveyed to prison. Gen. Butler had landed seven regiments, and had issued a proclamation declaring martial law, and promising protection to all those who may take the oath of allegiance, and behave themselves as loyal citizens.

Pensacola Taken.—It will cause a thrill of joy throughout the loyal portion of the land to know that the Union cause has sustained a new triumph, and that the stars and stripes float over another "Gibralter" of the rebels. Pensacola, the boasted stronghold of the rebellion on the Southern coast, has been taken from the hands of its despoilers and restored into the hands of its rightful owners. The intelligence to this effect comes to us from Southern sources, Jacob Thompson, Secretary of the Interior under Mr. Buchanan, and now on the staff of Beauregard, being the bearer of the joyful news. This will be another stunning blow to the rebel cause, and from the effects of which it will not soon recover. Ever since the day Pensacola was evacuated by the little band of United States soldiers, and subsequently occupied by the rebels, it was the common vaunt of the latter that they would make it impregnable against any force that could be sent against it, and would ultimately take Fort Pickens from the hands of the Union soldiers; but by the vigilance and bravery of our officers, soldiers and sailors in those parts—for the army and navy worked in unison—the latter boast was prevented from being carried out, and the former has at last been won back.

Norfolk.—Stringent orders have been issued by General Wool, prohibiting the sale of newspapers, the transportation of supplies and merchandise, and the return of citizens or soldiers to Norfolk. It is stated that the embargo on travel to Fortress Monroe will soon be removed.

Gen Mitchell.—Gen. Mitchell's little army has made another of those exploits for which it is everywhere famous. He despatched an expedition on the 13th, under command of Gen. Negley, a Pennsylvanian, against Rigersville, but before Gen. Negley reached there the rebels fled. Gen. M. sent an expedition against Shadd creek, which was more successful, destroying the ferry-boat and the bridge at that place. There are some rebel cavalry in that vicinity which Gen. Mitchell promises to destroy or capture.

Gen Banks.—From Gen. Banks' headquarters at Strasburg, we learn that the Union people of that region are pouring into town, under the belief that Gen. Banks' army is retreating. Three hundred rebel guerrillas made a dash upon a number of the Twenty-Eighth Pennsylvania regiment, and killed or took fourteen prisoners.

Gen. McClellan.—On Saturday his army advanced on the main road to the city, and drove the enemy across the Chickahominy at Bottom's bridge, where a harmless artillery fight occurred.

Repulse of the Fleet.—Our fleet that ascended the James river, consisting of the Galena, Monitor and Naugatuck, all iron-clad vessels, and the Port Royal and Aroostook, have been repulsed at Fort Darling, seven miles below Richmond. The iron gun on board of the Naugatuck, which is said to have bursted, was mounted amidships, pointed towards the bow, and was loaded from below by depressing the muzzle, which was effected by means of pulleys ingeniously constructed for that purpose. This gun was loaded by means of a moveable charger, which could be raised or lowered at pleasure. The ramming was accomplished by a sort of piston rod on a line with the muzzle of the gun, which is also worked by pulleys, thus affording the celerity of loading and firing every half minute. The gun was capable of throwing a hundred-pound shot a great distance. The Lieutenant Marrie, of the Port Royal, mentioned as having been wounded, was the commander of the Cumberland during her engagement with the Merrimac. Eight miles below Richmond the James river is only about half a mile wide and the water very shallow. On both banks of the river are high bluffs easily fortified. At this point the fort was located. After bombarding the place four hours, and finding our gunboats could not silence the battery, our gunboats withdrew. Our loss was thirteen killed, and a number wounded.

Southern News.—Later Southern news has been received by way of Cairo. The rebel papers of the West state that the evacuation of Yorktown and Norfolk was done for strategical reasons. The Union people of Memphis are said to be sorely dispirited on account of the non-arrival of our fleet before that city. Rebel accounts of the naval fight on the Mississippi claim a victory for their side, having "sunk one gunboat and two spar-ar-boats." The rebel loss was two killed and eight wounded. Their fleet was commanded by Captain Montgomery, assisted by Jeff Thompson. Flour is quoted at twenty-two dollars per barrel in Memphis, and other necessaries of life in proportion.

Pope's Corps.—General Pope's corps de armée of General Halleck's army has again advanced, and is now within three miles of the rebel intrenchments at Corinth. Deserters continue to report that great dissatisfaction is everywhere expressed in Beauregard's army, and that the enlisted men from the Border States see no reason why they should fight for the independence of the Cotton States.

Geary.—General Geary has sent to Secretary Stanton the official report of the killing of one, and the capture of 15 of his men by a body of rebels. General G. states that he ordered a company of infantry to Lindeo, and that the advance guard of said company, numbering 17 men, were attacked by from 300 to 600 rebel cavalry, and after gallantly resisting, were overpowered and taken prisoners.

Gen Hunter.—Accounts by steamer Port Royal, which arrived on Saturday, report that the proclamation of General Hunter has been published in Charleston, and a negro insurrection there was imminent. It is expected that Savannah will soon be in our possession, General Hunter having erected numerous batteries that will shell the city if it is not surrendered to him. Our troops hold a portion of the railroad between Savannah and Charleston.

Princeton, Va.—Humphrey Marshall's command of rebels attacked and captured Princeton, the capital of Mercer county, Virginia, and situated 270 miles west of Richmond. The next morning Gen. Cox defeated the rebels and captured the place.

Hunter's Proclamation Repudiated by the President. The President has issued a proclamation repudiating the alleged proclamation of General Hunter, as unauthorized, and of no validity and effect, and reserving to himself alone the right to determine whether he can constitutionally adopt such a policy, if the contingencies of the war eventually make it necessary.

Personal.

David G Farragutt, the [illegible] fleet now before New Orleans, is a native of the State of Tennessee, and is about sixty-three years of age. He is a citizen of his native State, and was appointed to the United States Navy from that State. He entered the service as a midshipman when a mere child, his warrant bearing date December 17, 1810. He was first on board the Essex, under the redoubtable Commodore David Porter, and served with him also in the expedition around Cape Horn in 1815. In 1825 he was made a Lieutenant, in 1841 a commander, and in 1855 a captain. He has been in the United States Navy over fifty-one years; he has spent twenty one years of that time at sea, nineteen years, and over, on shore and other duty, and has been for eleven years unemployed. Under his commission as captain he has seen over two years and a half sea service, part of which in the capacity of Flag Officer.

Capt. Theodorus Bailey, United States Navy, who commanded the fleet of gunboats which passed up the Mississippi and participated in the attack on Forts Jackson and St. Philip, and the shore batteries between the mouth of the river and the city of New Orleans, is a native of [illegible] County, was a soldier of the Revolution. Captain Bailey entered the navy on New Year's day of 1811—[illegible] forty-four years. Of these, [illegible] been spent at sea, about six [illegible] has been employed [illegible] various to his [illegible]

Foreign Summary.

The course of justice don't seem to run any purer in England than with ourselves, judging by the recent trial and conviction of our fellow-countryman, Mr. G. F. Train, for laying down a track for a horse railroad in one of the streets of London,—a road certainly called for, as evidenced by the fact that more than half a million of passengers used it during the six months of its existence.

He was indicted, in connexion with the vestrymen of Lambeth, (who authorized the laying down of his tram-way,) for creating and maintaining a nuisance. Numerous witnesses, notorious either for their connexion or sympathy with the omnibus interest, or for their anti-American prejudices, were examined for the prosecution, and established, as the published reports show, a very weak case indeed. At the moment the prosecution rested, the foreman of the jury rose in his place and addressed the Judge, declaring that the minds of the jury were fully made up, not only from the testimony they had heard, but also from their own personal knowledge of the facts in the case. Instead of rebuking them for presuming to come to a decision before hearing both sides, and especially for daring to bring into the jury-box their own pre-received prejudices and private opinions, Chief Justice Erle entered into conversation with them, and finally asked the question whether, if Mr. Train's witnesses should testify to an entirely different state of facts, proving that the tram-way was an unquestionable public convenience, &c., such testimony would have any effect upon their decision? Will it be credited that the foreman of the jury, speaking for the whole body, promptly and decisively answered that it would have no effect whatever? So it, however, was the actual fact, and the Judge received, and the clerk recorded their verdict of guilty, without a word of evidence having been heard from the many respectable witnesses Mr. Train had in attendance.

It is not the only strange case that has recently occurred in the English Courts. At the last Norfolk Assizes, Baron Martin decided that the erection of telegraph posts along a turnpike road, even after the sanction of the proper authorities had been obtained, was a public nuisance, the authors of which were criminally indictable on the complaint of any person inconvenienced thereby, and subject to other penalties than the abatement of the nuisance itself. All the Telegraph Companies in the land are in a state of excitement, and if this decision be sustained, some legislative action will be necessary for their relief.

Presbyterianism in England.—The Rev. Dr. Edmond, of Islington, in a recent lecture at Regent's Square, speaking of the future "prospects" of Presbyterianism in England, said that it was absolutely necessary for its progress that it should be adapted to English tastes, that it should be relieved from the imputation of being a Scottish exotic; that sacred music should be especially attended to, (now very much neglected,) and that, for his part, he considered that every congregation which desired it, should be allowed to have instrumental music.

BUCKS COUNTY SS.—TO ALL TO WHOM THESE PRESENTS MAY COME.

I, the subscriber, a Justice of the Peace, in and for the county of Bucks, do hereby certify that I am acquainted and know Emily Johnson, formerly Rodney, who was married to Samuel Johnson, who was married before William Hawk, Esq., of Bristol, Bucks County, as appears by record on his docket; and after careful examination and mature reflection, I feel myself fully safe in saying that the said Johnson had a wife living at the time he married the said Emily Rodney, and further say that I have the evidence of Daniel Emmons, (local preacher of the Methodist Episcopal Church) Charles Emmons, (Class leader) and Benjamin Commings, (who is exhorter,) that he had one or more wives living at the time he married the said Emily Johnson; and the evidence, on affirmation of the said Emily Johnson, that he had a wife living at the time she married him, which, at the time she married him, she had no knowledge of.

PERRY & FITZGERALD'S

PROCESS FOR MAKING LIGHT, NUTRITIOUS, AND UNADULTERATED BREAD, WITHOUT FERMENTATION

The new process of bread making, patented by Perry & Fitzgerald rem ves all the obstacles which have hitherto rendered it impossible to manufacture perfectly pure, sweet, and nutritious bread. The entire process is performed by mechanical means, and is eminently cleanly.

The process consists in mixing the flour in a closed vessel, and the application of pure carbonic gas, under pressure, by which the dough mass is made thoroughly light and ready to be [illegible] into pans for baking in the brief space of fifteen or twenty minutes. The "sponge" is usually 300 pounds, and each machine complete for operation, in all its details, from the putting up of the flour to the discharging of the dough, is from twenty five to forty minutes.

The invention of Perry & Fitzgerald effects a revolution in the preparation of bread, by establishing a system of wholesale manufacture not subject to the vicissitudes and evils of fermentation, but exact and certain in its results:—1. Because, by the substitution of mechanical for manual labor, and to the superior value of the article produced, it promises large profits upon the capital employed. 2. Because such employment of capital, as well as the protection afforded by the patent, gives adequate security against competition. But whilst preventing undue competition it produces none of the evils of a monopoly, because it leaves the consumer at all times in possession of the cheaper means of supply, to be resorted to, should the monopoly become prejudicial.

The application of pure carbonic acid gas, under pressure, to a mechanically kneaded dough-mass, as in the invention of Perry & Fitzgerald, did not occur to Dr. Ure, though he seems to have had a clear foreshadowing of the introduction of the artificial gas, since he states, hypothetically, that "if water, highly impregnated with carbonic acid gas, be used for kneading the dough, the resulting bread will be somewhat spongy. Could a [illegible] be continued, "to produced in this way, then, as the sugar would remain undecomposed, the bread would be as much the sweeter and more nourishing."

What, in Dr. Ure was evidently a clearly comprehended chemical truth, has been practically developed by the brilliant invention of Perry & Fitzgerald. Posterity will hold their names in grateful remembrance, as among the most eminent benefactors of mankind.

Married.

At Jefferson city, Mo., by Rev. John Turner, Assistant Chaplain, Mr. JAMES WARWICK ZANE, of Pennsylvania, to Mrs. LUCINDA WILLIAMS, of Jefferson city, Mo.

At St. Louis, Mo., Jan. 23d, 1862, by Rev. John Turner, Mr. [illegible] of Washington city, D. C., to Miss JARUSHA HILL, of St. Louis, Mo.

Died.

Died at his residence in Jefferson city, Mo., April [illegible] Brother ESAU TURNER in the [illegible] th year of his age.

After suffering severe affliction for thirteen days in the full triumph of a living faith he left this world. He leaves to mourn his loss a wife and one child. Brother Turner was a faithful and useful local preacher in our Church. It is true, he was born a slave in Kentucky, hence had not the opportunity of acquiring an early education, but as he grew older, had some opportunities of learning to read and write, &c.

He was a man of bright intellect, great zeal, and moral courage, humble, courteous and unassuming. Those who were associated with him only knew him to love him. He was an affectionate husband and a kind father. It may truly be said of him, "Mark the perfect and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace." Sweet consolation. Brother Turner is resting, until he shall be permitted to return rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him, for we have reason to believe he has many. Eight years of his useful labors were performed in this State, (Missouri.)

JOHN TURNER.

Two more soldiers of the cross fallen. In Richmond, Ind., May 4th, CAROLINE BANKS, the wife of Joseph Banks, in the full triumph of faith in Jesus.

She quietly sleeps in Jesus. The memory of sister Banks still, and will forever, live in the minds of her friends. May her body rest quietly in the dust until Jesus says, "It is enough, come up higher!"

Also died, in the city of Richmond, Ind., May 10th, FANNY PICKET, but will be known best by grandmother Picket.

She was the grandmother of Sister Fanny McIntosh, and the wife of Rev. Amos McIntosh. Sister Picket was over one hundred years old. She, having been raised a slave, it was impossible to ascertain her precise age; but she informed me that during the Revolutionary War she was a young woman 20 years of age, or may be more. She died in the full triumph of faith in Jesus, and was rational until she left the world. Weep not, my friends, for your loss is her eternal gain.

Also died, in the city of Richmond, Ind., on the 10th of May, HARRIET MOORE, daughter of Caroline and Joseph Moore, aged 8 years and 27 days.

She quietly sleeps in Jesus, for says the blessed Jesus, "Suffer little children to come unto me." Sister Banks' funeral sermon will be attended to by Wm C. Tresan in the future, and sister Fanny Picket's by Bishop Wm. P. Quinn, by request, in the future. Sister Harriet's was attended to before interment from the subject 2 Kings iv. 26.

I AM DYING.

Be to my [illegible] heart,
Paint and fainter comes my breath,
And [illegible]
Must, I know, be those of death.

Sit down close beside me, darling,
Let me clasp your warm, strong hand—
Yours, that ever has sustained me
To the borders of this land.

For your God and mine—our Father—
Those shall ever lead me on,
Where, upon a throne eternal,
Sits his loved and only Son.

I've had visions and been dreaming
O'er the past of joy and pain;
Year by year I've wandered backward,
Till I was a child again.

Dreamed of girlhood and the moment
When I stood your wife and bride
How my heart thrilled with love's triumph
In that hour of woman's pride!

Dreamed of thee—and all the earth-cords
Firmly twined about my heart—
Oh, the bitter, burning anguish
When I knew that we must part!

It has passed, and God has promised
All thy footsteps to attend;
He, that's more than friend or brother,
He'll be with thee to the end.

There's no shadow o'er the portals
Leading to my heavenly home;
Christ has promised life immortal,
And 'tis he that bids me come.

When life's trials wait around thee,
And its chilling billows swell,
Thou'lt thank Heaven that I am spared them,
Thou'lt feel then that "all is well."

Bring our boys unto my bedside;
My last blessing let them keep—
But they're sleeping, do not wake them—
They'll learn soon enough to weep

Tell them often of their mother;
Kiss them for me when they wake;
Lead them gently in the path-way;
Love them doubly for my sake.

Clasp my hand still closer, darling,
This the last night of my life;
For to-morrow I shall never
Answer when you call me "wife."

Fare thee well, my noble husband;
Faint not 'neath this chastening rod,
Throw your strong arm round our children
Keep them close to thee—and God.

MY WHISTLING NEIGHBOR.

We had moved into a new house, situated about the centre in a row of ten, all run up together in hurried, mushroom fashion, and divided from each other by partitions of brick so thin that sound was only a little deadened in passing through. For the first three or four nights I was unable to sleep, except in snatches, for so many noises came to my ears, originating, apparently, in my own domicile, that anxiety in regard to burglars was constantly excited. Both on the first and second nights I made a journey through the house in the small hours, but found no intruders on my premises. The sounds that disturbed me came from some of my neighbors, who kept later vigils than suited my habits.

"There it is again!" said I, looking up from my paper, as I sat reading on the second day after taking possession of my new home. "That fellow is a nuisance."

"What fellow?" asked my wife, whose countenance showed surprise at the remark. She was either unconscious or unaffected by the circumstances that annoyed my sensitive ears.

"Don't you hear it?" said I.

"Hear, what?"

"That everlasting whistle."

"Oh!" A smile played over my wife's face "Does it annoy you?"

"I can't say that I am particularly annoyed by it yet; but I shall be if it's to go on incessantly A man whistles for want of thought, and this very fact will—"

"I'm not so sure of that," remarked my wife, interrupting me, "the poet notwithstanding. I would say that he whistles from exuberant feelings Our neighbor has a sunny temper, no doubt; what, I am afraid, cannot be said of our neighbor on the other side. I've never heard him whistle; but his scolding abilities are good, and, judging from two days' observation, he is not likely to permit them to grow feeble for want of use."

I did not answer, but went on with my reading, silenced, if not reconciled to my whistling neighbor.

Business matters annoyed me through the day, and I felt moody and depressed as I took my course homeward at nightfall. I was not leaving my cares behind me. Before shutting my account books, and locking my fire-proof, I had made up a bundle of troubles to carry away with me, and my shoulders stooped beneath the burden

I did not bring sunlight into my dwelling as I crossed, with dull, deliberate steps, its threshold The dying feet that sprang along the hall, and the eager voices that filled, suddenly, the air in a sweet tumult of sound as I entered, were quiet and hushed in a little while. I did not repel my precious ones, for they were very dear to my heart; but birds do not sing joyously except in the sunshine, and my presence had cast a shadow The songs of my home birds died into fitful chirpings—they sat quiet among the branches. I saw this, and understood the reason. I condemned myself; I reasoned against the folly of bringing worldly cares into the home sanctuary; I endeavored to rise out of my gloomy state. But neither philosophy nor a self-compelling effort was of any avail

I was sitting, with my hand partly shading my face from the light, still in conflict with myself, when I became conscious of a lifting of the shadows that were around me, and of a freer respiration. The change was slight, but very perceptible. I was beginning to question as to its cause, when my thought recognized an agency which had been operative through the sense of hearing, though not before externally perceived in consequence of my abstracted state. My neighbor was whistling "Begone, Dull Care!"

Now, in my younger days, I had whistled and sung the air and words of that cheerful old song hundreds of times, and every line was familiar to memory. I listened, with pleased interest, for a little while, and then, as my changing state gave power to resolutions quick born of better reason, I said, in my thought, emphatically, as if remanding an evil spirit,—

"Begone, dull care!"

And the fiend left me. Then I spoke cheerfully, and in a tone of interest to quiet little May, who had walked around me three or four times, wondering in her little heart, no doubt, what held her at a distance from her papa, and who was now seated by her mother, leaning her flaxen head, fluted all over with glossy curls, against her knee. She sprang at my voice, and was in my lap at a bound!—What a thrill of pleasure the tight clasp of her arms sent to my heart! Oh love, thou art full of blessing!

From that moment I felt kinder toward my neighbor. He had done me good—had played before me as David played before Saul, exorcising the evil spirit of discontent. There was no long er a repellent sphere, and soon all my little ones were close around me, and happy as in other times with their father.

After they were all in bed, and I sat alone with my wife, the cares that "infest the day" made a new assault upon me, and vigorously strove to regain their lost empire in my mind. I felt their approaches, and the gradual receding of cheerful thoughts with every advancing step they made In my struggle to maintain the tranquility which so strengthens the soul for work and duty I arose and walked the floor.—My wife looked up to me with inquiry on her face. Then she let her eyes fall upon her needlework, and as I glanced toward her at every turn in my walk, I saw an expression of tender concern on her lips. She understood that I was not at ease in my mind, and the knowledge troubled her

"How wrong in me," I said in self rebuke, "thus to let idle brooding over mere outside things, which such brooding can in no way affect, trouble the peace of home;" and I made a new effort to rise again into a sunnier region. But the fiend had me in his clutches again, and I could not release myself. Now it was that my David came anew to my relief. Suddenly his clear notes rang out in the air, "Away with Melancholy."

I cannot tell which worked the instant revulsion of feeling that came—the cheerful air, the words of the song which were called to remembrance by the air, or the associations of by gone years that were revived. But the spell was potent and complete. I was myself again

During the evening the voice of my wife broke out several times into snatches of song—a thing quite unusual of late, for life's sober realities had taken the music from her as well as from her husband. We were growing graver every day. It was pleasant to hear her flute tones again, very pleasant, and my ear hearkened lovingly. The cause of this fitful warbling I recognized each time as the notes died away.—They were responsive to our neighbor

I did not then remark upon the circumstance One reason of this lay in the fact that I had spoken lightly of our neighbor's whistling propensity, which struck me in the beginning as vulgar; and I did not care to acknowledge myself so largely his debtor as I really was

We were in our bedroom, and about retiring for the night, when loud voices, as if in strife, came discordantly through the thin party walls, from our neighbors on the other side. Something had gone wrong there, and angry passions were in the ascendant.

"How very disagreeable!" I remarked

"The man's a brute!" said my wife, emphatically. "He does nothing, it seems to me, but wrangle in his family. Pity that he hadn't something of the pleasant temper of our neighbor on the other side."

"That is a more agreeable sound, I must confess," was my answer as the notes of "What Fairy like Music steals over the Sea" rose sweetly on the air.

"Far more agreeable," returned my wife

"He plays well on his instrument," I said, smiling. My ear was following the notes in pleased recognition. We stood listening until our neighbor passed to another air, set to Mrs. Hemans' beautiful words. "Come to the Sunset Tree." To a slow, soft, tender measure the notes fell, yet still we heard them with singular distinctness through the intervening wall, just a little muffled, but sweeter for the obstruction.

"The day is past and gone,
The workman's axe lies free,
And the reaper's work is done."

My wife recalled these lines from her memory, repeating them in a subdued, tranquillising tone. The air was still sounding in our ears, but we no longer recognized its impression on the external senses. It had done its work of recalling the beautiful Evening Hymn of the Switzer, and we repeated to each other verse after verse:

"Sweet is the hour of rest,
Pleasant the wood's low sigh,
And the gleaming of the west
And the turf whereon we lie.
When the burden and the heat
Of labor's task is o'er,
And kindly voices greet
The loved one at the door."

To which I added

"But rest, more sweet and still
Than ever night fall gave,
Our longing hearts shall fill,
In the world beyond the grave.
There shall no tempest blow,
No scorching noon-tide heat;
There shall be no more snow,
No weary, wandering feet,
And we lift our trusting eyes
From the hills our fathers trod,
To the quiet of the skies—
To the Sabbath of our God."

All was now still on both sides. The harsh discord of our scolding neighbor had ceased, and our whistling neighbor had warbled his good-night melody, which, like a pleasant flower growing near an unsightly object, and interposing a veil of beauty, had removed it from our consciousness

It was a long time since I had felt so peaceful on retiring as when my head went down upon its pillow—thanks to my light hearted neighbor, at whose whistling propensities I was inclined in the beginning to be annoyed. But for him I should have gone to rest with the harsh discord of my scolding neighbor's voice in my ears, and been ill at ease with myself and the world. On what seeming trifles hang our states of mind! A word, a look, a tone of music, a discordant jar, will bring light or shadow, smiles or tears.

On the next morning, while dressing myself, thought reached me forward over the day's anxieties, and care began drawing her sombre curtains around me. My neighbor was stirring also, and like the awakening bird, tuneful in sweet matins.

"Day on the Mountains" rang out cheerily, followed by "Dear Summer Morn;" winding off with "Begone, Dull Care!" and the merry laughter of a happy child which had sprung into his arms, and was being smothered with kisses.

The cloud that was gathering on my brow passed away, and I met my wife and children at the breakfast table with pleasant smiles

In a few days I ceased to notice the whistling of my neighbor. It continued as usual; but had grown to be such a thing of course as not to be an object of thought. But the effect remained, showing itself in a gradual restoration of that cheerfulness which care, and brooding anxiety about worldly things are so apt to produce. The "voice of music," which had been almost dumb in my wife for a long period, was gradually restored. Old familiar ditties would break suddenly from her throat as she sat sewing, and I would often hear her singing again, from room to room, as in the summer days of our spring-time. As for myself, scarcely an evening passed in which I was not betrayed into beating time with my foot to "Auld Lang Syne," "Happy Land," "Comin' through the Rye," or "Hail Columbia," in response to my neighbor's cheery whistle. Our children also caught the infection, and would commence singing on the instant our neighbor tuned his pipes. Verily he was our benefactor—the harping David to our Saul.

"You live at Number 510, I think," said a gentleman whose face was familiar, though I was not able to call his name. We were sitting side by side in the cars

I answered in the affirmative.

"So I thought," he replied. "I live at 514—second door east."

"Mr Gordon."

"Yes, Sir; that is my name. Pleasant houses, but mere nut shells," said he. Then with a look of disgust on his face, "Doesn't that whistling fellow between us annoy you terribly? I've got so out of all patience that I shall either move or silence him. Whistle, whistle, whistle, from morning till night. Pah! I always detested whistling. It's a sign of no brains. I've written him a note twice, but failed to send either time; it isn't well to quarrel with a neighbor if you can keep it."

"It doesn't annoy me at all," I answered. "Indeed, I rather like it"

"You do? Well, that is singular! Just what my wife says"

"First-rate for low spirits, I find. I'm indebted to our whistling friend for sundry favors in this direction."

My new acquaintance looked at me curiously

"You're not in earnest," said he, a half-amused smile breaking through the unamiable expression which his face had assumed

"Altogether in earnest; and I beg of you not to send him that note. So your wife is not an inquirer?"

"Not she"

"Is she musical?" I inquired

"She was; but of late years life has been rather a serious matter with us, and her singing birds have died, or lost the heart for music.

[illegible]

"Has there been any recent change?" I ventured to inquire

"In what respect?" he asked

"Has there been an [illegible] from the singing birds?"

[illegible]

"Why, yes," he answered, "now that I think of it, there has been some low, fitful warbling Only last evening the voice of my wife stole out, as if [illegible], and troubled a little while on the words of an old song

"The air of which our neighbor was whistling at the time," said I

"Right" was my companion's exclamation after a pause, slapping his hand on his knee. I could hardly help smiling at the look of wonder, amusement, and conviction that blended on his face

"I wouldn't send that note," said I, meaningly.

"No! I must study this case. I'm something of a philosopher, you must know. If our neighbor can awaken the singing birds in the heart of my wife, he may whistle till the crack of doom without hinderance from me. I'm obliged to you for your suggestion"

A week afterward I met him again.

"What about the singing birds?" I asked, smiling.

"All alive again, thank God!" He answered with a heartiness of manner that caused me to look narrowly into his face. It wore a better expression than when I observed it last

"Then you didn't send that note?"

"No, Sir. Why, since I saw you I've actually taken to whistling and humming old tunes again, and you can't tell how much better it makes me feel. And the children are becoming as merry and musical as crickets. Our friend's whistle sets them all agoing, like the first signal warble of a bird at day dawn that awakens the woods to melody."

We were on our way homeward, and parted at my own door. As I entered "Home, Sweet Home" was pulsing in tender harmonies on the air. I stood still and listened until tears fell over my cheeks. The singing birds were alive again in the heart of my wife also, and I said, "Thank God!" as warmly as my neighbor had uttered the words a little while before.

THE IRISHMAN AND HIS THREE CHILDREN

On board one of the lake steamers bound for the West, were an Irish family—husband, wife, and three children. They were evidently in very destitute circumstances; but the exceeding beauty of the children, two girls and a boy, was the admiration of their fellow-passengers. A lady, who had no children of her own, was desirous of adopting one of the little travellers, and made application to the father, through a friend, who gives the following touching, and, as we suppose, truthful account of the negotiation:

"I proceeded," he says, "immediately on my delicate diplomacy. Finding my friend on deck, I thus opened the affair—

"You are very poor?"

His answer was very characteristic

"'Poor, sir!' said he, 'ay, if there's a poorer man than me troublin' the world, God pity both on us, for we'd be about equil.'

"Then how do you manage to support your children?"

"Is it support them, sir? Why I don't support them any way; they get supported some way or other. It'll be time enough to complain when they do.'

"'Would it be a relief to you to part with one of them?'

"It was too sudden; he turned sharply round

"'A what, sir?' he cried, 'a relief to part from my child? A relief, indeed! What do you mane?'

"'You don't understand me,' I replied, 'If, now, it were in one's power to provide comfortably for one of your children, would you stand in the way of its interests?'

"'No, sir,' said he, 'I would willingly cut the sunshine away from myself, that they might get all the warm of it; but tell me what you are drawing at?'

"I then told him that a lady had taken a fancy to have one of his children, and, if he would consent to it, it should be educated, and finally settled comfortably in life.

"This threw him into a fit of gratulation. He scratched his head, and looked the very picture of bewilderment. The struggle between a father's love and the child's interest was evident and touching At length he said:

"'Oh, wouldn't it be a great thing for the baby? But I must go and talk with Mary—that's the mother of 'em; an' it wouldn't be right to be givin' away her children before her face, and she to know nothing at all about it.'

"'Away with you then,' said I, 'and bring me an answer back as soon as possible.'

"In about half an hour he returned, leading two of his children. His eyes were red and swollen, and his face pale from excitement and agitation.

"'Well,' I inquired, 'what success?'

"'Indade, it was a hard struggle, sir,' said he. 'But I've been talking to Mary, an' she says, as it's for the child's good, maybe the heavens above will give us strength to bear it.'

"'Very well, and which of them is it to be?'

"'Faix, and I don't know, sir,' and he ran his eye dubiously over both. 'Here's little Norah—she's the oldest, an' won't need her mother so much; but then—oh, tear an' ages, it's myself that can't tell which I'd rather part with least; to take the first one that comes wid a blessing. There, sir,' and he handed over little Norah. Turning back, he snatched her up in his arms, and gave her one long, hearty father's kiss, saying through his tears:

"'May God be good to him that's good to you.'

"Then, taking his other child by the hand, he walked away, leaving Norah with me.

"I took her down to the cabin, and we thought the matter settled. It must be confessed, to my great indignation, however, in about an hour's time I saw my friend Pat at the window. As soon as he caught my eye, he began making signs for me to come out. I did so, and found that he had the other child in his arms.

"'What's the matter, now?' I asked.

"'Well, sir,' said he, 'I ask your pardon for troubling you about so foolish a thing as a child or two, but we're thinkin' that maybe it'd make no differ—you see, sir, I've been talking to Mary, an' she says she can't part with Norah, because the creature has a look of me; but here's little Biddy, she's purtyer far, and av you please, sir, will you swap?'

"'Certainly, whenever you like,' said I.

"So he snatched up little Norah, as though it was some recovered treasure, and darted away with her, leaving Biddy, who remained with us all night; but lo! the moment we entered the cabin in the morning, there was Pat making his mysterious signs again at the window, and this time he had the youngest, a baby, in his arms

"'What's wrong now?' I inquired.

"'Ay, sir, an' it's myself that's almost ashamed to tell ye. Ye see, I've been talking to Mary, an' she didn't like to part with Norah, because she was a look av me, an' I can't part with Biddy, because she's the model of her mother; but there's little Paudeen, sir. There's a lump of a Christian for you, two years old, and not a day more; he'll never be any trouble to any one; for av he takes after his mother, he'll have the brightest eye, an' av he takes after his father he'll have a fine broad pair of shoulders to push his way through the world. Will you swap again, sir?'

"'With all my heart,' said I; 'it's all the same to me!' and little Paudeen was left with me

"'Ha, ha,' said I to myself, as I looked into his big, laughing eyes, 'on the affair is settled at last.'

"But it wasn't: for ten minutes had scarcely elapsed, when Pat rushed into the cabin without form or ceremony, and snatched up the baby and said

"'It's no use, I've been talking to Mary, an' we can't do it. Look at him, sir; he's the youngest an' the best of the batch. You wouldn't keep him from us. You see, sir, Norah has a look av me, an' Biddy has a look of Mary; but little Paudeen has the mother's eye, an' my nose, an' a little of both of us all over. No, sir; we can bear hard fortune, starvation, and misery, but we can't bear to part with our children, unless it be the will of Heaven to take them from us.'"

THE CROSS is a wondrous plant: here opposites meet—the highest joy and the [illegible] the sweetest peace and all the [illegible]

THE LAUGH OF A CHILD

"I love it, I love it, the laugh of a child;
Now rippling and gentle, now merry and wild;
[illegible]
Like the thrill of a bird at the twilight's soft hush,
Floating up in the breeze like the tones of a bell,
Or the music that dwells in the heart of a shell;
Oh! the laugh of a child, so wild and so free,
Is the merriest sound in the world for me."

PRUDY FISHING.

BY SOPHIE MAY

One morning, after Prudy was quite well, Aunt Madge told her she might go into the garden and get some currants. While she was picking with all her might, and breathing very fast, she saw Horace close by on the other side of the fence, with a pole in his hand

"I thought you were to school!" cried Prudy

"Well, I ain't," said Horace, pulling his hat over his eyes, and looking ashamed. "The teacher don't keep no order, and I won't go to such a school: so there!"

"They don't want me to go," said Prudy, "'cause I should know too much. I can say all my letters now, right down straight, 'thout looking on, either."

"Oh, ho!" cried Horace, trailing his long pole, "you can't say 'em skipping about, and I shouldn't care if I was you. But you ought to know how to fish, Miss. Don't you wish you could drop in your line and catch 'em the way I do?"

"Do they like to have you catch 'em?" said Prudy, dropping her little dipper and going to the fence, "don't it hurt?"

"Hurt! Not as I know of. They needn't bite if they don't want to."

"No," returned Prudy, looking very wise, "I s'pose they want to get out, and that's why they bite. Of course, when fishes stay in the water much it makes 'em drown."

"Oh, my stars," cried Horace, laughing, "you ought to live 'out west,' you're such a cunning little spud. Come, now, here's another fish-pole for you. I'll show you how to catch one, and I bet 'twill be a polywog—you're just big enough."

"But grandma didn't say I might go down to the river. Wait till I go ask her."

"Poh!" said Horace, "no, you needn't; I have to hurry. Grandma ALWAYS likes it when you go with me, Prudy, because you see I'm a boy, and she knows I can take care of you twice as well as Grace and Mary can"

"Oh," cried Prudy, clapping her little hands, "they won't any of 'em know I can fish, and how they'll laugh. But there, now, they don't let me climb the fence—I forgot"

"Well, give us your bonnet, and then you scooch' down, and I'll pull you through."

"There," said the naughty boy, when they had got down to the river. "Now, I've been and put a bait on the end of your hook, and I plump it in the water—so. You just hold on to the pole."

"But it jiggles, it tips me!" cried Prudy, and as she spoke she fell face downwards on the bank.

"Well, that's smart," said Horace, picking her up. "There, you sit down next time, and I'll prop up the pole with a rock—this way. There, now, you hold it a little easy, and when you feel a nibble, you let me know."

"What's a nibble?" asked Prudy, shaking the line.

"A nibble? Why, it's a bite."

They sat quite still for some minutes, the hot sun glaring on Prudy's bare head, with its rings of soft golden hair

"Now, now!" cried she suddenly, "I've got a nibble!"

Horace sprang to draw up her line.

"I feel it right here on my neck," said the child, "I s'pose it's a fly"

"Now, look here," said Horace, rather vexed, "you're a little too bad. You made me drop my line just when I was going to have a nibble! Wait till you feel the string wiggle, and then speak, but don't holler."

The children sat still for a few minutes longer, and no sound was heard but now and then a wagon going over the bridge. But they might as well have dropped their lines in the sand, for all the fish they caught. Horace began to wish he had gone to school

"Oh, dear!" groaned Prudy, getting tired, "I never did see such fishes! I guess they don't want to be catched"

"There, now you've spoke again! and scared one away!" said Horace. "If it hadn't been for you I should have got I don't know how many by this time."

Prudy's lips began to tremble, and two big round tears rose to her eyes.

"Pob! crying about that!" said Horace, "you're a nice little girl if you do talk too much, so don't you cry."

Horace rather enjoyed seeing Grace and Susy in tears, but could never bear to have Prudy cry.

"I'll tell you what it is," said Horace, when Prudy's eyes were clear again, "I don't think I make much playing 'bookey.'"

"I don't like playing 'bookey' neither," returned Prudy, "'cause the books won't catch em"

"Oh, you don't know what I mean," laughed Horace. "When we boys 'out west' stay out of school, we call that playing hookey."

"Oh, do you? But I want to go home now, if we can't catch any nibbles."

"No, I'll tell you what we'll do—we'll walk out on that log and try it there."

The river was quite high, and this was one of the logs that had drifted down from the "Rips." Prudy was really afraid to walk on it, because it was "so round," but not liking to be laughed at, she crept on her hands and knees to the very end of the log, trembling all the way

Horace took the two poles and followed; but the moment he stepped on the log it rolled quite over, carrying Prudy under.

I do not know what Horace thought then, but he had to think fast. If he had been older he might have plunged in after Prudy, but he was only a little boy, seven years old, so he ran for the house. Oh, how he ran!

Aunt Madge was ironing in the back kitchen. She heard heavy breathing, and the quick pattering of feet, and the words gasped out, "Prudy's in the river"

"Prudy!" screamed Aunt Madge, looking wildly at the boy's face, which was as white as death

"Run, tell your father!" cried she, and flew down the steps, and out across the field toward the river, as if she had wings on her slippers, though it seemed to her they were clogged with lead.

"Has she just been saved from death only to be drowned?" was one of the quick thoughts that rushed across Aunt Madge's dizzy brain. "I shall be too late! too late! And her mother gone! God forgive me! It is I who should have watched her"

Poor Aunt Madge! As if any one was to blame, but Horace!

There was a child crying down by the river.

"Not Prudy," thought Aunt Madge. "It sounds like her voice, but it can't be! She has [illegible]

[illegible] Prudy [illegible] Henry, who was just behind Aunt Madge, "we are ruined"

The cry came up louder: it was Prudy's voice Prudy [illegible] the [illegible] and ran down the bank. The child was out of the water, struggling to climb the bank, but slipping back at every step. She was dripping wet, and covered with sand. Uncle Henry lifted her in his arms, and there she lay, sobbing as if her heart would break, but not speaking a word

When she was lying, clean and warm, in soft blankets, and had had a nap, she told them how she got out

"The log kept jiggling," said she, "and I thought I couldn't hold on, but I did. I thought my father would say I was a [illegible] to get drowned and let the fishes eat me up, and so I kept holdin' on"

"Only think," said grandma, shuddering, and looking at Horace, "if Prudy hadn't held on!"

[illegible] very sad and [illegible]

"It makes you [illegible] don't it. [illegible] on feel [illegible]

At these first words little Prudy had spoken to him since she fell into the water, the boy ran out of the room, and hid in the green chamber, for he never would let any one see him cry.

"Oh, won't you have some tea?" said Prudy, looking up into her uncle's stern face, "he feels so bad, and he didn't catch a fish, and he didn't mean to, and—it was the log that jiggled"

So Horace was forgiven for Prudy's sake.

PHYSICAL TRAINING FOR GIRLS

This is the most momentous health problem with which we have to deal, to secure the proper physical advantages of civilization for American women. Without this there can be no lasting progress. The Sandwich Island proverb says;

"If strong be the frame of the mother,
Her sons shall make laws for the people"

But, in this country, it is scarcely an exaggeration to say that every man grown to maturity, surrounded by a circle of invalid female relatives, and the latter finds himself the husband of an invalid wife and the parent of invalid daughters, and that he comes at last to regard invalidism, as Michelet coolly declares, the normal condition of that sex—as if the Almighty did not know how to create woman. This of course spreads a gloom over life. When I look at the morning throng of school girls in summer, hurrying through every street, with fresh young faces, and vestures of lilies, duly curled, and straw-hatted and booted, and turned off as patterns of perfection by proud mammas—is it not sad to me to think that all this young beauty must one day fade and die? for there are spheres of life beyond this earth, I know, and the soul is good to endure through more than one: the sadness is in the unnatural nearness of the decay, to forcese the living death of disease that is waiting close at hand for as many, to know how terrible a proportion of these fair children are, unconsciously, into a weary, wretched, powerless, joyless, useless maturity. Among the myriad triumphs of advancing civilization, there seems but one formidable danger, and that is here.

It cannot be doubted, however, that the peril will pass by, with advancing knowledge. In proportion to our national recklessness of danger, is the danger with which remedial measures are adopted, when at last they become unimpeachable In the meantime, we must look for proofs of the physical resources of women in foreign and even in savage lands. When an American mother tells me with pride, as occasionally happens, that her daughter can walk two miles and back without great fatigue, the very boast seems a tragedy; but when one reads that Oberea, Queen of the Sandwich Islands, lifted Captain Wallis over a marsh as easily as if he had been a little child, there is a slight sense of consolation. Brunhilde, in the "Nibelungen," binds her offending lover with her girdle and slings him up to the wall. Cymborga, wife of Duke Ernest of Lithdania, could crack nuts between her fingers and drive nails into the wall with her thumb: whether she ever got her husband under it is not recorded. Let me preserve from oblivion the renown of my Lady Butterfield, who, about the year 1700, in Wonstead, in Essex, (England,) thus advertised:

"This is to give notice to my honored masters and ladies and loving friends, that my Lady Butterfield gives a challenge to ride a horse, or leap a horse, or run a foot, or hollo with any woman in England seven years younger, but not a day older, because I won't undervalue myself, being now seventy-four years of age."

Nor should be left unrecorded the high-born Scottish damsel, whose tradition still remains at the castle of Hunting tower, in Scotland, where two adjacent pinnacles still mark the Maiden's Leap. She sprang from battlement to battlement, a distance some nine feet and four inches, and eloped with her lover. Were a young lady to go through one of our villages in a series of leaps like that, and were she to require her lovers to follow in her footsteps, it is to be feared that she would die single.—Atlantic Monthly

LOST HIS BOOTS AND HIS TEMPER

The difference between 7 and 8 is not very great, only a single unit. And yet that difference has power over a man's whole temper, convenience and dignity. Thus, at Buffalo my boots were set out to be blacked. In the morning no boots were there, though all the neighboring rooms had been served. I rang, I rang twice. "A pretty hotel—nearly eight o'clock, going out at nine, breakfast to be eaten, and no boots yet." The waiter came, took my somewhat emphatic order, and left. Every minute was an hour. It always is when you are out of temper. A man in his stocking feet, in a third story of a hotel, finds himself restricted in locomotion. I went to the door, looked up and down the hall, saw frowsy chambermaids; saw afar off the master of the coal scuttle; saw gentlemen walking in bright boots, unconscious of the privileges they enjoyed, but did not see any one coming with my boots. A German servant at length came, round and ruby-faced, very kind and good-natured, honest and stupid

He informed me that a gentleman had already taken boots No. 78 (my number.) He would hunt him up; thought he was at breakfast. Here was a new vexation. Who was the man who had taken my number and gone for my boots? Somebody had them on, warm and nice, and was enjoying his coffee, while I walked up and down, with less and less patience, who had none too much at first. No servant returned I rang again, and sent energetic and staccato messengers to the office. Some water had been spilled on the floor. I stepped into it, of course. In winter, cold water feels as if it burned you. Unpacked my valise for new stockings. Time was speeding. It was quarter past eight; train at nine; no breakfast. I slipped on a pair of sandal-rubbers, too large by inches for my naked foot, and, while I shuffled along the hall, they played up and down on my feet. First, one shot off; that secured, the other dropped on the stairs; people that I met looked as if they thought that I was not well over last night's spree.

It was very annoying Reached the office, and expressed my mind. First, the clerk rang the bell three times furiously, then ran forth himself—met the German boots, who had boots 79 in his hand, narrow and long, thinking, perhaps, I could wear them. When boots No. 77 had my boots. Some curiosity was beginning to be felt among the bystanders. It was likely that I should have half the hotel inquiring after my boots. I abhor a scene. Retreated to my room. On the way, thought I, I would look at room 77 a boots. Behold, they were mine! There was the broken pull-straps, the patch on the right side, and the very shape of my [illegible] Hot foot had marked 77 and not 78. And all this hour's tumult arose from just the difference between 7 and 8.

I lost my boots, lost the train, lost my temper, and, of course, lost my good manners. Everybody does that loses temper. But boots on, breakfast served, a cup of coffee brought peace and good will. The whole matter took a ludicrous aspect. I meditated upon that ordinarily the [illegible] peace at the mercy of a Dutchman's chalk. Had he written seventy-eight, I had been a good-natured man, looking at Niagara Falls in its winter dress. He wrote seventy-seven, and I fumed, saw only my own folly, and spent the day in Buffalo!

Are not most of the pets and rubs of life such as this? How men could afford, to-morrow, to [illegible] the things that [illegible] Wo boast of being free, yet every man permits the most arrant trifles to rule and rule him. A man that is vexed and angry turns the worst part of himself into a sight, and exhibits himself in [illegible] to be jeered! And yet one's temper does worse by him than that And men submit to it, not once, but often, and sometimes every day! I wonder whether these rage reflections will make no patient [illegible]

THE KITCHEN

I hope I shall not be considered as slurring, [illegible] factual taste of the world when I say that I believe the Kitchen is the department in which a woman's excellence is most appreciated and commended. Your kitchen should be as near your dining-room as possible, and also to the room you habitually occupy as a sitting-room; to the last, because while training young servants in your ways, you can, through an open door, direct them without neglecting your own pursuits. A little hall between your sitting or family room and the kitchen, with doors opposite, all we the same convenience and obviates the objections to direct communication occasioned by heat and odors.

The cistern, or some supply of water, should be convenient to your kitchen, also an abundant supply of good wood ready for use, under shelter; and the cellar for winter vegetables cannot be more favorably situated than under the kitchen

If your kitchen is to be used for a cooking-room only, as is certainly best, it need not be very large A pantry, or store-room, should communicate with it. There should be two closets in a kitchen; one in which vessels and supplies not constantly wanted should be kept, the other, in which daily stores and vessels constantly used can be kept. We object to open shelves, however pictorial the bright tin and well-scrubbed trays look; flies and dust are no respecters of housewives, however notable. The room should be well lighted, but have shutters to darken with, when not used. In Western kitchens, where hard usage is the habit, a close ceiled plank wall is preferable, on account of durability and cleanliness, to plastering. This should be painted some plain, suitable color, also the outside of all the vessels. The shelves of the pantry and closets, as well as the kitchen floor, should be oiled This can be cheaply done

Have your hot-plate or stove of the best pattern, and kept in good order, and a sufficient number of first-rate cooking utensils. Be sure your kitchen is really comfortable; it is not in human nature to work cheerfully and well when shivering with cold, or sweltering in heat, or groping in twilight.

After every meal, see that your kitchen is put in perfect order. Make all your arrangements for dinner as soon as your kitchen is cleaned in the morning; in your afternoon visit, direct your supper and breakfast. If possible, have a cook whose honesty, neatness, and skill can be depended on, and teach her to depend on herself. Teach her every branch of her own business. The housewife who has to go out and help about every dish, especially while the friends she has invited but for a day have to sit alone, is, to say the least of it, to be pitied. There is no more merit in your making your cakes and preserves than there would be in making your bread and coffee for every breakfast. Nor is there any excuse for your not being able to do all of these things, and to do them cheerfully when necessary, i. e., after you have had time to learn them, if your model mother forgot to teach you.

Remember not to follow my example in these intruding kitchens into good company. The results of your kitchen labors, if good, will be highly appreciated—and any shortcomings will as soon be forgiven you as a bad dinner. Still, the details of your achievements are seldom relished. Do not reduce your husband's magnificent air-castles to ashes with your kitchen fires—do not dim the perspective of your young friends in the parlor with smoke from the kitchen; you may feel martyred—they will feel bored.—HETTIE HAYFIELD, in Valley Farmer.

WORSHIP CONFINED TO NO PLACE.

Jesus, where'er thy people meet,
There they behold thy mercy seat;
Where'er they seek thee, thou art found,
And every place is hallow'd ground.

For thee, within no walls confin'd,
Inhabitest the humblest mind;
Such ever bring thee where they come,
And going take thee to their home.

Dear Shepherd of thy chosen few,
Thy former mercies here renew;
Here to our waiting hearts proclaim
The sweetness of thy saving name.

Here we may prove the power of prayer,
To strengthen faith and sweeten care;
To teach our faint desires to rise,
And bring all heaven before our eyes.

Lord, we are few, but thou art near,
Nor short thine arm, nor deaf thine ear;
Oh! rend the heavens, come quickly down,
And make a thousand hearts thine own.

PRAYER AN INWARD WORK.

Prayer is the soul's sincere desire,
Utter'd or unexpressed,
The motion of a hidden fire,
That trembles in the breast.

Prayer is the burden of a sigh,
The falling of a tear,
The upward glancing of an eye,
When none but God is near.

Prayer is the simplest form of speech,
That infant lips can try;
Prayer, the sublimest strains that reach
The Majesty on high.

Prayer is the Christian's vital breath,
The Christian's native air,
His watch-word at the hour of death,
He enters heaven with prayer.

Prayer is the contrite sinner's voice,
Returning from his ways,
While angels in their song rejoice,
And say, "Behold, he prays!"

In prayer, on earth, the saints are one,
In word, in deed, in mind,
When with the Father and the Son
Sweet fellowship they find.

Nor prayer is made on earth alone:
The Holy Spirit pleads,
And Jesus, on the eternal throne,
For sinners intercedes!

Oh thou! by whom we come to God,
The Life, the Truth, the Way!
The path of prayer thyself hast trod;
Lord, teach us how to pray!

RELIGIOUS CONSOLATION.

Oh, blest religion, heavenly fair,
Thy kind, thy healing power
Can sweeten pain, alleviate care,
And gild each gloomy hour.

When dismal thoughts and boding fears
The trembling heart invade,
And all the face of nature wears
A universal shade;

Thy sacred dictates can assuage
The tempest of my soul;
The fiercest storm shall lose its rage
At thy divine control.

Through life's bewilder'd, darksome way
Thy hand unerring leads,
And o'er the path thy heavenly ray
A cheering lustre sheds.

When feeble reason, tir'd and blind,
Sinks helpless and afraid,
Thou, blest supporter of the mind,
How powerful is thine aid!

Oh! then let my heart confess thy power,
And find thy sweet relief,
To brighten every gloomy hour,
To soften every grief.

THE SERMON OF REV. JAMES LYNCH, OF BALTIMORE.

We do not approve of following up the plan of publishing sermons regularly, without a special request from parties; but there are some two reasons, or more, why we give place to it this week again: first, it is the time when our Annual Conferences are being held, the Editor has to be from home attending said Conferences, and the brethren from their circuits and stations, know not where their fields of labor, for the Lord, are to be the coming year, and are therefore unprepared for writing much, and even when they are changed, they do not always feel prepared to write. The second reason is, Brother Lynch is a young man, and proves that he is not ashamed to labor to improve his mind, as there is a great field even among our people, and is still spreading; he does not simply confine himself to one isolated thing, but strives to do what I love to see every Gospel minister do—launch out, brother, launch out in the deep. Now, will Brother Lynch show himself not only a friend in words, but a friend indeed, to the Christian Recorder, by sending us one hundred cash subscribers from Baltimore, either for one year or six months? We shall look with much interest this year. Ed.

SERMON II.

Preached by James Lynch, at Waters' Chapel, Baltimore, May 25th, 1862.

"Jesus saith unto him, Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed; blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed."—John xx. 29.

Unfortunate indeed is the man who declares that nothing shall convince him but the evidence of his own senses. The spirit that would prompt such a declaration, is the spirit of the devil that would disrobe man of the moral grandeur with which the religion of Christ invests him; yea, that would force him to disregard the immortality of his spiritual existence, and sink to the level of the brute in life, and below it in death. This act of Thomas mars the force of his apostolic character, and, however bright his life may shine, this act—disgraceful—is only rendered more conspicuous, and it comes down to us, in the sacred volume, as a living warning to us, to steer away from those shoals and quicksands of speculation in regard to Divine truths, lest we get aground, stick fast, and present to the world the sorry spectacle of a beautiful ship bound for a distant land, with the most precious freight, with her keel imbedded in the mud, unable to move.

II. The relation of finite beings to the Infinite Being—the Lord our God—makes faith necessary to the well-being of man. We behold, on the one hand, finite beings entering upon the trackless "ocean main of life," to make a brief voyage and then drift into eternity, ignorant of themselves as to the future, without wisdom to unfold the true character of God and their own obligations, while upon such knowledge depends the happiness or misery of a soul that shall live throughout the countless ages of eternity. The truths contained in Divine revelation, alone give this wisdom, this knowledge; and these truths telling of things past, things present, things to come, seen by some, and never seen by others—and sometimes never seen by any—make a demand upon our faith, and admit not of speculation. The man born blind, knows the sun shines because he believes his friends when they tell him; by no course of reasoning could he of himself settle down upon the conclusion that the sun arose and set, producing day and night; and though he might feel its genial warmth at times; though its sultry heat might tell of some agency, if he were left to muse alone from infancy to mature age, his mind would be filled with a thousand fancies, such as probable as the other. The Divine government creates an existence of causes which produce great and good effects. It also controls all other causes, which are evil in themselves, that their effects may not counteract the purposes of the eternal One.

III. The power of faith. Let us look at faith in a temporal sense. Look at the statesmen of either continent, and pick out those who have done most for the alleviation of the distresses of suffering humanity—who have defied the vengeance of corrupt majorities, arose above partisan feeling and sordid selfishness, and you will find that those names which history has placed upon the catalogue of reformers and philanthropists, were men of great faith—men who believed in the existence and final success of the great principles of right, and believed that they must be victorious because the cause was invincible—because the principle burned with celestial heat that no earthly power could quench. The man that has no faith in fundamental principles, is as he who sails his craft without chart, compass, or knowledge of navigation; he may be naturally brave and intrepid, but he keeps near shore, makes short voyages, hugs the land, because he sails by sight—by land marks; as a bold mariner, he who can only navigate by sight, can never be; when the storm comes, instead of heading for the great deep, he hugs the shore, and is lifted up by the mighty breakers and dashed in pieces upon the sandy beach or flinty rock. Men filling the place of legislators, who have little or no faith in fundamental principles, sail by sight; precedents, expedients, artifice, are what they make use of, and when the storm-cloud of war gathers o'er their land—when perilous times overtake us—when great civil problems are to be solved—when momentous issues are to be met, how far short are they of competency to the tasks? They are as ciphers standing alone; they count naught. It is your man of faith in fundamental principles, that has a chart, a compass,—that can ride out upon the stormy sea of trouble, guiding, in safety, the craft through precedents, expedients, artifice, like the land-marks and light-houses on the coast fail him. It is he, having faith in fundamental principles, that is "the man for the hour." From earth he can turn his gaze to the sky—from the headlands of the shore to the heads of constellations—from the dim lights of oily lamps on light-houses, to the bright, twinkling light of starry splendor. There is nothing in this world that contributes so much to make the difference between men, as the difference in the degree and character of their faith. It is faith that gives us Christian Samsons; it is faith that gives us intellectual giants and moral heroes. It is want of faith that gives poor, feeble Christians, with hands too weak to unite an insect, and knees too feeble to stand erect; it is want of faith that leaves us with intellectual pigmies and moral cowards.

It is a principle that, if a man is industrious and economical, and God blesses him with health and strength, and preserves him from accident, that he will generally place himself in comfortable circumstances, and sometimes acquire great riches. A young man, entering upon the world with an abiding faith in this great principle, goes forth nerved for the struggle—deterred by no danger—daunted by no difficulties, because he believes in this principle; he regards success as the inevitable effect of the cause which he has set at work in his own case, and he feels that nothing can retard his course but some unforeseen dispensation of Providence.

It is a principle that he who dares to do the right must eventually be honored by his fellowmen; though scorned by a contemporary generation, he will be adored by a succeeding one. Let a man have an abiding faith in this principle, and he is just such a man as Luther, Cromwell, Patrick Henry and Lafayette were—no menace or threat can drive from duty, no clouds of indignation dishearten or weaken, no breath of popular odium can stagger him or make him falter; his faith in the great principle of right enlarges his capacity, extends his vision far beyond the clouds of opposition that hang the moral sky in mourning, and upon the sublime heights of the fundamental principle of right where faith has carried him he gazes upon these clouds beneath his feet, belching forth the angry tones of thunder, or darting the fierce destructive lightning's flash—but, resting upon the pinnacle of his faith, he gazes upon a clear sky; he feels the cool, refreshing purity of a high atmosphere, and, the storm are long subsiding, the clouds vanishing, and the rainbow painting its gaudy streak in the eastern heavens, he is seen by a wondering world in a region of moral glory, coveted by all, but merited and won by him, and only him, that was borne upwards by a living faith in the great fundamental principle of right, and dared defend it.

Who are your Generals that lead victoriously their hosts to battles? Is it those who have no faith in their cause or its inspiring power upon the hearts of their soldiers? Not it is those who believe, "Thrice armed is he whose cause is just." And who are those whose single dash of daring individual valor turns the tide of battle and causes victory to perch upon the standard? It is your man who not only has faith to believe "He must conquer," but he has faith to believe "I must conquer."

Going through this world in every way, by nature of a beautiful ship bound for a distant land, with the most precious freight, with her keel imbedded in the mud, unable to move.

II. The relation of finite beings to the Infinite Being—the Lord our God—makes faith necessary to the well-being of man. Going through this world in every way, by nature and by grace, we are commanded to be men of faith. Nature demands it, and grace demands it. Without faith it is impossible to please God. Without faith it is impossible to be saved. Without faith it is impossible to be a Christian. Without faith it is impossible to be a Christian minister. NOTICE

All itinerant ministers having charge of circuits and stations, of the A. M. E. Church, are agents for the Christian Recorder, and we hope that each one will at once lay the claims of our paper before their respective congregations, as it will be seen now who it is that works for the Church, and the literary department of the same, as all obstacles are removed by the General Committee, who have decreed what shall be. We all feel better, and can now work together in union, for the glory of God.

☞ All articles for the Christian Recorder should be in the editor's hands on the Monday previous to the day of issuing the paper, in order to insure their insertion in that week's issue.

RESCINDED.

We omitted, last week, to say that the Philadelphia Conference rescinded the action in the case of Rev. John R. V. Morgan, and made him a member of conference.

We shall be absent from the city for two or three weeks, and we have procured the services of Rev. A. L. Stanford, pastor of Wesley Church, during our absence.

BORDENTOWN QUARTERLY MEETINGS.

At Bordentown, on the 14th and 15th of June; at Allentown, on the 21st and 22d of June; at Cookstown, on the 28th and 29th of June; at Cranberry, on the 5th and 6th of July; at Freehold, on the 12th of July. Brother Wieder's Quarterly Meeting Conference, at 3 o'clock, P M.

REV. JEREMIAH YOUNG.

NOTICE.

Rev. Henry Davis, pastor of the A. M. E. Union Church, is now boarding at No 811 Wood Street, Philadelphia.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

Rev. H. M. Turner, Washington, D. C., $7 00

We endorse Brother Lynch's acknowledgment in his letter.

LAID IN THE SHADE.

The Philadelphia Conference has laid the Baltimore Conference in the shade in relation to the two-cent money. Why is this, brethren? Baltimore gave $33.19, and Philadelphia nearly $52 It may be because the Recorder is circulated more largely in the Philadelphia District by two-thirds than in the Baltimore District. Well, let it not be the case this year. Brothers Lynch and Turner have already commenced to enlarge our list.

YOUTH'S EVANGELIST.

☞ Ministers and Superintendents, read this:—

This Sabbath School paper is one of the best published in this country. We have obtained permission, through the kindness of its gentlemanly and Christian Editor and Proprietor, J. M. FERGUSON, to appropriate the interesting matter and very beautiful engravings contained therein to the farther adornment of our own columns. By this arrangement we are enabled to give to our little folks such a style of reading as is best calculated and adapted to their years, capacity, and childish fancy, and, at the same time please those of more mature years. Now, we propose to furnish our schools with the Christian Recorder, with these new features additional to its usual store of good things, and bear all expenses incurred by express, at the rate of $8 00 per hundred; and where any school will take four hundred copies, $10.00. It is published twice per month. The money to be invariably forwarded in advance, thereby enabling us to go on. Will not the ministers, superintendents, and teachers set about this work without farther delay or persuasion?

OBITUARY.

Another great and good man has fallen. The Rev. WILLIAM DOUGLASS, of the city of Philadelphia, of long standing, and who was the minister of St. Thomas' Episcopal Church for twenty-eight years, departed this life on Friday, the 22d of May, aged 58 years and some months

He was conveyed from his late residence in Powell Street. At 1 o'clock, P. M., the funeral procession moved to Sixth street, and up Sixth to Walnut street, thence to Fifth street, down to the church. The crowd was densely large, led by Bishops Potter and Stevens, with some twenty-five or thirty ministers, white and colored, and all took seats—some in the pulpit and altar, and the rest of us around and in front of the altar. The services were conducted by Revs. Richard Hall, and Bishop Potter, Rev. Thomas A. Allen, Rev A Crummel, of Liberia, and Rev. William Alston, of New York, in a most impressive manner His remains were then deposited to the mother dust, or, rather, the vault attached to St Thomas' Church.

Mr. Douglass was born in Baltimore, Maryland. Here he was converted, and received his principal education, and became a Methodist preacher. Two years afterwards he moved to this city, Philadelphia. He continued to be a minister of the Methodist persuasion for some time, and then changed his relationship to the Episcopal Church, believing as he did that he could be more useful to his people, as there was a colored church of that persuasion

Mr. Douglass was a man who was highly respected by all classes, and there was, as far as we know, a fraternal relation existing between him and other brethren not exactly of his persuasion. But he is no more—he has gone to his long and happy home. He leaves behind him to mourn his loss a dear and affectionate wife and nine children, one of whom is married. Mrs. Douglass and his daughters and sons, he cannot come to you, but there is one very happy consolation—you can all go to him. Will you go? May the good Lord assist you so to do.—ED

INDIA.—In the mutiny of 1857, the Rev. David Hunter, a missionary of the Church of Scotland, with his wife and child, were massacred by the Sepoy insurgents at Sealkote. Two missionaries now labor there in his place, and the corner-stone of an edifice, to be called the "Hunter Memorial Church, has just been laid with impressive ceremonies

CONFISCATION

Congress has passed [illegible] That body seems very fearful that they will do a something to [illegible] that white men will have to respect. The South is true to what she claims to be her property; she has slain and is slaying some of the best men the North possesses, and triumphantly exults over it. The North seems to be willing for the South to kill her sons, both young and aged, with perfect immunity—and yet they don't wish to interfere with her Constitutional (?) right of SLAVERY! The conduct of the North would seem to say "You may murder and slay our sons, you may fight your way to our hospitals, take our sick and wounded, bruise, mangle, and cut asunder their bodies, and leave them lifeless—but you shall have your negroes! because to deprive you of them would be interfering with the Constitution." Now we say that whenever Congress and the PEOPLE of the North arrive at the period that shall see them willing that GOD shall rule, and that the negro shall have the full enjoyment of all the rights that God intended he should have, and be allowed to pass and repass like any other human being, and be governed by the same laws as the white race are subject to, both native and foreign element,—then, we say, and not till then, will this most wicked and unnatural rebellion cease. Let every colored man be thrown upon his own responsibility, except such as are not able or capable of taking care of themselves. Let them be bound out or put under an apprenticeship of one, two, five, or seven years. But we would also recommend that the same course be pursued in reference to those of the white class who may chance to be in a similar condition. Again, we claim that nine-tenths of the blacks in the South, if the opportunity was presented to them, could and would take care of themselves. They know how to make their own bread and butter. As regards work, they fully understand that, and the most of them love to work. In a literary point of view, we do not claim so much for them, because they have been deprived of all opportunities of acquiring educational knowledge for a long time past. We assert that there are no better mechanics in this country than those found in the South among colored men. This fact cannot be disputed. Again, there is no class of people more loyal to this Government than the colored people. Why, at the present time, every honest General, Captain, Colonel, &c., will tell us that. Then, in view of these facts, we say that if the Government will do away with ninety-nine out of every hundred of these gray-backs which infest every large city like Philadelphia, it would be a blessing to the country, make better men and women, and tend materially to the preservation of our glorious Union.—ED

CORRESPONDENCE

To all correspondents and contributors to the Christian Recorder: We now notify you to have your matter here in our office either by Saturday or by each Monday of every week or two; and we shall look for representatives from all parts of our connexion, stations and circuits, that each minister and preacher may know how the connexion is prospering, both spiritually and temporally. We shall also look for cash subscribers and contributors from all directions, coming weekly, so that we may be able to continue and publish such matter as is suitable for a religious paper. Again, brethren, by pursuing this course, everybody who reads the paper can see who is really at work for the general welfare of the entire connexion. Since the action of the General Committee, we shall look with a great deal of interest to the working now of the entire District of Ohio from each circuit and station. We believe that you will. So let us hear from all the brethren

The New York and New England Conferences both meet to-day. The New York Conference will be presided over by Bishop Payne, at which Conference we shall spend some three or four days, after which we shall make for the New England Conference, which is presided over by Bishop Nazrey. We hope to have a pleasant time at each of these Conferences, and hope that all the brethren will come forward fully prepared to settle with us.

SABBATH SCHOOL CONVENTION

In connexion with a committee appointed by the Philadelphia Annual Conference on the subject of Sabbath Schools, we recommended the calling of a Sabbath School Convention in the District, to be represented by not more than two from each Sabbath School, and we would say that there should be one male and a female from each point It will be remembered that we have written several articles on the importance of a Sabbath School Convention among us, for we really believe that it will result in much good, if properly attended to. We want all the information that we can procure; and the best method by which we can conduct the Sabbath School to the advancement and to the glory of Almighty God

Another point ought to be urged—and that is, there should be some plan adopted to bring about a oneness in relation to what kind of books there should and shall be used in our Sabbath Schools If our children are first to be indoctrinated in Methodism, then let all our schools use Methodist books, and send in their orders to us—No. 619 Pine Street—and the kind they want, accompanied with the cash, and we will fill said orders Then, having learned Methodism, they can learn any other ism. We would recommend all our other Annual Conferences to take a similar step, recommending the calling of Sabbath School Conventions, for there is a great work to be done; and let all take hold of it. Yes, brethren, we want a general interest for the entire welfare of our beloved Zion. O how we love to see the little ones cared for! The little ones—Jesus says, "Let them come unto me, and forbid them not." We have, more or less, all of our life, been connected with the Sabbath School in some way or other until within the last two years. Since we have been East we have had but very little to do in that direction directly, but indirectly we have been and still are at work; and the minister who has no disposition and no interest for the Sabbath School which is the "nursery of the Church," we think that his call is not approved by the great I Am Oh, "for more of that mind which was in Christ." I remember in 1852, 3 and 4, that our Church in Cincinnati was filled with young ladies and gentlemen who had been raised in the Sabbath School, the most of whom were converts One may imagine how the God-loving and God-fearing minister would feel when addressing them and beholding their friendly countenances while speaking and treating of the Great God and his cause We don't know that we ever visited a more flourishing Sab. School than we did in Allen Chapel, Cincinnati, in 1850, to 61, 2 and 3. In that school, A. Fowler, A. Jackson, A. Ishmer and A. Rhoads So let us have our Sabbath Schools filled with little ones, and the right kind of teachers to overlook them; for if we have the right kind of superintendents, the work of improvement of the young is effectual. May the good Lord bless the work in our hands

WASHINGTON, May 26, 1862.

MR. EDITOR:—Things here are still moving on as usual. The inestimable blessings of freedom are more and more being reduced to such a practical realization to those who have recently obtained it, as to better enable them to appreciate its natural and moral advantages; but that servile subjection, to which many for so long has had to conform, is not yet so dismembered from their long crushed sensitiveness as to grant them the free liberty of looking every man in the face, and regarding it as man viewing man. I had the pleasure of visiting the congressional chamber, while the confiscation bill was under discussion, and many able and eloquent speeches were delivered pro and con, but one very singular feature I noticed in its discussional progress, that there were invariably larger audiences in attendance to hear those favorable to confiscation, than to those opposed. The agitation of the law, which has been resurrected in permitting pro-slavery hunters to obtain their servants, has for the last few days somewhat subsided. Nearly all the slaves who were in danger in the district, have been sent under a guard of soldiers into Virginia, where it seems they are better protected

Dr Rock, the eminent lawyer of Boston, who was invited here by certain friends of humanity, lectured in the Presbyterian church 15th Street, on Thursday evening, 22d inst. Every one who heard the Doctor, pronounced it a great success; both from the fact that the lecture was eloquent, terse, and able, and from the fact that a man of his anti-slavery stamp, should be permitted to raise his voice in Washington City. The papers of the city spoke of it as being all that could have fallen from the lips of Sumner, or any other man of similar principles. He lectures this evening at my (Israel) church. We expect a great treat

Rev. Samuel W. Chase, of Baltimore, delivered one of the most able lectures of the season in our (Israel) church, on Monday evening, the 19th inst. Subject, God's dealings with the children of Ham, and their future prospects. It would be impossible for me to give you anything like a description of this able lecture. Suffice it to say, he was almost incessantly interrupted with applause, and loud clapping of hands from all classes of his audience. If Mr Chase should lecture here again it will be difficult to find a hall large enough for his hearers. The Evening Star, one of our city papers, and pro-slavery to the back bone, was compelled to squeeze out so much of an acknowledgment of his ability as the following:

LECTURE BY REV. SAMUEL CHASE.

"God's dealings with the children of Ham, and their future prospects," was the topic of a lecture delivered last night in the Israel (colored) church, by Rev. Samuel Chase, a colored divine of Baltimore. The speaker went back to the earliest ages, quoted largely from Bible history, and maintained that God made of one flesh all the nations of the earth. But nations, for crimes committed, have been degraded, and fallen from the high estate wherein the Creator had placed them; as in the case of the Jews, who were despised until a few years ago. The speaker argued that it was the providence of God that brought the negro here, and the colored race has been benefited thereby. The colored race here have been educated like the American family, have imbibed their political principles, but do not dare to utter them; have imbibed the same religious principles, and them they dare utter; and if the religion of the black man is wild enthusiasm, then so is that of those who taught him

The speaker argued that the negro had the same natural faculties as the whites, and quoted examples to show that the pure, unadulterated African may become educated and respected. The black man, beyond doubt, has the same natural qualities from Mason's to Dixon's line, and from that to Sabine

He argued that the Legislature of Maryland believed in the equality of natural intelligences, or they never would have desired to get the blacks out of the country by spending $10,000 a year for colonization.

We must elevate the negro character, and that must be done by education. The pulpit is the highest position we can attain, and we must blame our white brethren for not having a more educated ministry The Methodist Episcopal Church (white) had been particularly backward in extending education to the colored. They told us that if the Lord called us to preach, he would put words in our mouths, and we were told to look only to Heaven and get knowledge, while the white preachers were looking all the time in the book The speaker did not "see the point" that an uneducated negro could draw inspiration direct from Heaven, while educated white men got it from the books.

Mr. Chase urged the necessity of an educated ministry for the colored people. "I am," said he, "a black man, and I want to see the blacks educated. I love all men, but I love the black man best, and will advance his interests first and all the time If any colored man was to declare that the sooner he makes peace with God and dies, the better for him and his people" The negro could and would rise, if properly educated, and they had as much right to do so as the whites. The speaker said it would cheer his heart as much as that of the white man to see his son pleading at the bar, or his daughter taking a seat to play on the forty piano

In conclusion, his audience were urged to liberally educate and sustain their ministers, as the surest mode of bringing the colored nation to a position of equality with the whites

A RECOMMENDATION

TO THE DISTRICTS OF PHILADELPHIA, NEW ENGLAND, OHIO, INDIANA, AND MISSOURI, OF THE A. M. E. CHURCH MINISTERS

Dear Brethren:—As we have a number of Superannuated ministers on the list in said Districts, therefore it will be expected that the ministers and preachers, on their circuits and stations, will do all they can to collect the [illegible] and we also recommend that the Class leaders be instructed to collect and set the amount on the Class book opposite each member's name, as also all the collections called, per Discipline, for the Annual Conference, and publish the same once every quarter, that it may be seen who they are that work for God and his cause. We think it is time to give credit to those of our people who do work and that God's name may be glorified

WILLIS NAZRY,
WILLIAM P. QUINN

WEATHER IN WAR.

It is not very flattering to that glory loving, battle-seeking creature, Man, that his best-arranged schemes for the destruction of his fellows should often be made to fail by the conditions of the weather. More or less have the greatest generals been "servile to all the skyey influences." Upon the state of the atmosphere frequently depends the ability of men to fight, and military hopes rise and fall with the rising and falling of the metal in the thermometer tube. Mercury governs Mars. A hero is stripped of his plumes by a tempest, and his laurels fly away on the invisible wings of the wind, and are seen no more forever. Empires fall because of a heavy fall of snow. Storms of rain have more than once caused monarchs to cease to reign. A hard frost, a sudden thaw, a "hot spell," a "cold snap," a contrary wind, a long drought, a storm of sand,—all these things have had their part in deciding the destinies of dynasties, the fortunes of races, and the fate of nations. Leave the weather out of history, and it is as if night were left out of the day, and winter out of the year. Americans have fretted a little because their "Grand Army" could not advance through mud that came up to the horses' shoulders, and in which even the seven-leagues boots would have stuck, though they had been worn as deftly as Ariel could have worn them They talked as if no such thing had ever before been known to stay the march of armies; whereas all military operations have, to a greater or lesser extent, depended for their issue upon the softening or hardening of the earth, or upon the clearing or clouding of the sky. The elements have fought against this or that conqueror, or would-be conqueror, as the stars in their courses fought against Sisera; and the Kishon is not the only river that has through its rise put an end to the hopes of a tyrant. The condition of rivers, which must be owing to the condition of the weather, has often colored events for ages, perhaps forever The melting of the snows of the Pyrenees, causing a great rise in the rivers of Northern Spain, came nigh bringing ruin upon Julius Cæsar himself; and nothing but the feeble character of the opposing general saved him from destruction

At Agincourt the circumstances were very different [from Crecy,] but quite as fatal to the French. That battle was fought on the 25th of October, 1115, and the French should have won it according to all the rules of war,—but they did not win it, because they had too much valor and too little sense. A cautious coward makes a better soldier than a valiant fool, and the boiling bravery of the French has lost them more battles than any other people have lost through timidity. Henry V's invasion of France was the most wicked attack that ever was made even by England on a neighboring nation, and it was meeting with its proper reward, when French folly ruined everything. The French overtook the English on the 24th of October, and by judicious action might have destroyed them, for they were by far the more numerous—though most English authorities, with characteristic "unreverity," grossly exaggerated the inequality of numbers that really did exist between the two armies. On the night of the 24th the rain fell heavily, making the ground quite unfit for the operations of heavy cavalry, in which the strength of the French consisted, while the English had their incomparable archers, the worthy predecessors of the English infantry of today, one of whom was calculated to do more efficient service than could have been expected, as the circumstances of the field were, from ten knights cumbered with bulky mail. Sir Harris Nicolas, the most candid English historian of the battle, and who prepared a very useful, but unreadable volume concerning it, after speaking of the bad arrangements adopted by the French, proceeds to say,—"The inconveniences under which the French labored were much increased by the state of the ground, which was not only soft from heavy rains, but was broken up by their horses during the preceding night, the weather having obliged the valets and pages to keep them in motion. Thus the statement of the French historian may readily be credited, that, from the ponderous armor with which the men-at-arms were enveloped, and the softness of the ground, it was with the utmost difficulty they could either move or lift their weapons, notwithstanding their lances had been shortened to enable them to fight closely,—that the horses at every step sank so deeply into the mud, that it required great exertion to extricate them,—and that the narrowness of the place caused their archers to be so crowded as to prevent them from drawing their bows." Michelet's description of the day is the best that can be read, and he tells us, that, when the signal of battle was given by Sir Thomas Erpingham, the English shouted, but "the French army, to their astonishment, remained motionless. Horses and knights appeared to be enchanted, or struck dead in their armor. The fact was, that their large battle-steeds, weighed down with their heavy riders and lumbering caparisons of iron, had all four feet completely sunk in the deep wet clay; they were fixed there, and could only struggle out to crawl on a few steps at a walk." Upon this mass of chivalry, all stuck in the mud, the cloth-yard shafts of the English yeomen fell like hailstones upon the summer corn Some few of the French made mad efforts to charge, but were annihilated before they could reach the English line The English advanced upon the "mountain of men and horses mixed together," and butchered their immovable enemies at their leisure. Plebeian hands that day poured out patrician blood in torrents. The French fell into a panic, and those of their number who could run away did so. It was the story of Poitiers over again, in one respect; for the Black Prince owed his victory to a panic that befell a body of sixteen thousand French, who scattered and fled without having struck a blow. Agincourt was fought on St Crispin's day, and a precious strapping the French got. The English found that there was "nothing like weather." It was the last battle in which the ordinance was displayed, and well it might be; for red as it was, it must have blushed a deeper red over the folly of the French commanders Atlantic Monthly.

GERMANS IN PENNSYLVANIA.

One would think the German character might be understood by this time. And yet it is very plain that it is not; for when it is attempted either to eulogize or censure, men frequently shoot wide of the mark The German character, to be understood, must be studied in the structure of its language; in its literature, as developed in its original seats; in its manifestations in Europe, among crowned kings, skilful diplomatists, profound scholars, eminent statesmen, imaginative authors It must be studied in Luther's Bible, in Gesenius' Lexicon, in Schiller's Wallenstein, in Herder, in Goethe, in Tholuck, in Koerner, in Arndt and Spencer, in Kant and Schelling. It must be studied in the libraries at Berlin and Halle in the nineteen picture galleries of Vienna, in the sculpture halls of Munich, along the "emperor-crossing Rhine and upon the ruined and ivy-grown battlements of the castle of Heidelberg You must go to the printing-room of Gutenberg; to the cell where Luther prayed to God; to the studies of Dornbirer, Lessing, Fichte, Overbeck; to the common schools of Prussia and Saxony And now these are the same people that dig out the limestone from our hills, and rear those immense "Temples of Ceres"—that cover our valleys, and bring from the bosom of the earth its exuberant fertility; the same people—bone of their bone and flesh of their flesh, the same untiring perseverance; the same steadfast devoting to an object; the same household quietness that breathes from every page of German song, and softens your heart strings before you know it; the same love of music and flowers; the same language; the same religion; the same attachment to order, the same [illegible] the same love of abstract thought which is here shown in [illegible] and there in philosophy, the same [illegible] here seen in phantasies of the spirit land and spuckereri, and strange fancies, at times, of religion, and there in half wild poetry, peopling every recess of the Harts mountains with goblins, and every "castled crag" of Father Rhine with a haunting spirit. THINGS IN NEW YORK

New York, May 19th, 1862

MESSRS EDITORS:—The anniversary meetings held here this month, have been as well attended and fully as interesting as usual; although not receiving so much notice in the newspapers as heretofore was customary. One general remark I may make in reference to such meetings is, that the promise of a band, and, perhaps, of a choir of a few hundred children, will attract a larger assembly than the announcement of the most accomplished speaker or speakers of the day. I do not think I hazard much in expressing the conjecture, that a well-trained monkey would compete successfully with Mr Everett or Mr Phillips in drawing a crowded house—to use theatrical slang

Among the spiciest meetings ordinarily are those held by the anti-slavery societies. The speaking at those meetings is generally good, partly because none but rather fearless and trained spectators would trust themselves on a platform, where they might be at any moment interrupted by interrogatories or hisses; partly because the themes discussed at such meetings are of an inspiriting nature, admirably suited to the tastes of a declamatory orator; partly, also, because the leaders in the anti-slavery societies are not quite at one in their views, and are, therefore, more apt to be keen and trenchant in their addresses, antagonism being a stimulus to them. It must be confessed, too, that a good many liked the anti-slavery meetings in past times, not because of love to freedom or taste for oratory, but because of hatred to Christianity—a state of opinion with which, I regret to say, the chief speakers, on the occasions alluded to, have in general evinced too much sympathy.

This year, the anti-slavery orators have been much less intense and denunciatory than usual Garrison has become almost meek. His smile is not half so much sarcastic as it used to be, and, it seemed to me, he read the extracts from Scripture, which he is in the habit of presenting at the opening of anniversaries, with a more mellifluous and tender voice than ever before.

Mr. Phillips, so far as I heard him, scarcely sustained his reputation as a speaker. He seemed to be comparatively at ease, and free from the excitement which, in the dark days of the past, he could not help betraying Since I last saw him he has improved in looks. Perhaps the turn in the tide of human affairs has contributed to this change in his appearance. In the speech which I heard him deliver, he labored to show how the barbarism, as he styled it, of the South is to be absorbed after the war shall have been brought to a close in favor of the North. The idea of colonizing the liberated slaves he scouted as not only unjust but visionary. He contended, that the colored people of the South are much better able to take care of themselves than are their brethren in that region of a fairer skin. His theories were received, apparently, with much favor by the audience; which, by the way I may say, was much more respectable as to dress and general respect, than the audiences wont to visit the anti-slavery meetings in former years

At a business meeting held by the anti-slavery society, of which Mr. Garrison is President, some doubts were expressed, as to the propriety of keeping up such an organization, now that the country is becoming so unanimous in opposition to slavery. Mr McKim, Secretary of the Pennsylvania Anti-Slavery Society, advocated a change of tactics, so as to correspond with the altered state of the public mind. He seemed to think that the anti-slavery society should be dissolved, or should merge into the great society of the same creed which the war has created. Mr. Garrison contended, that so long as the anti-slavery society shall be faithful to its principles, it shall be numerically small. He can hardly have meant, however, to convey the idea, that he apprehended the ultimate failure of the society with which he is identified. On the whole, the impression seemed to be, that the society should continue its distinct organization, and employ its energies in baffling all attempts at compromises with slavery, or at colonization. Incidentally, some remarks were made, which conductors of newspapers might take an interest in hearing. One gentleman stated, that the New York Tribune was started on less than a thousand dollars' capital; while at the present time a capital of two hundred thousand dollars is necessary to set in motion a daily paper in this city. Mr Theodore Tilton, the business manager, I believe of the New York Independent, observed that a newspaper should be printed, as if nobody needed it or wanted to see it. By this he meant, that a paper should not be left to work its own way, its intrinsic merits being expected to secure for it patronage, but that it should be forced on the public by advertisements and agents.

The rival Tract Societies are approximating each other with great rapidity, and I should not be surprised to find a coalition effected in the course of a year. The Nassau Street Society—I so name it for brevity and perspicuity—has discovered at length the enormity of the slave trade, and dared to print some inflammatory speeches of Wilberforce, Clarkson, and other agitators on the subject. At the anniversary meeting of this society, one of the speakers ventured to use language in deprecation of slavery almost as strong as Dr. Cheever ever used; and so far from being hissed or called to order, he received the applause of the audience, and at least the tolerance of the chairman. I confess I felt a little sad to see some respectable old conservatives on the platform, because their presence there, in such circumstances, reminded me of the mutability of human affairs, of the caprice of so-called fortune.

The Boston Tract Society held a large and enthusiastic meeting in the Academy of Music. The chief speakers were Messrs. Theodore Cuyler and H. W Beecher. Their speeches were not worth much, however,—with reverence be it said. Mr. Cuyler seems to aim at being a Beecher; but he is too feeble physically, and, perhaps, mentally, to attain the object of his aspirations. Mr Cuyler, in seeking to be brilliant, becomes gaudy; and in attempting to be pathetic becomes weak and effeminate. Mr. Beecher is often pathetic, but his sentiment betokens strength, not feebleness. He can change his tone and look so rapidly, that he makes the impression of being master of himself, and, therefore, of his audience. He passes with facility "from grave to gay, from lively to severe" He sweeps his fingers along the chords of the human heart, and educes music as he wills. He possesses somewhat of that rich and sappy nature, which characterized Luther, who was equally at home in grappling with giants and sporting with children Mr Beecher is a much better logician than he is commonly deemed. His wit is so abundant that his more solid qualities of mind are not duly recognised; just as the famous Edmund Burke concealed the majesty of his intellect by the corruscations of his genius Yet I am not so charitable as to believe that Mr Beecher has employed his abilities in such a way as to advance much the cause of the gospel. His doctrinal views are very far from being Scriptural, although he may, being bound by no creed, occasionally preach a sermon, which seems to possess the genuine ring. He has been carried away by popularity, and is in great danger of making palpable and unmistakable shipwreck as to the faith. He has a number of crude theories on which he rings the changes on all occasions; and I know of scarcely any better work for one who has genius and scholarship than that of divesting Mr. Beecher's theories of the attractions which his fancy has imparted to them, and showing them to the world in their repulsive nudity.

THINGS IN GREAT BRITAIN

Church and State Controversy.—The strife between Church and dissent has not been so high nor so fierce for many years, as it is at this moment. Since the anti-church rate agitation, the church party have commenced what they call, "Church defence Lectures," all over the country, and since the proposal to commemorate the St. Bartholomew's ejection, they have become perfectly furious. Canon Miller, of Birmingham, Rev. J. Bardsley, of Manchester, Rev Dr. Hume, of Liverpool, and the Rev. J C. Ryle, all flaming evangelicals, have been lecturing everywhere against the right of the present race of dissenters to regard themselves as the lineal descendants of the Puritan worthies of 1662 Nay, some of them have gone so far as to assail the characters and principles of these confessors. They were themselves, they say, intruding into livings to which they had no legal right, and their ejection was a righteous retribution on them. Besides, these gentlemen affirm that none of these men were dissenters in principle—they all held state church views, and consequently the dissenters of the present day have no right to claim decent from them. Several public discussions have taken place, and in most of the large towns in England, the walls are covered with announcements of antagonistic lectures by belligerents of both parties. We had no idea before how fiercely the evangelical party, in the English Church, hate dissent, and how determinedly they cling to every exaction, no matter how small, or how unjust, which the church is enabled by law to levy on all the community, whether belonging to her, or separated from her But the discussion will eventually do good. It will not only direct public attention to the outrageous claims of the church party, but it will the sooner lead to the adoption of measures to get rid of them, and we have no doubt that truth and right will in the end prevail.

Clergy Relief Bill.—Mr. Bouverie, M P. for Kilmarnock, lately introduced a bill into Parliament to enable Church of England clergymen to declare themselves dissenters, and on making such declaration, in conformity with certain provisions stated in the bill, to exempt themselves from all ecclesiastical pains and penalties. This will, no doubt, appear a somewhat strange matter to our American readers, who are not likely aware of any need for legislative enactment on such a subject. But it is a melancholy fact, that it is greatly needed. The law at present is, that a clergyman of the English Established Church cannot, at will, divest himself of holy orders—cannot throw off the obligations imposed on him by canon law and cannot, therefore, engage in any other profession, embark in any calling, (that of schoolmaster alone excepted) to earn for himself an honest maintenance. The object of the bill is to enable any clergyman who chooses to leave the church, to divest himself of his clerical office and character in connexion with it. A petition in support of the bill, and praying that it might pass, was presented at the same time, which petition bears the signature of secessionists from the Church of England of various classes. Roman Catholics, Baptists, Broad Churchmen and others who wish to get rid of their holy orders, and be enabled to become laymen, or ministers in connexion with other denominations. Among those who signed it are the names of Mr. William Wilberforce, M. A., an elder brother of the Bishop of Oxford, formerly Vicar of East Farleigh, now a layman of the Church of Rome; the Hon and Rev. Baptist Noel, formerly a distinguished evangelical clergyman, now a Baptist minister; Mr. J. Allies, formerly examining chaplain to the Bishop of London and Rector of Lanaton; Mr. J. M'Naught, M. A., until lately a beneficed clergyman in Liverpool, but who now wishes to get rid of his order; Mr W. Maskell, M. A., formerly Vicar of Mary church, and chaplain to the present Bishop of Exeter; Mr. F. J. Foxton, formerly Vicar of Stoke Prior; Mr E. Walford, formerly of Balliol College, Oxford, and others. They complain that in consequence of their inability to divest themselves of their orders, they cannot be called to the bar; are indissoluble as counsellors or aldermen in any municipal corporation, and that they are ineligible as members of the House of Commons. They declare they have been forced by their consciences to abandon their sacred profession, and now find themselves unable to join any other profession, save that of schoolmaster, upon pain of excommunication. They, therefore, ask to be allowed to divest themselves by law of their holy order, and be relieved from the penalties and disabilities to which they are now subject. The bill has been read once, and was generally regarded favorably; still there are small, narrow-souled bigots, who cannot be persuaded that there is anything wrong about the church, and have not the brains to distinguish between Christian freedom and ecclesiastical oppression—a few of such characters are in the House of Commons—and that they should oppose a measure of this necessary kind is only what might be expected of them. We, however, trust that, in spite of all opposition, the b

North Carolina—Union Sentiment.—We have additional confirmation of the report that the Union sentiment is rapidly spreading in that State. A [illegible] meeting was held in Stanly [illegible] county, at which resolutions were unanimously adopted, denouncing the traitors, asking protection from the Federal Government of all Union men, and warmly welcoming Mr. Stanley, the new Governor, to his field of labor. The Union people of Craven county had formed a home guard company, under the name of the Craven County Union Home Guards. The Newbern Progress states that the North Carolina State Convention will adjourn soon, and that at least two-thirds of its members are Union men.

Chesterfield Tactics.—The clever correspondent of the Home Guard says

"From the fact that the usual mode of giving command by military officers falls so harshly upon the ears of sensitive privates, the following style has been attached to a regiment of 'Reserved Grays,' and is appropriately termed the Chesterfield Manual:

BY COMMANDING OFFICER.

"1. Gentlemen, you will please give me your attention.

"2. You will be kind enough to cast your head and eyes to the right, and endeavor to observe the 'immaculate bosom' of the third gentleman from you.

"3. Oblige me now by casting your visual organs to the front.

"4. Allow me to suggest the propriety of coming to an order arms.

"5. Gentlemen, will you condescend to shoulder arms?

"6. You will confer a special favor by coming to a support.

"7. If it meets your approbation, I beg leave to propose that you carry arms.

"8. Now, gentlemen, you will please present arms.

"9. I shall consider myself under an everlasting obligation if you will once more oblige me by carrying arms.

"10. Having a just and high appreciation of your intrinsic worth, as well as your exalted position in society, I humbly trust that I am not infringing upon your good nature when I request you to trail arms.

"11. Gentlemen, for the last time, permit me to remark that it is my earnest desire that you should come to a shoulder arms.

"12. If it is not too laborious, I should be delighted to see you change your position by coming to a right face.

"13. To conclude your arduous exercises, I will add farther trespass upon your well known affability by requiring you to come to arms port.

"14. Gentlemen! soldiers! blood-stained heroes! if congenial to your feelings, you may consider yourselves dismissed. I beg to remark, however, that, should it suit your convenience, you will be kind enough to hold yourselves subject to be again called into line, which you will be made aware of by the repeated and vigorous tapping of the spirit-stirring drum, recollecting at the same time that the first vibration of that sweet instrument that strikes the tympanum of your ears is merely precautionary. Allow me to exclaim in stentorian voice—Sever the ranks! march!"

The Mississippi.—A number of the vessels of the fleet under Commodore Lee had ascended the Mississippi as far as Vicksburg, for purposes not yet to be made public. Commander Porter was arranging his mortar vessels in the vicinity of Mobile bar, and planting buoys for the guidance of the ships which have not yet arrived. It is thought that Fort James was evacuated for the purpose of reinforcing Fort Morgan.

Missouri.—The guerillas of Missouri, prompted by the same persons who urge on the same class of murderers in Virginia, have again made their appearance in that State, committing depredations on Union people. On Monday a Government train of seventeen wagons was captured near Rolla. The wagons were burned, and the horses and mules driven off.

Death of General Price.—Several days ago various accounts of the battle at Farmington, Mississippi, by the Union forces of General Pope's corps and the rebels under Generals Bragg, Van Dorn and Price, were published, in which was a statement that a rebel General was killed by one of our sharpshooters. The Chicago papers state that that officer was General Sterling Price, of Missouri notoriety. He was following our army, which was retreating, too rapidly, when he fell, pierced by several rifle balls, which were fired by Colonel Roberts' sharpshooters, who were acting as skirmishers. He rode a white horse, and was therefore a conspicuous mark for our riflemen. It is stated that deserters, contrabands, and prisoners from Beauregard's army all corroborate this story.

Halleck.—All accounts from General HALLECK'S army agree that that able and accomplished General does not design taking Corinth by rushing his men right in the face of the rebel batteries. Instead of doing this, he is slowly approaching the stronghold, and fortifying his position as he advances, and also building roads over miry grounds and swamps, in order to facilitate the movement of troops and heavy siege guns. All the thoroughfares of the rebels, except the railroad to Memphis, have been cut off. It is conjectured that the plan of General Halleck is to starve the enemy out of their entrenchments. Food and forage are already scarce in the rebel camps, the troops having, for two or three weeks past, been on half rations, and they of the coarsest quality. Meantime, General Halleck is reported to have said that he confidently expects to take Corinth without losing over 150 men.

Banks.—The correspondent of the New York Post, with General Banks' corps, says that that general, having driven the rebels out of the Shenandoah Valley, is now about to retire to Strasburg, throw up fortifications, and spend the summer there. The plan of operations agreed upon by the War Department is this: General Shields, with his division, is to cross the mountain and join General McDowell, while General Banks holds the Valley and protects the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. This, it is said, is done by express order of the War Department, as a plan of the campaign.

General Banks' department is greatly troubled with bands of guerillas. Numerous rebel cavalry regiments have been disbanded, and their members have become guerillas, plundering and murdering all Union citizens and soldiers. General Geary went in quest of a body of these, but they fled on his approach. General Geary has been relieved from guarding the lower portions of the Manassas Road, and has been ordered hereafter to report to General Banks.

The James River.—The official reports of the operations of the Union fleet in the James River, and especially at Fort Darling, near Richmond, have been received in Washington. Captain Rodgers reports that he anchored his vessel, the Galena, within six hundred yards of Fort Darling, and kept up the bombardment until all his ammunition was expended. The loss on the Galena was thirteen killed and eleven wounded. The Monitor, during the action, was in close proximity to the Galena, and again proved that she is invulnerable to the heaviest shots of the rebels. She had no casualties on board. The Naugatuck was anchored a short distance below the Monitor, and behaved gallantly until her principal gun burst, when she was forced to retire. She only had two men slightly wounded. The Port Royal and Aroostook, the only two wooden vessels engaged, were anchored within one thousand three hundred yards of the battery, and kept up a well directed and destructive fire upon the rebels. Our brave tars on the James River are not to the least downhearted, but expect to renew the bombardment and drive the rebels from their position.

McClellan News of Saturday.—The despatches from that McClellan's army are dated up to Thursday afternoon, at which time our advanced forces were within five miles of the rebel capital. General McClellan was at New Bridge and was diligently preparing for an attack. It was rumored in camp that the rebels had proposed an armistice of ten days, but it was declined by our commander. Two citizens of Petersburg, who fled from that city, have come into General Weed's camp at Tattoon Manor, and report that the people in the vicinity from absence they came are in the most deplorable condition, being sadly in want of the necessaries of life. The work of conscription is still going on, and the roads to Richmond were fairly thronged by old and young men being driven along under strong armed guards. General Beauregard had arrived in Richmond, and immediately commenced making speeches to the soldiers. Jeff Davis has declared his intention to fight to the death before Richmond, and it was reported that he had two hundred thousand men under him. The troops from the Gulf States threaten that if they have to evacuate Richmond, they will lay it in ashes.

The Rebellion and New York City.—The tide of prosperity which will set in upon the whole country after the rebellion is thoroughly quelled, and made to atone are resumed with the Southern ports, has already commenced to flow in upon the city of New York, and its first symptoms are apparent in an [illegible] in the price of money, making [illegible] at unprecedentedly low rates of interest, and a large advance in the prices of all stocks, bonds, and other certificate securities. The disbursements of the [illegible] August last have created about $[illegible] capital that was locked up in the hands of contractors, and as these were either [illegible] advanced upon wholly in New York or [illegible] the wide expenditure and other gains [illegible] have enriched our city more than [illegible] in the country. The income tax, war expenditure, as well as those of the Insurance [illegible] have been received here, by the [illegible] of the country. These payments [illegible] and making [illegible] in the most liberal manner during the period of general financial and mercantile [illegible] in the rebellious South. New York city, having attracted to its vast and [illegible] credit than any other point in the United States, has therefore added to its active floating capital and riches more than is usual in a time of peace.

This rebellion will then be cited as the creator, and the destroyer, of the city of New York's brilliant destiny.

Parson Brownlow.—In a letter of last week, the Methodist thus speaks of the Parson:

No man, who has not perished, has suffered more in this rebellion than the Missionary Methodist preacher, and no man whatever has suffered more courageously. His passage through the North is telling like a war-trumpet upon the popular mind. There is even some danger that it will kindle too high the indignation of the people against the rebellious crew who are enacting their infernal tragedies among the crushed people in the South. The Parson is a calm, cool soul, but he has a terrible power of language, in a very genius in the use of epithets, (many of which we cannot and do not approve,) and there never has been, because there never could be, a more thorough hater of iniquity. He affirms that his chief fear for the result of the war arises from his apprehension that the Federal Government is too leniently disposed toward the leaders of the South. He does not believe that they are susceptible of any restraint but that of fear, of any effective treatment but that which will deal out to the devil and his angels. And most people who hear the Parson's facts, come to believe as he does.

Parson Brownlow is rather small in stature, slight in his frame, but looks tough; his face is small, but his forehead nobly expanded. The extant portraits give only the outlines of his remarkable physiognomy; none of them do justice to his characteristic expression. There is a striking benignance and even repose in this expression, stamped, however, with heroic firmness, endurance and [illegible]. He is one of those men whom all friends love to the uttermost, and all enemies hate to the death. Great character is superior to great talents; the veteran Tennessean has shown the highest greatness of character in the rebellion. His fidelity to principle, his courageous disdain for the enemies of his country, his bold opposition outspoken to their very "teeth and eyes," his endurance, in months of imprisonment and daily expectation of the gallows, all render him such a man as the people delight to honor. The passage through the country has thus far been an ovation and it will be so more and more. If any new impetus to the popular enthusiasm for the war were necessary, it could not be better obtained than by his journeys and speeches.

Extensive Seizure of Arms.—On the 13th inst., Governor Johnson received from Col. Parkhurst, commanding the Ninth Regiment Michigan Volunteers, at Murfreesboro', a telegram, stating that he "had just made a thorough search of that town for arms, and had found over two hundred pieces heavily loaded, undoubtedly intended to be used whenever Morgan should summon courage enough to make his appearance, if that should ever be."

On receipt of this advice, Governor Johnson directed the arrest of certain persons in and near Murfreesboro', to be held as hostages for the good behaviour of the citizens of that vicinity. The persons arrested are—William C. Ransom, John R. Childress, L. M. Mooney, Dr. King, J. E. Dromgoole, F. J. Moseley, Dr. R. J. Wendell, Dr. W. J. Baskett, Jas. M. Avent, Thomas Robertson, G. T. Henderson, J. A. Crockett.

On Monday, May 12, a large Union meeting was held at Nashville in the halls of the Tennessee capitol. Union delegates were present from all parts of the State, and at the appointed hour the rooms were crowded. Hon. W. B. Campbell presided. Stirring and patriotic resolutions were adopted. The Hon. W. H. Polk, in a speech displaying an accurate knowledge of affairs in the State during the rebel supremacy, spoke of the necessity of every loyal Tennessean girding on his armor and doing what he could to drive away the plunderers. Gov. Johnson, in the course of a lengthy speech, addressing the chairman, said: "The old divisions which once separated us are obliterated, and I meet you to-day on the noble platform of the Union. Let me take you by the hand, and with you pledge anew fealty and devotion to the federal Union. Let us swear that we will not survive it, but that, if we must fall in this contest, we will go down upon the battle-field wrapped in the proud old flag. We ask this only of all men now—'Are you for the Union?'"

The Military Governor of North Carolina.—Washington, May 26.—The Hon. Edward Stanley is on the eve of departure for North Carolina. He to-day received his commission as military Governor of that State. He is invested with the powers, duties and functions of that station, including the power to establish all necessary offices and tribunals, and to suspend the writ of habeas corpus during the pleasure of the President, or until that populations shall organize a State Government in accordance with the Constitution of the United States. His powers are exactly similar to those with which Governor Johnson of Tennessee is invested.

The Impressment of Quakers by the Rebel Authorities. From the Raleigh (N. C.) Standard, April 26.—We insert the following memorial laid before the State Convention by the yearly meeting of Friends, on the subject of bearing arms:

At a stated Meeting for Sufferings, representing North Carolina yearly meeting of Friends, held at Deep River, the 14th of Fourth month, 1862, the subject of our present sufferings, on account of our conscientious scruples against bearing arms claiming the deliberate consideration of the meeting, and believing it right to embrace our privilege to petition those in authority, we therefore adopt the following.

To the Convention of North Carolina, in Convention Assembled:—Your petitioners respectfully show that it is one of our fundamental religious principles to bear a faithful testimony against all wars and fightings, and that in consequence we cannot aid in carrying on any carnal war.

This is no new principle of our society, but one which was adopted at its rise, as the doctrines taught by our Saviour, and followed by his disciples for more than two hundred years, and has ever been and is now held as one of our fundamental and vital principles, and one that we cannot yield or compromise in any degree whatever.

We would further show that the whole number of our members in the Confederate States is less than ten thousand, while in the United States the number probably exceeds two hundred thousand, who bear the same testimony against all wars and fightings, and that in every nation and clime where our society exists, it is at this day, as heretofore maintaining this precious principle of peace, and that we every-to Richmond Disclosed.—Washington, May 21—[illegible] has been sent from here to Fort Lafayette to the French Minister at present in Richmond which has excited so much attention both in this country and in Europe.

Mr. Mercier had no instructions from his Government, and had no business to go [illegible] to Richmond. Mr. Mercier, in conversing with Mr. Seward, expressed his regret that he could not see Richmond and judge for himself about the views and expectations of the insurgents. Mr. Seward said that he could go without any objection from the Government, that he wished every foreign minister would go and see for himself how hopeless the insurrection was. Mr. Mercier went unwillingly.

He heard and saw for himself of course in no way acting or speaking for his Government or compromising his relation towards the United States. The [illegible] was previously consulted, and approved of his going. When he returned he called immediately on the Secretary, and afterwards upon the President, and communicated to them frankly the impressions that he received. He all said no one in Richmond to say anything to him that he should not be at liberty to communicate to the Secretary of State, and he neither communicated to the Rebel leaders anything from this Government nor anything from them to the Government. He held no official communication with any one, nor did he permit himself to receive official attentions. Mr. Mercier's whole conduct in the transaction was discreet, loyal and friendly.

Fugitive Slaves at Washington.—Washington, May 26.—Since yesterday, eight or ten fugitive slaves have been returned to their claimants. It is estimated that there were in Washington recently about a thousand slaves, principally from Prince George county, Maryland, and among the District. At least forty slaveholders from that county were at the Court House on day filing their petitions for the reclamation of the runaways.

In some cases as many as twenty are claimed by a single person. In several cases after the Courts had issued the necessary writs, the Marshal and his Deputies were unable to find the fugitives, who, having by some means been informed of the judicial processes, remained beyond the reach of arrest.

Affairs in Tennessee.—Arrest of Ex Governor Brown.—Ex Governor Neil S. Brown, a gentleman well known formerly as a leading politician, and for the last twelve months as a leading rebel in this State, was arrested yesterday by order of Governor Johnson, on the charge of treason. He was subsequently released on parole, for the purpose of attending to some important private business.

Session of the Supreme Court of the United States at Nashville, Tenn.—From the Nashville Union of the 14th.—The Supreme Court met yesterday morning, at 10 o'clock. The venerable and distinguished Major Wm B. Lewis, for many years one of the Chief Auditors at Washington, during Gen. Jackson's administration, and the intimate friend and confidant of the old hero, was foreman of the grand jury. Although past the three score and ten years allotted to man, his intellect is still vigorous and unclouded and the fire of patriotic devotion to that Union still burns as warmly in his heart as in the days when he fought the numbers of South Carolina under Andrew Jackson.

Judge Catron delivered a brief but pointed extemporaneous charge to the grand jury. He dwelt particularly on their duty to ferret out and indict all persons aiding and abetting the marauding parties which are infesting this portion of the State. The offence was a heinous one, utterly ruinous to society, and deserving the severest punishment. On other points the jury were referred to his charge to the grand jury at St. Louis, to which we shall refer again.

Riot in Baltimore.—In the command of General Banks there is a regiment commanded by Col. Kenley, and recruited in the city of Baltimore. At the recent battle in Virginia this regiment became engaged and lost severely. It was even rumored that the Colonel commanding was among the slain. When the news of the fight reached Baltimore there was naturally much feeling manifested, and the friends of those in the battle surrounded the newspaper and telegraph offices for the purpose of obtaining an account of the conflict, and the names of the dead and wounded. The rebel sympathizers seemed particularly well pleased with the disaster to our arms, and gave expression to their satisfaction in every possible way. The result may be imagined. The relatives, brothers, and friends of the Union soldiers became exasperated at the heartlessness of those who exulted over their probable bereavement. Conflicts ensued; the tumult spread. The many partook of the anger of the few, and from a mere quarrel with a few rebels at the newspaper offices, the excitement took the form and proportions of a riot. The Secessionists were driven from the high ways and compelled to take refuge in their homes. Some were knocked down, others were beaten, and but for the interference of the Union police a few would have been executed at the lamp posts.

Proclamation of Governor Curtin.—The Militia Ordered into the Field.—Harrisburg, May 26, 1862. General Order No. 25.—In the pressing requisition of the President of the United States, in the present emergency, it is Ordered, That the several Major Generals, Brigadier Generals, and Colonels of Regiments throughout the Commonwealth muster, without delay, all the military organizations within their respective divisions, or under their control, together with all persons willing to join their commands, and proceed forthwith to the city of Washington, or to such other points as may be indicated by future orders.

By order of A. G. CURTIN,
Governor and Commander-in-Chief.

Official Report of General Banks.—WASHINGTON, May 26.—The following was received at the War Department at 11 o'clock to-night:

WINCHESTER, May 26—4 P. M.

To the President:

I have the honor to report the safe arrival of my command last evening at this place, at 10 o'clock, and the passage of the Fifth Corps across the river to-day, with comparatively but little loss.

The loss of men, killed, wounded, and missing, in the different combats in which my command has participated since the march from Strasburg, on the morning of the 24th instant, I am unable now to report, but I have great gratification in being able to represent that, although serious, it is much less than might have been anticipated, considering the great disparity of the forces engaged, and the long matured plans of the enemy, which aimed at nothing less than the entire capture of our force.

My command encountered the enemy in a constant succession of attacks, and in the well contested engagements at Strasburg, Middletown, Newton, at a point also between those places, and at Winchester, the force of the enemy was estimated at about fifteen thousand men, with very strong artillery and cavalry supports, while my own force consisted of two brigades, less than four thousand strong, all told, one thousand five hundred cavalry, ten Parrott guns, and six smooth bores.

The substantial preservation of the entire supply train is a source of gratification. It numbered about five hundred wagons. On a forced march of fifty three miles, thirty five of which were performed in one day, subject to constant attack in front, rear and flank, according to its position, by the enemy in full force, notwithstanding the panic of teamsters and the mischances of a river passage of more than three hundred yards, with slender preparations for ford and ferry, not more than fifty wagons were lost.

Our troops are in good spirits, and occupy both sides of the river. N. P. BANKS,
Major General Commanding.

General McClellan.—Washington May 26 and night.—No advance have been received at the War Department to-day from Gen. Halleck.

General McClellan telegraphs that his troops have cut the Virginia Central Railroad at three points between Hanover Court House and the Chickahominy.

The Late News. How to take it.—The Inquirer says:

"What a happy thing it would be if our people were somewhat less moral or if they would address themselves to the practice of a little common reflection when news of an unpleasant character comes over the telegraphic wires. MORNING L. M

THE GINGER CAKE.

"What makes you look so solemn, Charley?" said John Marshall to his younger brother, who had been sitting still for full five minutes, a thing he was seldom known to do. "Something important is on your mind, I am sure."

"I have been thinking about what mother said yesterday, that we should pray for our daily bread, because God fed us, and clothed us."

"Well, there was nothing so strange in that. You have been told so a thousand times before."

"Yes, but I have been thinking as I ate this ginger cake, that I could not see how it could be; for I know mother made it, and she makes the bread we eat, and the clothes we wear, and buys our books and all we want. Now what I do not understand is, God makes and gives me every thing."

"Why, Charley, what a wicked boy you are! How dare you my you don't believe it? It's in the Bible, I know."

"I didn't say I don't believe it. I suppose it's true, for the minister says so, and all good people, but I said I didn't see how it was, and I don't. But I'll ask mother: she can explain it, I know."

Mrs Marshall, who had entered the room, when told of the subject under discussion, instead of repressing the inquisitiveness of her son, said with a smile, "I am going to make some more ginger cake to-morrow morning, and if my little skeptic will go down into the kitchen with me, I will try to satisfy his doubts." "John, if you are at liberty then, and please to come also, I should like it; for only yesterday you asked some questions about the term, 'Great First Cause,' which you met with in your reading lesson, and I will try to answer both inquiries at once."

The next morning, Mrs. Marshall tied on her check gingham apron, and went below, taking the boys with her to give them a lesson in theology She first went to the cupboard, and brought out several articles, and placed them on the table.

"All these," said she, "will be wanted to make a ginger cake for my little Charley. Flour, molasses, ginger, hot water, and saleratus, and I must get a little lump of butter, a very little lump, for children must not eat rich food. Now, Charley, will you tell me who made all these ingredients?"

"I know, mother, who made some of them The miller out at Rochester made the flour, for Uncle John said so, and told about the great stones they grind it with. Then I know that colored people in the West Indies make the molasses. I read that in a book."

"What did they make it of?" said his mother.

"O, now I know what you mean, mother! You mean to say that God made it; but I don't know but men plant it, and raise it, just as we do corn and wheat."

"Yes, they do, but do men make wheat?"

"I don't know, they do something toward making it."

"That is true, and that is what I wish you to understand. Men can do something, can do much toward procuring the comforts of life, but God does infinitely more. Let us look at the field of wheat, which produced this flour. Can you tell me how much God must have done for that field?"

"I'd rather you would tell, mother."

"I will tell some of the things He must have done for it; first, he made the earth itself, or there would have been none. Then he made a soil suitable for the growth of grain; if the earth had been all a hard rock, or all wet and cold ground, or all a great sand bank, it could never have come to maturity. Then he made the sun, and placed it in the heavens to give warmth and light, and he fixed the earth in its proper place, that it might revolve around it, and have winter and summer, day and night: without each of these not a single blade of wheat could be raised, let all the men in the world do what they could toward it. Then over that field, when it had been ploughed by the cattle which he made, and sowed by the hand which he had formed, how carefully must God have watched; giving it sunshine, and dew, and rain, just when it needed them, all summer long —O, Charley, do you think mother could have made even one grain of this flour which is needed in your cake?"

"O, no, no, God did make it! God does feed me, and I see now how it is he does it."

"And I see too," said John, "what is meant by the 'Great First Cause,' I read about. It means God, who first caused every thing."

"Yes, my children, do not forget while you live, however plausible the objections you may hear urged against it, that God does first originate all things; and however much the beings he has made can do, they are still his creatures, deriving all their ability and power from him."

AUNT LIZZIE.

BY CARRIE LINDEN.

"I wish old aunt Lizzie had never come here, mamma, I do," said little Edgar, as he came running into his mother's room.

"Hush, Edgar," she answered, "you don't think what you are saying."

"Yes, I do, mamma," he added, with great earnestness, "I wish she never had come here, with that queer, old, drawn up face. And when I am in the midst of my play, she calls out in her little weak voice, 'Eddy, dear, will you hand that little cricket this way?' O dear, I'm so tired of it."

"Come here, Edgar," replied his mother, sadly; "sit down upon this little stool by me, and hear a story I have to tell you. A number of years ago there was a pretty little cottage, surrounded by rose bushes and maple trees—I fancy I see it."

"Did you ever see it, mamma?" he asked.

"Yes, Edgar, a great many times. There was a tall row of maple trees all along the fence, so tall and large that they formed a complete shade all over the little yard, and the birds used to build their nests in the topmost branches, and sing out merrily, as if they said to the passers by, you can't catch us here. Then there were sweet flowers scattered here and there, where the little bees used to come every day to gather honey, and go away with their tiny bags loaded with the precious sweets. There were sweet peas—sweeter than any others ever were, because they grew there—morning glories and nasturtions trained along the sides of the windows, and over the low brown eaves. O it was a pretty cottage!

"And then, inside, everything was so comfortable, and all looked so happy: the father and mother, and their two children—for they had only two. Their eldest daughter was twelve years old, and the other, a little chattering pet of five years, ran here and there, over the pretty green grass before the house, in search of the gay flowers that attracted her steps. All were so happy, so happy together

"But a dark time came to the pretty cottage One night a fire broke out in the dwelling, and ere the family were aroused, half of their home was one mass of fire. They had barely time to snatch a few articles of clothing and flee, ere the whole was wrapped in flames. The eldest daughter, when the fire was discovered, was sleeping in the low chamber with her little sister, and though the flames were near her bed, and she knew a moment's delay might be death, yet she stopped to take her little sister and wrap her in a woolen blanket, ere she sought escape. Then she heard her father calling to her to come this way, and he could save her; but the smoke blinded her eyes—still she pushed on with almost superhuman strength, hugging her little burden closer to her, till at last, bewildered and faint, she would have sunk, but her father's strong arm caught her—for he had then succeeded in gaining her side—and bore her safely away. A few moments and the pretty cottage, furniture, roses, vines, and all, were burned to the ground—all gone—no trace left of the so late happy home, except what was found in the smoking ruins."

"And what became of the children?" interrupted Edgar.

"The baby of the family, so securely wrapped, was taken from its sister's arms, safe and sleeping; but the sister, the poor sister who had risked her life to save it, was burned shockingly. Her hair was singed, her body scorched, and one side of her face a complete blister. O many a day she writhed under the pain, till her parents' hearts grew sad—they feared she would die; but after months of anguish, she rose from her bed to be an invalid for life. Her system never recovered from the shock—weak and feeble, she has barely lived, and her face, drawn and scarred, will carry the proof of her love for her little sister to her dying day.

"And now, when that sister gives her a home, seeks to return a small part of the great debt she owes to her, her little boy says he wishes she hadn't come, with her drawn up face."

Edgar looked up in surprise, and the tears gathered in his eyes, as his mother added, "Yes, Edgar, she saved your mother's life; O love her well, and seek to add what little comfort you can to her weary life."

"Good, kind aunt Lizzy," he sobbed, hiding his face in his mother's lap, "I did not know this Good, kind aunt Lizzy, I will love you;" and then jumping up, the little fellow ran into the garden, to gather the choicest flowers for her; and as he gave them to her, she looked up and smiled so sweetly on him, he thought no more about her "drawn up face," but he loved her because she had saved his mother.

Time passed on, but no one was more attentive to her wants than little Edgar. 'Twas no hardship to carry the stool for her to rest her feet upon—he did it without being asked—and the choicest fruit and sweetest flowers were ever by her, tokens of his deep, unfeigned love

Evangelist

THE ARK AND THE DOVE

"Tell me a story, please," my little girl
Lisped from her cradle. So I bent me down,
And told her how it rain'd, and rain'd, and rain'd,
Till all the flowers were cover'd, and the trees
Hid their tall heads, and where the houses stood,
And people dwelt, a fearful deluge roll'd
Because the world was wicked, and refused
To heed the words of God

But one good man,
Who long had warned the wicked to repent,
Obey, and live, taught by the voice of Heaven,
Had built an ark; and thither, with his wife
And children, turn'd for safety. Two and two,
Of birds, and beasts, and creeping things he took,
With food for all; and when the tempest roar'd,
And the great fountains of the sky pour'd out
A ceaseless flood, till all beside were drowned,
They in their quiet vessel dwelt secure

And so the mighty waters bare them up,
And o'er the heads of the deep they sail'd
For many days. But then a gentle dove
'Scaped from the casement of the ark, and spread
Her lonely pinion o'er the boundless wave
Ah, all was desolation. Chirping nest,
Nor face of man, nor living thing, she saw,
For all the people of the earth were drown'd
Because of disobedience

Naught she spied,
Save wide, deep waters, and dark, frowning skies.
Nor found her weary foot a place of rest;
So, with a leaf of olive in her mouth,
Sole fruit of her drear voyage which, purchased,
Upon some wrecking billow floated by,
With drooping wing the peaceful ark she sought
The righteous man that wandering dove received
And let her mate rest o'er it with soft moan,
Had wondered at her absence

Then I looked
Upon the child, to see if her young thought
Wearied with following mine But her blue eye
Was gladdened and the finger
Of pleased attention curl'd her parted lip.
And so I told her how the waters dried
And the green branches waved, and the sweet buds
Came up in loveliness, and that meek dove
Went forth to build her nest and thousand birds
Awoke their songs of praise, while the tired ark
Upon the craggy peak of Ararat
Reposed, and Noah, with glad spirit, reared
An altar to his God

Since, many a time,
When to her rest she evening's earliest star,
That little one is laid with earnest tone
And pure cheek press'd to mine, she fondly asks,
Her sire to tell

BAD THOUGHTS

Bad thought is a thief he sets his port—
Creeps through the window of the heart,

SHEEP-WASHING

There are few of our readers who live in the country, who have not beheld such a scene as is represented in our picture Well do we remember how grateful such a scene but [illegible] day, after we had been many miles over weary dusty roads We had been driving along very slowly, meditating, undisturbed by any sound louder than the hum of the bee, or the sharp [illegible] when at a turn of the road we descended suddenly into a green nook like that represented in our picture. It was really refreshing and animating to emerge from the quiet of our own thoughts, to the glad bustle, gay shouts, and hearty laughter, continually rising from the party engaged in sheep-washing. And the poor sheep, how forlorn they looked, and how piteously they pleaded! Now, we have a lesson to teach our dear little ones from this picture of the sheep-washing. "You know Christ is called the "Good Shepherd," and in the children's Psalm —the twenty-third—he is called our Shepherd. A shepherd takes care of sheep, and the Lord Jesus Christ takes care of you, and all his children. They are called the sheep of his pasture The object of washing sheep is to cleanse them from the dirt which has gathered on their wool And if we would be cleansed from the dirt and pollution of sin, we must be washed clean and white in the blood of Christ. Will not all our readers come to Christ to be washed in his blood, so that they may be clean and white? Will you not all pray to Christ to make you his sheep, and take you to be lambs in his fold? We want all of you who are able to read, to find out as many places in the Bible as you can where Christ is represented as a Shepherd.

THE GIRL THAT REPENTED.

Susie Morgan's mother was taken sick one day with a violent headache; and as she and her little brother John were making a good deal of noise while playing, their mother told them to go out to the garden and continue their sports. They had not been long at play until John offended Susie in some way, and in her anger she pushed him. She then went to play by herself; but her heart told her she had done wrong. This made her feel very unhappy. At length she could play no longer; but went into the house to her mother, and laying her head on the bed burst into tears. Her mother asked her what was the matter. "O," said she, "my heart is so bad; I got angry with John and pushed him, and God won't love me, I have such a bad heart." Her mother told her how sinful it was to give way to anger; but that she was glad her little girl was sorry and repented of her sin. Her kind mother then told her, that she had offended the blessed Saviour; but that he was willing to forgive her if she would only ask him. Little Susie said she would ask Christ to forgive her, and to enable her never to get angry with any one again. And since that time, when she feels vexed about any thing, she asks Christ to enable her to forgive, and bear with patience the little trials which are placed in her path.

Dear little readers, you have sinned against Christ a great many times; but if you will from the heart pray to the blessed Saviour to make you sorry because you have sinned, and will trust in him to forgive your sins, and ask him to keep you that you sin no more, then you have repented. We are always sinning against God, and we should all repent because God commands us. We cannot do this of ourselves; it is only by the grace of God we can repent.

EARLY CONVERSIONS.

Bowdler says:—"Do you ask me how early I suppose children may be converted? You might as well ask me how early I suppose flowers blossom. There are thousands of varieties of flowers, some of which blossom at one time, and some at another. Some blossom, with the trailing arbutus, before the snow is gone; some later than that, with the hyacinth; some with the tulip; and some with the honeysuckle. There are flowers that blossom in every month of the year Do you say, 'How many must I see blossom before I can tell him and see If he comes when he is three years old, it is not too early; and if he comes then, do not say, I cannot believe it.' [illegible] anything that you see. When your child [illegible] if you say some human [illegible] what you say. If when your child is but three years old he hears music, and you see his lips [illegible] that [illegible] Do not doubt the [illegible] of what is [illegible] And as to the time at which children may be converted, I do not see any [illegible] more in the case of a child at five years of age than [illegible] me can come out of the kingdom [illegible] at six, some at seven, and some at eight. All that you have to do is to sow the seed and look to him, and wait for them to blossom If they blossom in March like the [illegible] soon in April or May; and if they do not blossom [illegible] bless God for [illegible] and be thankful when they do blossom. [illegible] that develops [illegible] what is the fact, and what is [illegible]

LITTLE SINS.—Little sins have a fearful power of eating out the Christian heart. The ants of a tropical climate will surround their prey, and after destroying it, eat it out so thoroughly, and yet delicately, that at a distance it may appear still alive. Yet when the storm comes, it crumbles So falls the professor whose inner life has been destroyed by little sins.

There is one preacher who does preach with effect, and gradually persuade all persons: his name is Divine Providence.—Carlyle.

A WORD WITH TEACHERS.

Do Sabbath School teachers think sufficiently of the solemn responsibilities of their positions? Do they ever ask themselves this question: "What important lesson shall I endeavor to impress upon the minds of my pupils, when I meet them on each Sabbath morning?"

For instance, there are half a dozen or more little boys or girls waiting for their teacher, and when she arrives with what beaming countenances they look up into her face, to inquire what she has to tell them about Jesus, and the way of salvation.

Here are some few thoughts, which, perhaps, it might be profitable to suggest, as to the best mode of imparting instruction in the Sabbath School. All Sabbath School teachers have learned from experience, that it is much better to rule by love than by fear. If the affections of the pupils are gained, one-half the work is accomplished.

Try to make the Sabbath School a place of attraction. Have, as it were, a magnet by which their young minds will be drawn towards it—where they will hold sweet communion about heaven, and heavenly things Be ever ready to guide them tenderly over any difficulties that may perchance obstruct their way. Try to make their lessons as easy and interesting as possible, so that they will always take pleasure in preparing them.

Last, but not least, impress upon their young minds the great importance of punctuality, by always being punctual yourself, as you well know, "Example is a potent teacher." It is an old proverb, but one worth remembering, that "'Tis the teacher makes the school."

Teachers are not always aware of the mighty influence they exert upon the minds of their pupils. A word fitly spoken may be the means of doing an immense amount of good. Children are generally very active observers, and notice every action of their teachers. How important, then, that our actions be of such a character as to make a good impression on the young and plastic minds of our pupils

Think, too, of the great end we have in view in teaching Sabbath School. It is to save souls. Each of the children committed to our care possesses an immortal soul. That soul must be either saved or lost. Through our instrumentality it may be either saved or lost.

O, that we were all more seriously impressed with the responsibility of our position, and ever keep in mind the solemn account which we all must render at the day of judgment, for the manner in which we have discharged our duties! And if we have been faithful stewards, those children committed to our care will shine as so many stars in our crown of rejoicing for ever and ever.

Mennib.

NO PLACE FOR THE BOYS.

Does it not seem as if in some houses there is actually no place for the boys? We do not mean the little boys—there is always room for them; they are petted and caressed; there is a place for them on papa's knee and at mamma's footstool, if not in her arms; there are loving words, and many, often too many indulgences. But the class we speak of now are the schoolboys, great, noisy romping fellows, who tread on your dress, and upset your work basket, and stand in your light, and whistle, and drum, and shout, and ask questions, and contradict

So what is to be done with them? Do they not want to be loved and cherished now as dearly as they were in that well-remembered time when they were the little ones, and were indulged, petted and caressed? But they are so noisy, and they wear out the carpet with their thick boots, and it is so quiet when they are gone, say the tired mother, and the fastidious sister, and the nervous aunt; "anything for peace," and away go the boys to "loaf" on street corners, to listen to the profane and coarse language of wicked men, or to the [illegible] or to the railroad station, or the wharves or the other common places of rendezvous [illegible] do or no place to stay

[illegible] that there are few boys who care to stay in the house [illegible] boys [illegible] they should play in the [illegible] which is true We [illegible] many days, or days of [illegible], in which they wish to stay in or ought to be kept in, and which if kept in they make themselves and everybody else uncomfortable. We [illegible] that the [illegible] home where the mother is busy with her [illegible] or her baby, and the father is absorbed with the newspaper in the evening which he never reads [illegible] and the [illegible] still and quiet in the [illegible] tely to bed. [illegible] the [illegible] boys is a dull place, they want [illegible] a little [illegible] say that [illegible] we [illegible] our nurse-maid what there is to read [illegible] for [illegible] enjoy [illegible] of the [illegible] where [illegible] the presence of [illegible] would [illegible] and [illegible] to [illegible]

EARLY IMPRESSIONS

It is a well known fact, that aged persons, when on their dying beds, will often repeat lessons and sayings which they learned in childhood, and that those of foreign birth, although they had long ceased to speak in their native tongue, and appeared entirely to have forgotten it when in health, will at such a time begin to talk in the language of their native land. This shows very conclusively that early impressions are indelible, that they cannot be blotted out

Parents, teachers, this is what gives such importance to the early training of children. Children, it is this which makes it of such great account that what you learn now, should be worth learning and treasuring up for future years, for the time when you will be old, for the bed of sickness and death. Above all things try to have this truth impressed on your mind: "That God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Seek a knowledge of Christ. Ask him to instruct you in a knowledge of his love. Ask him to be the teacher and guide of your youth, and when old age comes upon you, he will not desert you. Get a knowledge of the Saviour, for it is a knowledge which will be of more value to you than gold and rubies.

MANASSEH.

There was mourning in Jerusalem: The good king Hezekiah, the captain of God's people, was dead. He had done much for his people; he had honored his God; and now that he lay cold and lifeless, all Judah and Jerusalem did him honor, and buried him in the chiefest of the sepulchres of the sons of David

His son, Manasseh, reigned in his stead; and doubtless the hearts of the people were cheered when they saw upon the throne one who had been taught by his father's example, that "He who ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of the Lord."

Hezekiah knew how short a time he should remain on the earth; and we may safely say, that much of that time was spent in teaching the son, who should succeed him, those things that concerned his everlasting peace and the good of his people. In this he would be aided by prophets and wise men who had so often strengthened him with messages from heaven.

Which of all the kings that went before Manasseh had in his youth a teacher like the Prophet Isaiah? In imagination we hear him tell how great God is; how worthy to be feared; we hear the exhortation, "Trust ye in the Lord forever, for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength"

Knowing, as Isaiah and Hezekiah both did, the proneness of the people to idolatry, how would they labor to make Manasseh see the folly of departing from that God for whom "Lebanon is not sufficient to burn," and bowing down to an idol which one of the trees of Lebanon would more than suffice to make. They would warn him of the day when the idolater should cast his idols to the moles and to the bats, and hide himself in the clefts of the rocks for fear of the Lord.

But Manasseh's heart is not touched. All the teachings and prayers of the wise and good are vain to help him, for he lifts up no cry for himself.

Instead of drawing nigh to God, and confessing as did Solomon when he was placed upon the throne of Israel, "I am but a little child; I know not how to go out or come in;" and praying, "Give, therefore, thy servant an understanding heart, to judge this people," Manasseh did evil in the sight of the Lord. He made Judah to err and do worse than the heathen whom the Lord had destroyed before the children of Israel. He not only restored the idols and the altars which his father had destroyed, but he built an altar for idol worship in the courts of God's own house—even in that place of which the Lord had said, "I have hallowed this place to put my name there forever; and mine eyes and my heart shall be there perpetually."

The mind is filled with horror at this recital. We look to see Jehovah come forth in terrible majesty, taking vengeance on his enemies as he did when the idol was set up in the camp of Israel. But, behold the Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, sending his servants the prophets with words of earnest entreaty to his rebellious people. And even when the honor of his great name demands that He shall punish them for their disobedience, he afflicts them not willingly; for hear him as he mourns their refusal to turn to him:—

"O that my people had me heard,
Israel my ways had chose,
I had their enemies soon subdued,
My hand turned on their foes."

As Manasseh lay in fetters in Babylon, a sense of his deep sinfulness fell upon him. In great affliction, "he besought the Lord his God, and humbled himself greatly before the God of his fathers.

Full of pity God forgave and brought him again to Jerusalem, into his kingdom. And now that he has been made to feel how utterly worthless are the idols in which he trusted, he is zealous to destroy them. [illegible] not so entirely successful as was his father. Many bitter thoughts must have troubled him, even whilst rejoicing in his own salvation, at the remembrance of the ruin he had brought upon thousands. The sins of his youth cast a shadow over his old age, and at his death all Judah and Jerusalem did not assemble [illegible]

My dear children, if you would die happily, if you would be respected and beloved by your fellow men, take warning and do not, like Manasseh, spend your best days in breaking God's laws, but, "Remember your Creator in the days of your [illegible]

ELLEN AND HER PARROT

Mrs Grey lived in a fine old house, in the very middle of a large and beautiful garden. And what a garden that was! Flowers of all varieties, and fruit in the greatest abundance—peaches, pears, plums; every kind you could think of. Ellen was a sweet, gentle girl; kind-hearted and obliging. She was most dearly loved by all her schoolmates. There was no greater treat for the girls than to be asked to spend a Saturday afternoon at Ellen Grey's. If it was in winter, how they played hide and seek in all the curious nooks and corners of the house, (and there were a great many,) making the walls ring with their merry laughter; and Mrs. Grey never failed to give them plenty of apples and nice gingerbread In summer they would spend their time out in the garden, enjoying the swing, chasing each other through the long walks, and gathering the fruit Ellen had a great many pets, a fine dog, a little white or spotted kitten, and one or two more; but one of the greatest attractions for her young friends was a pet parrot. You have seen parrots. Their feathers are generally of a bright green, and they have hooked beaks; but the strangest thing of all is, they can speak. They imitate sounds, though they have no knowledge of what they are saying Ellen's can say a great many words that have been taught her. In the morning she sings out, "Polly wants her breakfast," "Polly wants her bread and coffee;" but she seems fonder of saying, "Pretty Poll, pretty Poll." The only way I can account for this is, that the sentence is shorter; for Polly has no mind, you know, and cannot be vain. I hope none of my little friends are vain. Ellen's parrot once served her a good turn. When she was a little girl only four years old, one day (I am almost ashamed to tell about it) when she was alone in the dining room, she saw upon the table a bowl of sugar which her mother had told her not to touch, as she wanted it for a special purpose, and forgetting that God saw her, she slyly helped herself to several lumps. Soon after she went to her parrot, and amused herself by making Polly repeat, "Ellen took sugar." At tea-time Polly was in the room, and suddenly burst out with "Ellen took sugar, Ellen took sugar." Mrs Grey looked at her little girl. Ellen's face was crimson Her mother silently took her to her own room: what passed I do not know; but Ellen was pale and sad for days after.

Dear children, never take the least thing that does not belong to you. Remember the all-seeing eye of God is upon you. One of his commandments is, "Thou shalt not steal," and there is a voice within you, called conscience, will speak louder than Ellen's parrot.

BIRDS.

A few days ago in a tour of pastoral labor, I visited a patriarch of our Lutheran Zion. He was seated when I arrived, on a chair under a tree in front of the house. Ninety summers have not deprived him of reasonable health and excellent spirits. After conversing with him for a few minutes about Christ and the soul's wonderful destiny, I observed some birds taking, what appeared to me, remarkable liberties. They lit near his feet, picked up crumbs, and passed under his chair, without manifesting the least hesitancy or fear. I asked, "Have you tamed these birds?" In reply, he said in substance, that a year ago they had built a nest in his garden. His daughter scattered crumbs for them in the walks. This seemed to give the birds a good impression of the family. They became more and more familiar, until they entered the house, sat on his knees, and ate from his hands. Their offspring was also brought to share these kind hospitalities.

This spring, on the first warm day that he could sit out, he was gladdened by their return. As formerly they came to him,

"And sang as blithe as finches sing,
That flutter loose on golden wing,
And frolic where they list."

You may be sure they did not come in vain. The crumbs and other good things were again freely placed at their disposal, and now the indications are that the summer will see this family of little aerial friends still more increased.

Here I thought is the divine way to possess the exquisite songs of birds. They are caged by affection and petted by kindness, and yet they have the most enlarged liberty. The open sky and balmy air, amid wood and glen, is theirs as much as if they had never known the habitations of men. Let all the families of the land show equal kindness to the birds that come each spring from more genial climes, wooing them to tenderness and love. Such a welcome given them will bring forth a rich harvest of "the pure, the beautiful, and the good."

What a power there is in kindness! It is the conqueror. When all other instrumentalities fail, it is still able to overcome mighty obstacles The hyena, and men dispositioned like it, alone can resist its spell

"Oh! if the soul immortal be,
Is not kindness immortal too?"

By thine hour of dark despair;
By thine agony of prayer;
By thy cross, in robe of scorn;
By the crucifix, thy crown of thorn,
By thy perfect sacrifice
Jesus! look with pitying eye,
Hear our solemn litany.

By thy deep expiring groan!
By the sealed sepulchral stone;
By thy triumph o'er the grave;
By thy power from death to save
Mighty God! ascended Lord!
To thy throne in heaven restored!
Prince and Saviour! hear the cry

ABOU AND SELIM.

THE ARAB AND HIS HORSE.

BY LEIGH HUNT

One day along the burning sand,
The desert horsemen sped,
That night, the Hadjee Aga's band
Above a captive led

Wounded and bleeding, forward beat,
Bound hand to foot, he lay
Beside the sleeping captors tent—
To die at break of day.

Above, the stars, all bright and free,
On Abou's bondage shone;
Below, the strong pulse of the sea
Did seem to mock his own.

Ages of dead, heroic things,
Made Abou's captive bed;
The dust of kingdoms and of kings
With Abou's blood was red.

In pain, he chafed him on the sand,
Impatient for the day,
When, on the stillness, near at hand,
Broke Selim's eager neigh

No watch, at night, the Arabs keep;
And all the Aga's force
Lay in their sable tents asleep,
When Abou heard his horse

Over and over, on the ground,
Then Abou rolled along;
And Selim, near the picket found,
Held by a knotted thong.

"Thy master, Selim," Abou said,
As Selim sprang apace,
Then with low whinny bent his head,
And touched his master's face.

"Selim, my joy! in Hejaz bred;
Dear as my child or wife;
With thee I share my cup and bed;
I love thee as my life.

"At dawn we left our rocky height;
We swept the desert dim;
We robbed the caravan, in the light,
At the horizon's rim.

"God curse thy master's cruel greed,
That made the booty's weight
Bring down my Selim's flying speed,
To the worst Spahi's gait.

"Selim, my joy! a captive I;
Thou shalt, at least, be free;
No Aga's khan shall hide the sky,
My Arab horse, from thee!

"Free as the winds of Egypt blow,
Shall thy fleet footsteps roam;
Go, where the Jordan's waters flow,
And cool thy sides of foam!

"Go to my tent—thou know'st the way;
Share with my child the flour;
Kiss the dear hands, and, Selim, say,
'Abou will come no more.'"

Then Abou with his teeth undid
The knots that held the steed;
And Selim, of his fetters rid,
Stood, with his strength and speed,

Free as the wind! Yet Selim stayed
By Abou, sore and bound;
And with his master's garments played,
And raised him from the ground.

Selim's soft lips his master felt;
In his strong teeth he hung;
For lifted by his leathern belt,
Securely, Abou swung.

As firmly in his teeth and mouth,
He held the fettered man:
Free, as the wind of Egypt, south
Selim his race began.

He left, asleep, the Aga's band,
As rose the morning star;
And stretched him fleetly o'er the sand,
For Abou's tent afar.

Up rose the sun; his shining eye
Had no such race beheld;
Never was horse, below the sky,
By Selim's love impelled.

At noon, a moment by the well
Selim his master laid;
A moment by the palm-trees fell,
And rolled him in the shade.

All day upon the burning sand,
The courser held his speed;
All night, along the silent land,
Labored the weary steed.

At morn, he climbed the mountain's side
Where stood his master's home;
The blood-drops from his nostrils wide
Fell with the flakes of foam.

With pant and stagger Selim went,
Dim eye, and drooping head—
Laid Abou safely in his tent;
And by the door—fell dead.

THE ROOK AND THE LARK

"Good night, Sir Rook," said a little Lark,
"The daylight fades, it will soon be dark:
I've bathed my wings in the sun's last ray,
I've sung my hymn to the dying day;
So now I haste to my quiet nook
In yon dewy meadow. Good night, Sir Rook."

"Good night, poor Lark," said his tilled friend,
With a haughty tone and a distant bend,
"I also go to rest profound,
But not to sleep on the cold, damp ground;
The fittest place for a bird like me
Is the topmost bough of yon tall pine tree.

"I open'd my eyes at peep of day,
And saw you taking your upward way,
Dreaming your fond romantic dreams,
An ugly speck in the sun's bright beams;
Soaring too high to be seen or heard;
I said to myself, What a foolish bird!

"I trod the park with a princely air;
I filled my crop with the richest fare;
I caw'd all day 'mid a lordly crew,
And I made more noise in the world than you!
The sun shone full on my ebon wing,
I looked and wondered. Good night, poor thing!"

"Good night, once more," said the Lark's sweet voice.
"I see no cause to repent my choice;
You build your nest in the lofty pine,
But is your slumber more soft than mine?
You make more noise in the world than I,
But whose is the sweetest minstrelsy?"

"I WANT TO BE AN ANGEL."

A missionary writes: "But all your readers may not be aware that the Revival Melodies are now sung publicly in Aintab by even the Moslem children. A native helper there gives a humorous account of a scene which he lately witnessed, where twelve or fourteen of the most ragged and dirty urchins of Aintab, who are employed as city scavengers, were seen one day returning from the place outside the town where they had been depositing their loads, mounted on their donkeys, with their now empty mat-bags slung across the back of the animals, and singing in Turkish at the top of their voices, in the presence of cadi, mufti, or whatever Moslem dignitary might be passing by, "I want to be an angel!" Surely never before did such a song come from Mohammedan lips!"

MODERN WAR.

Modern war differs widely from ancient in its requirement of money, or what is equivalent for its persistent prosecution. No Vandal horde, no Gothic irruption, could now sweep across Europe, because the necessary consumption of costly explosives and projectiles would soon leave it incapable of further advance and at the mercy of a less numerous and daring but more effective enemy—more effective because amply supplied with the portable engines of war. When the bayonetted musket and heavy cannon supplanted the ruder and cheaper missiles of antiquity, the day of Alarics and Attilas, of Scythians and Huns, was over. All the barbarians now on earth, though they should count their combatants by millions, would be unequal to the task of overrunning the France or Great Britain of the XIXth Century. In fact, their excessive numbers would but insure their speedier destruction, by famine and by reason of the terrible advantages which the invention of gunpowder and the latest developments of the belligerent capacities of Iron have secured to civilized in all future collisions with barbarous nations.—Greeley

THOU HAST NO SOUL!

BY JOHN L. WATKINS.

In this wide land of liberty,
Poor negro, there's no home for thee;
Like the dull ox must plod along
With naught to cheer thee save thy song.

Thou hast no soul! Thou'rt but a beast,
Design'd alone to work and feast,
That thou-white man may with lordly air
Recline at ease in easy chair.

But God design'd it for the best,
Then bear thy yoke and be at rest;
Presume thou never to aspire
To feel the thrill of freedom's fire.

Repress thou every anxious thought,
Thy bone and sinew all are bought;
Then hast thou no right at all
Save to obey the white man's call.

Thou hast no soul! A chattel thou
Art stamp'd upon thy very brow;
Nor deign to think, if thou canst think,
Thyself, a brute, with man to link.

Be grateful of the white man's care,
Cringing, cow'ring, flattering,—where
Thou hast thy virtues; these impure
If thou wouldst win the white man's love.

What boots it tho' great college halls
Thy presence boasts within their walls!
Tho' Demosthenes or Cicero
Doth in thine own dark image glow.

What tho' Euclid's deepest lore
May be to thee an open door!
Still thou art but a learned fool,
Or learned monkey been to school.

Hast never heard in ancient time
There liv'd a bird well vers'd in rhyme,
Who would most oft loquacious grow,
So vain his mental gifts to show?

Or heardst thou of the learned clerk,
In shape of dog, whose paws would work
Most learned things upon the slate,
And would upon his master wait,—

To hear his task, whate'er it be,
From adding up to "Rule of Three?"
No longer deign to think, because
Thou'rt cow'd in wisdom and her laws.

Thou hast a soul bad art a man:
Thus saith the philosophic clan.
That reason proves thee but a brute
Made like to man, the more to suit.

The station thou wast born in fill
On earth, so long as thou dost dwell,
A slave of servants shalt thou be,—
Thus saith divine authority.

Then why attempt to overrule
Divine decrees, thou stubborn fool?
Why dost thou thus contend with fate,
And foolishly of manhood prate?

Think'st thou a monkey, tho' a man
He apes to be, be ever can?
What tho' his tricks may often show
Fine sense and much that's passing!

Dost thou not know that instinct rare
May oft with reason well compare?
Look thou abroad in nature's field,
Explore the wondrous things reveal'd.

See there the little insect bee,
How wise is her economy!
What wondrous knowledge doth she show!
What wisdom from her brain doth flow!

Go sip thou dew from honey'd flower,
And emulate this insect's power;
Wake up thy soul, with reason's skill,
Thus fashion dew to waxen cell!

Or boast thou never of a soul,
Or d'en of instinct's fair control;
No'er claim again a man to be,
Till thou canst emulate the bee.

For the Christian Recorder.

MR. EDITOR:—Permit me to present a few thoughts on humility. Humility is the great ornament and jewel of the Christian religion, that whereby it is distinguished from all the wisdom of the world, it not having been taught by the men of the Gentiles, but first put into discipline, and made part of a religion by our Lord Jesus Christ, who propounded himself imitable by his disciples, as signally in nothing, as in the twin sisters of meekness and humility. "Learn of me," said the Saviour, "for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls." Matt. xi. 29. For all the world, all that we are, and all that we have—our bodies and our souls—our actions and our sufferings—our conditions at home—our accidents abroad—our many sins and our sparse virtues—are as so many arguments to make our souls dwell low in the deep valley of humility. Humility is an element that has marked the path of all the ancient worthies—such as Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and old Isaiah, and many others which I could mention. And coming down to the gospel dispensation, see the humility of the apostles—such as John, Peter, James, Stephen, and thousands of others, that have gone up through great tribulations. Humility is that grace of the Spirit, which, from a proper sense of lowliness and unworthiness, makes us patient under trials, and contentedly submissive to the will of Providence.

In conclusion, humility is the habitual state of that person's mind, who has low thoughts of himself, founded upon the knowledge of his own imperfections and unworthiness, and his dependence upon God. W. J. DAVIS

A CANDID CONFESSION

Dr. Brownson, editor of a Review, relates the following fact with great astonishment:—"As true as you are a living man," said a Catholic lady to us, "I had been baptized, and been confirmed, had been married, and been to Confession, and to Communion, and yet I never knew, till after coming to this country at the age of seventeen, that there was any God back of the priest who had anything to do with the forgiveness of sins. The thought that in Confession the priest forgives sin only as the minister of God, and that it is really God who forgives never came into my head, till I was so taught by an American priest."

THE CHURCH—HER DANGER AND DUTY.

BY REV. W. D. HARPER.

"Lo, Eli sat upon a seat by the way-side watching; for his heart trembled for the Ark of God." 1 Sam iv 13

The Ark of the Covenant was the symbol of the Divine presence. After the Israelites had been defeated in their first conflict with the Philistines, they sent to Shiloh and took the Ark to the field of battle. It was a heathenish idea thus to attempt to localize the presence of Deity. It was a hazardous enterprise then to take the symbol of the Holy One into the unhallowed scenes of human strife. And the issues of that misguided day prove conclusively that when individuals or nations trust in anything but the living God they are certain to be defeated.

Among those who felt a deep solicitude for the issues of that desperate experiment was the venerable Judge of Israel. There was much at stake in the impending battle. Two sons were upon the field, the destiny of the nation was suspended, and above all the Ark of the Covenant around which clustered a thousand hallowed associations was in the midst of scenes of carnage and death. No wonder surely that he could not rest within his palace, but went out along the highway, and sat down, and watched and waited with a throbbing heart for tidings from the field of death!

But you will mark that the special solicitude of this venerable man of God was for the safety of the Divine Symbol. It was for the Ark of God that his heart trembled. When the tidings came that Israel had been defeated and thirty thousand Hebrew warriors were slain, he bore it patiently. When the still heavier tidings came that his two sons—the only representatives of his name—had fallen upon the field, he still steadied himself under the crushing blow. But when the saddest of all was announced—that the Ark of God had been taken, and carried away into a heathen country, his heart ceased its troublings and his spirit passed away from scenes of earthly strife. God took the good man home to be at rest.

The Ark of the Covenant, from its erection in the wilderness until the destruction of the Temple, was the great centre of all the religious solemnities of the Jewish nation. In it were deposited the sacred books of the law, the pot of manna, and the rod of Aaron. It was constantly illumined by the overshadowing Shekinah. It was the great meeting place between God and his people. It was the centre of all the worship and service of the people of God for thousands of years. It may be fitly regarded, therefore, as a type of the church itself, to which the Divine presence is promised in every age, and from which radiate all our precious solemnities. The idea, therefore, which is prominently suggested in the language of my text, and to which we invite your attention is—"The church—the object of the Christian's deepest solicitude."

It is certainly an unhappy mental construction which leads some persons unceasingly to prophesy evil of the church. They seem to re-echo the sad lamentation of the despairing Prophet. They can discover nothing that is hopeful or cheering in the future. They are filled with foreboding of evil. They anticipate trouble. They predict disruption. They are spiritual hypochondriacs. Everything is wrong. Such a spirit is, to say the least of it, unhappy. So far as its influence extends it has a tendency to depress the energies and chill the piety of the whole church. More than this, it is contagious. It spreads through congregations, and Presbyteries, and Synods, and sometimes superinduces the very evil which at first existed only in imagination. But while this spirit of despondency is certainly to be deplored, it is equally unfortunate to be excessively credulous and sanguine. To shut our eyes against the light, to experience no apprehensions of evil, and to run on without thought or consideration for the future, is certainly not the dictate of sound wisdom. It is our duty as watchmen upon the walls of Zion, to consider carefully the condition of the church, to mark the leading of providence, and to calculate wisely the signs of the times, that we may be like the children of Issachar, "men who have knowledge of the times to know what Israel ought to do." "Walk about Zion and go round about her; tell the towers thereof. Mark ye well her bulwarks and consider her palaces; that ye may tell it to the generation following."

I. I suggest in the first place, then, whether there is not reason to apprehend, in the present condition of our country, that the interests of the State will monopolize Christian Solicitude to the neglect of the interests of the Church.

We have been accustomed to estimate the disastrous consequences of war by the number of lives sacrificed, or the amount of money expended, or the amount of national debt incurred. And certainly when men are cut down by hundreds upon the field, and national debt is accumulating by millions every day, these things are startling enough. Neither blood nor money is of trivial importance. But as Christians we should remember that there are other aspects in which war is not less disastrous. Look, for example, at the influence of war upon the educational interests of our country. Funds for educational purposes have already been diminished. Colleges and Seminaries have been depleted. Professors and teachers have been called to the field. District and common schools have been suspended. Many an educational enterprise projected or in course of completion must fail. Many a boy or girl who, with our accustomed prosperity, would have received an education must now go untaught. And many a young man, consecrated by pious parents to the work of the ministry, will now be compelled by the force of circumstances to turn his attention to other pursuits. And in a country like ours, where the prosperity of the nation depends so entirely upon the education of the masses, and when the ranks of the ministry are replenished so generally from the walks of humble life, these things must tell powerfully in a few years, not only upon the tone of public morals, but upon the ministry and the church.

Mark, too, the effect of this unhappy conflict in which we are engaged upon the benevolent enterprises of the church and of the age. Look at the Bible Society—the Tract Society—the American and Foreign Christian Union, and all the various Christian institutions of our country. Look at the charitable institutions for the Blind, the Mute, the Insane, and the inebriate;—for the Widow and the Orphan, and the Stranger and the Friendless. All these noble institutions are the fruit of Christianity. They stand out like jewels upon the brow of our Christian civilization. They have been initiated and sustained chiefly by the church. They are auxiliaries to the church in the great work of reforming and Christianizing the world. Yet all these, within the brief space of a single year, have felt seriously the disastrous consequences of the present National struggle. And unless earnest and immediate measures are adopted by the church of God, they must continue to realize it still more sensibly in the future.

And what has been the effect of these national troubles, more immediately upon the church itself? Salaries in many cases have been curtailed. Pastoral relations have been dissolved. Ministers have been compelled to turn aside to secular pursuits. Contributions to the various boards of the church have been diminished. Missionaries both at home and abroad have been unpaid. Unsettled congregations are asking but for a limited supply. Faithful laborers are out of employment. God's people are withholding their contributions, and the interests of the church are beginning to suffer. This is no fancy sketch. Natural parallels can be run in each branch or section of the Church. The same thing is common everywhere and among all denominations.

Now in view of these facts we ask, whether there is not danger, in the midst of our national difficulties, that the interests of the State will monopolize the solicitude and the contributions of God's people to the neglect of the interests of the church. It is time the church should look at this subject seriously, before her interests are hopelessly crippled. We would not have any individual withhold a single dollar that is necessary to sustain the integrity of our government. The nation must be sustained. But certainly not at the expense or sacrifice of the church. If we had in past years given millions to God, we might not today have been called to pour our money like the spring shower in munitions of war. Covetousness has been one of the great sins of this favored land. We have robbed God, and God is now making us poor. And it will be an evil day if we attempt to retrieve our wasted fortunes by filching from the treasury of the Lord. The church is the very last place where a Christian people should attempt to economize. The history of Israel is replete with instruction upon this point. It was when they withheld from the Lord more than was meet that God made them poor. And on the other hand, it was when they were poor, yet brought their offerings with a large and generous heart, that God opened the windows of heaven, and poured them out a blessing until there was not room to receive.

Specially, let me say, is it the duty of the wealthy in the church to make enlarged and extraordinary contributions for sustaining the cause of Christ in these troublous times? The poor are not able to do much in times of financial embarrassment. Not so with the wealthy. Their income, it is true may be curtailed, and their contributions to the state may be enlarged, but their real wealth is still abundant. They are responsible for the talents intrusted to their care. "Charge them that are rich in this world * * * that they do good, and that they be rich in good works; ready to distribute, willing to communicate; laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold upon eternal life."

II. But, reversing the proposition, I suggest, in the second place, that there is danger of the church neglecting her duty and her obligations to the state.—One of the hopeful indications of coming prosperity to the church at large, is the separation of church and state. Under the reign of Constantine, the church and state were united together. It became a part of the fixed policy of the Church of Rome that the church and state must be blended together for mutual protection. In all European countries they were united together. Even after the Reformation in the 16th century, it was difficult for the Reformers to give up their early education and prejudice on this subject. They did not give them up. The church and state were still united together. And to this very day, even in Scotland, the land of covenants and martyrs, the Queen's commissioner presides over the highest judicatory of the church.

And no one cause, in my humble judgment, has done more to retard the progress and cripple the energies of the church than this unholy alliance. It has destroyed the spirituality of the church. It has demoralized her ministry. It has crowded her communion with the useless. It has made her obnoxious to the poor and despicable in the eyes of the world. But there are not wanting indications that this unhallowed alliance is being dissolved. In France, in Germany, in Sweden, in England and in Scotland, it is rapidly passing away. The church is casting off the trammels of the state, and is learning to rest for support, not on the strong arm of civil power, but on the stronger arm of the living God.

But the human mind is prone to extremes. And in this country, with our democratic republican form of government, there is a tendency to divorce the church from the state altogether. It has now become almost statute law, by public opinion, that Christian men and ministers must stand aloof from the civil affairs and legislation of the nation. Certain men are supposed to be born politicians. The right to legislate runs in the line of a certain profession by inheritance. Certain men seem to imagine that, by a sort of Jure Divino, they have a right to the control of the government. It is considered a matter of doubtful propriety for a Christian minister to express, publicly, his sentiments upon matters of state policy. The elective franchise must be used with great circumspection. If questions of morals become identified with questions of state, he must be careful not to preach politics. Even intemperance and slavery are in many places contraband themes. Prayers for the success of the army and navy of the United States, and for the integrity of the nation, have been interpreted to mean "politics"—have been interdicted even in our own church—and many a pulpit in the North has been as silent as the grave upon this great and wicked rebellion in this nation. Thus the church has been divorced from the state. The voice of Christian sentiment has been suppressed. The pulpit and the press, as far as possible, have been silenced. Religion has been ignored. Good men have been kept out of the halls of legislation. Bad men, in too many instances, have been left to manage the state and national interests of our country.

Now, while we have no desire to see the Christian ministry turn aside from their appropriate work to secular avocations—much less to military or political positions, yet we cannot but regard it as ominous of evil, when the pulpit and the press are silenced by an unsanctified public opinion, and prevented from speaking out their convictions upon all questions of state morals, and religion. The church and state are, in a certain sense, inseparably united together. They can never be entirely divorced. Every Christian man is a citizen and has duties which he owes under God to the state. And every Christian minister is a citizen, and, by, his very commission from the King of kings is bound to condemn sin, whether found in the individual or in the nation.

It is the duty, then, of the church, as we conceive, and especially of the Christian ministry, to exert their influence in the educational interests of the country—in the promotion of sound morals—in the diffusion of a healthful religious sentiment—and in the elevation of moral and religious, God-fearing men, to places of honor and trust. It will be an evil day for the church and the nation when all these things are given over to an unsanctified world. The church is the light of the world. Christianity is the saving element of the nations. Religion is the only thing that will ever preserve the nation, or any nation, from moral and political disintegration. Would God that upon the heart of every Christian citizen, and over every ballot box, were graven with an angel's pen this truthful testimony of Solomon:—"When the righteous are in authority the people rejoice; but when the wicked bear rule, the people mourn."

III. I suggest again that there is danger of the church having her attention diverted from the great mission of the church in this age and in this country. It will be admitted that the business of the church is substantially the same in every age of the world. Yet it will also be conceded, we think, that the church has been called to perform different parts of the same work in different ages of the world. If we look back in the history of the church to the period of the Reformation, we find that the great business of the church in that age was to convert and preserve the truth of God. The church was then being reformed. She was emerging from the long night that had settled down upon her glory. She was laying aside her embellishments and her corrupt dress. She was divesting herself of the pollutions of the papacy, and was assuming the purity and beauty of her primitive garments. This was the great work of the church in that age, and the work, without which the world could not be evangelized at all, the Reformation church did faithfully and well. We are not surprised, therefore, that the church two hundred years ago, did so little toward disseminating the truth of God; that so few missionary societies were organized, and so few missionaries sent out into the heathen world. The warfare of the church then was defensive, rather than aggressive.

But the church not only has work to do peculiar to this age, but also a special work in this country. Our own country, in my judgment, presents to the Christian church the most promising mission-field in the world. We have in this country the representatives of all countries. Europe, Asia, Africa, China, and the islands of the sea, are all being incorporated with our American character. Millions from the Old World are yearly flocking to our shores. They are filling our cities and sweeping over our prairies. They are acquiring our language. They are assimilating to our habits. They are accessible to the gospel, and are dying by thousands without Christ and salvation. Where, then, shall we find such a mission-field—so accessible—so needy and so ripe for the harvest—as the United States of America? It is the duty of the church, then, to cultivate with special care and with enlarged liberality the great mission-field which God has spread out at our very door. Schools should be built, colleges, erected, and theological seminaries planted for the education of young men for the work of the ministry;—and particularly for a home ministry adapted to the peculiarities of the different sections of this vast country, that these millions who are coming to our shores may be made good citizens and good Christians. And to the earnest and diligent cultivation of this home field, the church is called not only by the command of the Saviour and the promise of success, but by the great law of self-preservation. For if these masses are not soon educated and Christianized, they will soon broadcast the worst forms of infidelity imported from the Old World, and by and by they will overturn the very foundations of our free institutions.

IV. Once more, I observe, that there is danger that the church will forget the great secret of her success—the continued presence and power of the Holy Spirit.—When we look back a few years in the history of our country, we find that the Holy Spirit was given to the churches of this land in almost pentecostal effusion. Refreshing times came to us from the presence of the Lord. The ministry was revived. The eldership was revived. The membership was revived. Conventions were held. Prayer meetings were organized. New life was imparted to the church, and sinners by thousands were converted unto God. Scenes of Scriptural life were witnessed such as had never been seen before. And it seemed as though it were only necessary for these influences of the Spirit to be continued to convert the whole land, and to speed the promise that the earth should be full of the knowledge of the Lord.

But, alas! what a sad change has passed over the spirit of the church and of the nation! Conventions are matters of memory. Prayer meetings have disappeared. The church is rapidly sinking back into her former state of chilling indifference. And the old stereotyped phrases of "No special interest in the state of religion"—"No marked indications of the Holy Spirit"—are beginning to creep back into our ecclesiastical records. Is there not danger, especially in the midst of these scenes of national strife, when the interests of the nation are engrossing the thoughts and prayers of the people—depressing the tone of personal and national piety—that the church will overlook the pressing need of the Spirit's power? Never was there a time when there was greater need for the church to cry mightily unto God than at the present hour. What we need most of all is a fresh baptism of the Holy Spirit. This would quicken us in the divine life. This would animate us in our Master's service. This would make us more earnest and prayerful. This would subdue the selfishness of our nature, and, melting down the asperities of life, would cause our hearts to flow together in love, that with one mind and one heart we might strive together for the faith and hope of the gospel of our dear Redeemer. Remembering, then, where our great strength lies, let the continued outpouring and uplifting of our wrestling spirits be—"For Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth."

THE PROVIDENCE OF GOD OVER SIN.

FROM THE LATIN OF BENEDICT PICTET.

THAT the Providence of God is concerned with sin, we cannot be ignorant; for it is beyond all doubt, that nothing takes place in the world without the knowledge and will of the Omniscient and Omnipotent Being; but in what way it is thus concerned, is a point of the greatest difficulty. Far be it from us to think with the Manichees, and other ancient heretics, that God is the author of sin, much less to say with Homer's Agamemnon, in order to excuse our guilt—I am not the author (of it,) but Jupiter; hence, Jupiter is represented as complaining of mankind—They say that evil is of us. For this is both contrary to the character of God, as a most holy Being, and to the scripture, which teaches us that God perfectly hates sin. How could he, indeed, as Basil observes, be the author of those things, of which he is the revenger? for God would not, nor could he with justice, punish what he himself did and approved. But that we may form some just conceptions of the manner in which God is concerned with sin, we shall consider sin in reference to its beginning, its progress, and its end; for in these three relations is it connected with Providence.

With regard to the beginning of sin, God is concerned with it in various ways, first, by permitting it. This the scripture teaches us—"I gave them up unto their own hearts' lust, and they walked in their own counsels." (Psalm lxxxi. 12.) "Who in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways." (Acts xiv. 16.) But here we must carefully observe, that permission does not imply approbation, for he is from no other than of God. Again, we must not imagine that it is a mere cessation of the divine will, as though God either ignorantly, or unwillingly, or even indifferently, permitted what he does permit for this is contrary both to his wisdom and to his power, since there is nothing more unworthy of God than to suffer anything to take place, and at the same time to work all, or to behold anything taking place, while himself, (if we may so speak,) remains an inactive spectator of it. Further, to permit is not simply not to prevent, as is evident from this one argument—if God permit sin by not preventing it, he either wills not to prevent it, or he puts forth an act of volition at all; if the latter, then the event takes place, either against God's will, and without any regard on his part, which it were impious to assert; if the former, then that permission will not be a simple non-prevention, but an effectual volition on the part of God, whereby he withdraws man to use his own liberty and puts no hinderance in the way of sin. This permission also includes the preservation of man's life and faculties, which God could take away, if he wished to prevent sin, as he took away life from Pharaoh, Sennacherib, and Ahaz's soldiers, (Exod. xiv; 2 Kings xix. 35; 2 Chron. xxviii. 6.) and as he took away strength and power from the Sodomites, from Balaam, from Jeroboam, from the Syrian hosts, (Gen. xx. 10, Numb. xxiii 12, 26; xxiv. 23; 1 Kings xiii 4; 2 Kings vi. 18, 19.) It implies also the not applying a superior strength and power by way of hinderance. This then is the first act of God in reference to sin. Do not ask why God hath permitted it; for it is not for us to pry into these secrets: we are sure he has permitted, the reason why is unknown; this only we know, that God brings forth out of the darkness of sin the light of his own glory.

The second act, by which God is concerned with sin, is that by which he forsakes the sinner, giving him up to himself, taking away from him the light which he has abused and the Spirit which restrained him, so that, all barriers being removed, he rushes headlong, the reins being as it were thrown loosely on his neck. Thus God is said to have "given up the Gentiles to vile affections, to their own lusts, and to a reprobate mind," (Rom. i. 24, 26, 28.) and so Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, said to the people, "Because ye have forsaken the Lord, he hath also forsaken you," (2 Chron xxiv. 20.) Thus we read of God's smiting men with madness, blindness, and hardness of heart, making heavy or stopping their ears, &c.

The third act is that by which God presents opportunities in objects not evil in themselves, but which by corrupt man are turned into evil; now these objects God proposes, either by not preventing the things which offer themselves to man voluntarily and in a natural order, or else by some particular influence on them; and that these opportunities and objects do not of their own nature force to evil is evident from this, that very often the same objects produce different effects in different subjects, as one and the same food is sweet to one, and tasteless to another—healthful to this man, but injurious to that, on account of the different constitution of their bodies. Thus we see that David was tempted to adultery by only looking at Bathsheba; while Joseph could not be drawn to the same sin, even by the repeated solicitations of his mistress. Under this head comes that also, by which God does not remove the occasions of sin, and those objects in reference to which men feel inclined to commit sin, as he prevented Saul from killing David, Ahab and Jezebel from killing the prophets, and the forty Jews from killing Paul, (1 Sam. xix. 11, 12; 1 Kings xxiii. 4; Acts xxiii. 12.)

The fourth act is that, by which God, being angry with the sinner, gives the reins to Satan, who being thus free to act, "worketh in the children of disobedience." (Eph. ii. 2.) And the fifth act is that, by which God stirs up in the mind some thoughts, which are good in themselves, but which sinful man can abuse; thus he willed that Joseph's brethren should think that he was specially beloved by their father, which thought consumed them with envy, and urged them on to wicked and murderous designs.

These points can be very plainly proved from scripture; but the question is, whether God does anything more in respect to sin, than what we have already laid down? Now many parts of scripture appear to intimate that he does something more; for instance, he is said to have "hardened Pharaoh's heart," to have given David's wives to Absalom, to have commanded Shimei to curse David, and to send "a lying spirit," &c. What is the exact meaning of such expressions, I will honestly confess I am ignorant. Most divines attempt to explain it by saying, that God is the author of the essence of human actions, by virtue of his concurrence in producing them but not the author of their sinfulness. To prove this, they observe that it is not an unusual thing for one and the same action to have two causes, for instance, the soul of a lame man is the principle or cause of that man's motion, when he walks, inasmuch as it sends out of the brain, where it is situated, animal spirits into the nerves and muscles of the man's legs; but if the man is lame, the soul is not the cause of that lameness, although the cause of the walking, but the bad affection either of the leg, or of the man himself: and in the same manner a king is the cause of the death which is inflicted on a criminal by the executioner, yet he is not the cause of any cruelty which may be shown in that death, or of the hatred under the influence of which the executioner may put the man to death, as having been previously his enemy. 2 That actions cannot be said to be essentially good and evil, but that they are so according to their different circumstances, (which, indeed, to the case with at least the most part;) for instance, to kill may be a good or a bad action, good, if commanded by the magistrate, bad, if done by a private individual. 3 That most affections or passions are of themselves neither good nor bad, as love, desire, hatred, &c., they have nothing evil in themselves, and, consequently, God may excite these affections without directing them to what is evil. 4 That there are many actions, which are good in regard to the essence of the action, but which become evil in reference, not to the action, but to the mode in which it is done, (which mode does not necessarily go along with the action,) and which may, therefore, spoil an action otherwise good, and commanded by God, as in the cases of praying, fasting, or giving alms, to be seen of men. In these things it is easy to comprehend how the action is from God, but the evil of it from man. 5 That these two points may be distinguished even in case of omission, for it is not true, that in such case there is no action at all. Every omission has an act of the will either preceding or accompanying it, which is the cause of that omission. These then, are the considerations by which divines endeavor to illustrate the difficult question of the Providence of God over evil actions.

But there are certain actions which appear to be evil in their very nature, such as hatred of God, &c. In these it is very difficult to distinguish the essence of the action from the wickedness of it. Now divines reply, that in these, as well as in those before treated of, the act itself may be distinguished from the sinfulness of the act. But, because I know that many cannot conceive this, it has sometimes occurred to me, that we may put it in this form: God in these actions is the author of the motions which precede them; for instance, the motions which precede the hatred of God, but not the author of the act of hatred. And these are the arguments which have occurred to me in proof of this position: first, in order that hatred of God may be stirred up within the mind, certain motions must be previously stirred up in the body, and also certain thoughts in the soul, by which it is inclined to hate any object which may be presented to it. These motions and thoughts are not at all evil of themselves, but that direction of them towards God, which takes place by our own will, is the greatest of all sins, (hatred of God.) Secondly, there is no reason why God should not be said, by acting on the blood, or on the spirits, or on the mind, to excite those motions, nay, even that very affection which we call hatred. But because the affections always select some objects, and are very frequently directed towards those which are presented to them, it comes to pass, that corrupt man, in whom the affection of hatred has been excited, having his thoughts at the time about God, wickedly hates, or feels a hatred of him. Thirdly, if any one cannot assent to the affirmation of hatred to be excited, without any direction to an object, let it be observed, that we are very often in such a state as that all things displease us, and we are prepared to hate whatever object may be presented to us, although there is no object particularly before us at the time. He it observed also, that no man can feel a hatred of God, except many things have before presented to his mind, which it would be too long to detail. When I have been asked upon this subject, why God should excite such an affection of hatred in man, as he knows will produce a great sin? I have asked in my turn why God has at any time permitted a sin, which he was able to prevent? why he permits objects to be presented, which he knows will influence men to sin? why he preserves the lameness or power of man, which he knows he will abuse? I reply further, that God ought in no wise to be blamed because he excites occasions, opportunities, and objects the use of which themselves influence men to sin, but only through man's corruption, of which God is not in any way the author; and because he by no means forces to sin, but on the contrary, forbids sin, and threatens punishment to the transgressor; it is man, who by his natural propensity freely commits sin. This is the way in which we have ventured to illustrate our opinion; perhaps it will satisfy some; if not, let them maintain other views, such as we have before given. So much for God's providence in respect to the beginning of sin.

The acts of divine Providence in regard to the progress of sin, or sin while it is being committed, are three. The first consists in God's directing, in more unconsciously to themselves, so that they sin in reference to one object rather than another, not that he inspires men with an evil inclination, but he overrules their natural propensities in such a manner, that they direct them to an object, which God hath determined to punish. This is exemplified in the king of Assyria, whom God designed to send to the Jews in order to punish their impiety, so directed the oracles which he consulted, being doubtful whether he should make war upon the Ammonites, or upon the Jews, that having passed by the former, he marched against the latter. The second act consists in God's causing the sin not to reach the end designed by the sinner, but another end designed by God long before; thus he so overruled the sin of Joseph's brethren, that they contributed to accomplish his exaltation, which they designed to prevent. The third is that, by which God sets limits or bounds to sin, so that it may not increase to a greater height, or spread to a greater extent, or last a longer time; and this he accomplishes in various ways, such as by enlightening the mind, restraining the desires, removing evil opportunities, &c. Thus God did not suffer the bones of Christ to be broken; (John xix. 36,) or Joseph to be destroyed by his brethren, Peter by Herod, Job by Satan. The acts of divine Providence in regard to the end of sin, or sin when it has been committed, are various. One act is, the direction of the sin to a good end, as the selling of Joseph to the preservation of Jacob's family, and the crucifixion of Jesus Christ to the redemption of mankind. Just as a judge may make use of lions and other beasts for the punishment of criminals, or a physician leeches which will not let go the skin till they are full of blood; and vipers, for the curing of sick persons. Another act is the punishing of sin, both in this life, and in the life to come, and also the forgiving and pardoning of it. But we have now said enough on this subject; only we must in the next chapter explain some passages of scripture, which seem to make God the author or worker of sin.

GRATITUDE.

The Christian, as he journeys onward in the pathway of life, ought frequently to look back, and standing as it were, on the shadowy side of the hill, review the way by which God has led him. If we would keep alive our gratitude,—if we would have it to increase more and more, till, like a holy flame, it burn within us,—we must often in thought, retrace the varied turnings and windings of our earthly pilgrimage. We are so prone, amid our daily duties and our converse with the world, to forget and overlook the benefits received, that only by a careful and frequent retrospect, can we continue, from day to day, cherishing a spirit of true and ever-increasing thankfulness to God. But, the oftener we make the review, the greater cause will we have for saying, with David, "Who am I, O Lord God, and what is my father's house, that Thou hast brought me hitherto?"

Christian! you cannot indeed reckon up all the benefits you have received from the hand of God,—for they are as numerous as the stars of heaven or the drops of the mighty ocean. Your common mercies,—alas! too lightly valued,—the air you breathe,—the return of the gladsome sunlight,—the succession of the seasons, and the quiet and gentle stillness and repose of night,—all these, with their unnumbered host of attendant blessings, are scattered on your path. But, select a few of the benefits you have received, if only to awaken fresh gratitude. You have enjoyed, it may be, years of unbroken health,—or, if you have been wasted by sickness, you have been through God's infinite mercy, restored. While others have been tossing for weary months upon the beds of languishing, and many been hurried into eternity, as in the suddenness of a moment, unprepared and impenitent, you are still in the land of the living and the place of hope. Look into the full graves around you,—think of the myriad sick-beds, with their suffering tenants, and, surely the language of the Psalmist is yours, "What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits?"

Consider, too, your family mercies. To some who read these pages, the past may have brought bereavement and sorrow. It must be so in this ever-changing world,—

"The air is full of farewells to the dying,
And mournings for the dead."

But there are others who have been spared such a stroke. Reader! your wife, your children, are this day by your side,—the family hearth has been unbroken, the family circle unvarnished,—disease which have thinned the ranks of other little groups and darted the arrow into other family hands, have passed by your door. Or, if some are absent from you, having gone forth into the world to fight the battle of life, you have reason to hope that they are well, and prospering in that state of life to which it has pleased God to call them, and, in thus preserving those loved ones, have you not had cause to mark the good hand of an all-wise and watchful Providence, secretly and wonderfully working for your happiness and comfort?

Reflect, too on the manifold spiritual mercies you have enjoyed,—mercies, from so many withheld,—the Word of God in your home,—the house of God to repair to,—the means of grace,—the hallowed rest of the Sabbath,—seasons of holy communion,—times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Think, too, of the communications of grace from above,—comforting, sustaining, preventing grace,—grace for the family and the closet, the church and the world,—and will you not again say, "What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits?" Christian! let us help you to give an answer to the question. If you are truly grateful, you will love the Lord. This is the best return you can make for His innumerable blessings.—His unmerited favors,—it is what he chiefly demands, without which, all other returns are valueless and of no account. This is "the first and great commandment,"—the sum and substance of all religious and grateful obedience, that we "love the Lord our God with all our heart, and with all our soul, and with all our strength, and with all our mind."

If you are truly grateful to God, you will honor Him with your substance, and render unto Him the first fruits of your increase. In making it your chief desire to honor Him in your substance, by His children than to being regarded with more favor and confidence, and not many mighty than these are called. But God has chosen the weak, the poor, we shall receive but the crumbs we ask, the more readily and cheerfully will the blessing be bestowed. Nothing is more pleasing and delightful to Him who is the Fountain of all grace, than to have humble trusting souls coming to His footstool, and by earnest prayer to set out of up in faith, drawing forth out of the inexhaustible stores of His bounty what they stand in need of to strengthen them for every duty, or to support them under painful trial.

If you are truly grateful to God for His benefits you will endeavor to walk before Him in the land of the living. It will be your effort to serve God in all the duties of a parent and daughter, of a husband and wife, of a master and employer, of a boy and servant in the house. You will consider the proper conduct of your life to be your reasonable and natural gratitude. You will endeavor to maintain always on your mind a lively sense of His all-seeing presence, in order that you may make it your chief and constant care, to approve yourself to Him alone.

It is to be very much feared that you will be careful to pay your vows to the Lord, such was the resolution of the Psalmist, and many a one would have discovered it was, too. Though the old proverb says, "Let no man repent his vow, but repent his sin," yet the sin lies in the neglect of the duty, and not in the doctrine.

Reader! here there is much room for heart searchings.—the promises made upon a sick-bed, where is its fulfilment? the resolutions formed when the star of hope again glimmered on your pathway where is it now? the secret purpose, awakened in the soul by some providential deliverance, has it ever reached its accomplishment?

Finally, gratitude to God for his benefits will tend to increase your delight in his service. Your gratitude and obedience are sure to rise and fall together. Gratitude to God for benefits received, recommends us to His favor, and ensures the bestowal of others still more precious and soul-satisfying. Ingratitude keeps his hand over open,—dispensing His gifts more profusely. Christian! be this then your prayer:—

"O God, endue me with a spirit of true and pious gratitude for all thy benefits, temporal and spiritual; maintain and increase the same in my heart. Grant me the blessing of a thankful spirit, and dispose me ever to take delight in Thy service."

The Pathway of Promise.

THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

EXEMPLIFIED IN ANECDOTE.

The late Mr Jay of Bath was one day travelling in the country, when he chanced to meet with a farm laborer, who had been busy threshing corn. "Good, morning friend," said Mr. Jay, in his usual free and hearty manner; "Solomon says, in all labor there is profit, and I hope you have found it so." "I have labored long in sin, sir, and never had much profit by that," replied the stranger. "Then I should hope," said Mr Jay, "that you know something of the apostle's meaning when he asks, 'What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed?'" "I trust I do," returned the laborer, "and that through divine grace being made free from sin, I have become a servant of God, and have my fruit unto holiness, that the end may be everlasting life!" Christian faith and Christian character were thus expressed and exemplified, and Mr. Jay felt that he had that morning been taught a lesson which he could never forget. In itself, the colloquy is a fine illustration of the power of Christian feeling, and suggests to all who would honor Christ the duty of living out the apostolic injunction, "Whether, therefore, ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God."

A RECOMMENDATION

TO THE DISTRICTS OF PHILADELPHIA, NEW ENGLAND, OHIO, INDIANA AND MISSOURI, OF THE A. M. E. CHURCH MINISTERS.

Dear Brethren:—As we have a number of Superannuated ministers on the list in said Districts, therefore it will be expected that the ministers and preachers, on their circuits and stations, will do all they can to collect the two cent money; and we also recommend that the Class leaders be instructed to collect and set the amount on the class book opposite each member's name, as also all the collections called, per Discipline, for the Annual Conference, and publish the same once every quarter, that it may be seen who they are that work for God and his cause. We think it is time to give credit to those of our people who do work, and that God's name may be glorified

REV AND DEAR BROTHER:—Accept my best respect to you. This leaves me and family well, truly hoping that this may find you and all the dear friends in the enjoyment of the same blessing of God. There is a letter which has come under my notice, which I find in the CHRISTIAN RECORDER from the Keokuk Mission, that somewhat astonished me; for every minister, when entering on his field of labor, ought to examine the books and papers that belong to the Mission circuit or station, and find out who was his predecessor, and what work he had performed. For learning embraces knowledge, and truth comes forth with an increasing brilliancy. Truth stands opposite to error. Now, I must say to the author of that letter, my brother, that you have erred in two statements that you made in your letter of May 7th, 1862, in regard to those societies.

1st. Not one of them was organized three years ago.

2d. Nor did the Rev. Wm. A. Dove organize either of them. And with due respect to Rev. W. A. Dove, I will ask you, or any one in Keokuk or any other place, if you will please tell me at what time and where did the Rev. Dove ever build a house of worship, or form a society for that object, and you shall have my thanks for such information as will prove the matter clear; for the truth I want, and nothing more. Inquire of the President of the Sewing Circle, who it was that formed their constitution. Also, the President of the Mission Relief Society. And then you can set yourself right before the public by rectifying those errors through the CHRISTIAN RECORDER, and you will save me the trouble of replying to your letter of the 7th. I am glad to hear of the societies prospering, and that the Sewing Circle is a benefit to the Mission: it was for that purpose that I organized it. My wife joins me in love to you and all the friends.

Yours in Christ,
WM. JACKSON.

REV. ELISHA WEAVER:—Dear Sir: At a Mass Meeting of the citizens of this city, the enclosed resolution was unanimously adopted. As one of the Corresponding Committee, I address you to solicit your opinion of the proposed effort: We, as citizens, think the time has come when there should be a gathering of the colored people of this country en masse; and define our position and what we shall claim for the future. The great question to be decided will be: "Is there matter, or are there issues enough to warrant the call of a National Mass Convention?" Has there not enough transpired to warrant the call? And we cannot but believe that by the time the convention is called more will transpire which will demand our immediate attention. I hope, sir, the effort will receive your countenance, and will have the support of the Christian Recorder.

An answer will be expected from you as soon as convenient.

Yours, in behalf of the Corresponding Committee, JOHN FREEMAN, Chairman.

New Bedford, June 31, 1862.

MR. EDITOR:—At a Mass Meeting of the colored citizens held at Music Hall, Friday evening, the 23d inst., the following resolution was offered by William H Johnson:—

"Resolved, That this meeting choose a committee of seven gentlemen, who shall commence corresponding with the leading colored men of this country to get their co-operation in issuing a call for a National Convention of the Colored People of these United States, to be held on the 1st day of October, 1862, in the city of New Bedford.

The resolution having been warmly debated by the following gentlemen, was adopted: William H. Johnson, John Freedom, Dr. Thomas Bayne, Alfred Sawin, John H Jenifer, John Jenifer, Jr., and others

NEW YORK CONFERENCE

Saturday, May 31st, 1862

Conference assembled in the A. M. E. Sullivan Church at 9 o'clock, A. M., Bishop D. A. Payne in the chair.

Conference was opened by Rev. Deaton Darrell, singing, reading and prayer. As we had just arrived in Conference from our homestead, we were introduced to the Conference by Bishop Payne, and had a hearty shake hands with most of the brethren

We were then given a seat, in order that we might have an opportunity of reporting for the Recorder. While engaged in taking notes, we were informed that the Conference met on Thursday, the 20th, fifteen minutes before 9 o'clock, P. M., and proceeded to business. It seems that there was some mistake as regards the appointed time, as it was advertised to meet on Saturday, the 31st

The first business was the appointment of committees, &c. The Conference appointed Rev. Leonard Patterson, Secretary Conference adjourned with a benediction, to meet on Friday morning, at 9 o'clock A. M.

FRIDAY MORNING, MAY 30, 1862.

Conference met per adjournment, Bp. Payne in the chair. Religious exercises were conducted by Revs. J. M. Williams and Thompson. The roll was called, and previous minutes read and approved.

Three of the ministers were appointed on religious services—viz: Revs. J. D. S. Hall, William M. Watson, and R. H. Cain. The Bishop took up the questions on Discipline found on page 62, relative to the financial department, and continued so occupied up to adjournment

Conference adjourned, to meet on Saturday morning at 9, A. M.

SATURDAY MORNING.

Bishop Payne in the chair. Conference was opened by singing, reading, and prayer. The roll was called, minutes of previous session read and approved

Conference proceeded to the unfinished business and hearing reports on finance. Having gone through with the financial matter, the Bishop then proceeded to the investigation of the ministerial character, and so continued until all had been examined, and all were found to stand fair except a few marks or complaints made against several of the ministers.

The question on reception to the itinerant and Conference membership was brought up. There was one brother presented from 30th street, who was reported to have come from Zion connexion, by the name of George Washington, and was recommended for annual conference membership After some considerable discussion upon the subject, it was decided that he had not been taken in contrary to the rule governing the case. After some other business, Conference adjourned with a benediction, to meet on Tuesday morning, June the 3d, 1862.

TUESDAY MORNING, MAY 3, 1862.

Conference met at 9 o'clock, A. M., Bp Payne in the chair.

Conference was opened by Rev Brother Hamilton, reading, singing and prayer. The exercises were continued by Bishop Payne in giving out a few verses, and prayer by Elder Moore. The roll was called, and minutes of the previous session read and approved.

There were some brethren offered for Conference membership. Question tenth, per Discipline, page 62, was laid over until this morning, when the question came up for debate. A motion prevailed that the speakers should be allowed fifteen minutes each. Rev. J. M. Williams took the ground that, according to action of the General Conference, he was not a member of the A. M. E Church. Rev William Moore took the ground that he was a member. Rev. J. D. S. Hall took the ground that we had two Bishops, but he claimed that Bishop Nazrey had been elected twice, &c. At this juncture, Bishop Payne arose and stated that the time had expired, and introduced Rev. A. Crummell and Mr. J. D. Blides, of Liberia. Mr. Crummell addressed the Conference upon the subject of Liberia. His remarks upon Liberia were strong and well-timed. Mr. J. D. Blides next arose, and in strong terms appealed to the passions and consciences of the audience, holding them as if spell-bound—whereupon Rev R Cain offered a series of resolutions, viz:

Whereas, Africa does present a greater field of labor for us; therefore,

Resolved, That we will do all we can to encourage the Republic of Liberia in its great work of redeeming the millions of Africa by civilization and religion; and we, as ministers of Christ, will aid the great work by all the means in our power.

Resolved, 2, That we hereby tender our thanks to those gentlemen for the able addresses to which we have listened.

Resolved, 3, That we will do our duty to our Fatherland as soon and as fast as GOD in His providence shall give us the means.

Conference then adjourned, to meet on Wednesday morning, at 9, A. M.

WEDNESDAY MORNING

Bishop Payne in the chair Conference was opened by singing, reading, and some two prayers.

The roll was called, and minutes read and approved. Conference proceeded to the unfinished business. Petitions were read from some of the circuits, &c. Conference decided that their next Conference should be held in Brooklyn city, in Bridge street church

The Bishop announced that it was now the time set apart for hearing the report of the General Book Steward, which was read and very kindly received, and ordered to be printed in the Minutes

Bishop Payne recommended that, in view of our limited means in a financial point of view, that the Conference hereafter take the two cent money out of the preachers' fund, and buy books for the district. We hope that all of our Bishops will be thoughtful enough to recommend the same thing

Conference then adjourned, to meet to-morrow (Thursday) at 9, A. M

We also left New York Conference at five o'clock, P M, for the New England Conference We left the brethren in fine health and spirits.

WHAT A WORLD this would be if all its inhabitants could say with Shakespeare's shepherd: "Sir, I am a true laborer; I earn that I wear; I owe no man hate; envy no man's happiness; glad of other men's good; content with my farm."

A WAG says of a woman: "To her virtues we give love; to her beauty, our admiration; to her hoops the whole pavement!"

WOULD MEN take the same care of their souls as they do of their bodies, we should find our churches as thronged upon the Sabbath as our markets are upon a Saturday.

A LONDON JOURNAL thinks "the right man to the right place" is a husband at home in the evening

EXTRACT FROM PARSON MEAGRE'S LIFE.

From a humorous narrative of the eventful life of a young parson, in which some of the difficulties of the ministerial work are displayed for the profit of the people at large, we make the following extract:—

BALLS AND HOW THE PARSON COUNTENANCED THEM

As already intimated, Mr. Meagre had some difficulty with the youth of his congregation. That some of the boys were bad was a notorious fact. It was alleged that they played truant, swore, chewed tobacco, stole fruit and mutilated the shade trees on the side walks. For these things they had not only been energetically cudgeled, but had been penned up until they committed whole chapters of the Bible and catechism to memory; yea, and they had been even required to "tend church," as a condign punishment. In cases of special sin, the punishment was sometimes instant as well as condign. Old John Flailer had stopped saying grace to drive Billy out of the house for laughing when the cat jumped on the table and stole the meat, while the old man was elaborately blessing it. But cuffs and large doses of doctrinal literature thus wholesomely administered, had failed to make the youngsters pious. Indeed, the more the old people wanted to make the young ones pious, the more the young ones wouldn't be made pious. They looked upon the Heavenly Father as a "Dreadful God," and on his religion as a terrible infliction. All they knew of religion was that everything they did was a sin, and that all sin must be punished: and if they kept from sinning it was because they were afraid of being "flogged" for it. If they had one wish above another, it was that they could be like boys whose parents were not Christians. As it was, to them, Churches were dreary dungeons; prayers, sermons, Bibles and catechisms were instruments of torture; and pastors and parents were only jailors and executioners. Of course the pastor of their own church was to be master of the inquisition.

On Saturday, a crowd of the boys went out and played ball. As most of those very boys had been kept in limbo all the week for catching and plucking an old German's geese down at Indian Spring, this new freak of youthful wickedness was looked upon not only as a palpable proof that punishment had done no good, but as an open defiant protest against paternal restraint. The fathers and mothers were in great distress. It looked to them as if the divine covenant had been broken with them as parents, for they had trained up their children in the way they should go, and now they were departing from it. One thing was certain: the children had not been spoiled at home, for the rod had not been spared

Now, only a few weeks before this, all the youthful forces of the congregation had been marshalled into the Church and exposed to Mr. Meagre's fire, on "disobedience to parents." And as if that were not enough to satisfy Elder Strapiron, that functionary of the Church had "taken advantage of the pastor's absence that afternoon," as he said, to read to the Sunday School about the forty-two children who were torn in pieces by she-bears for mocking the prophet Elisha. Upon this piece of Bible history, Elder Absalom had commented with such intelligence and force as made up for Mr. Meagre's deficiency in the morning. Now, if Mr. Meagre alone had preached to the children, this continued perversity might have been accounted for, but as Elder Strapiron had himself preached on the subject, the difficulty could not be a want of proper instruction and exhortation. However, it was resolved to request the pastor to preach a sermon against ball playing

The request was made with due formality It was not charged that the boys had violated any injunction of their parents in the case referred to, for no restrictions had been laid upon them; nor had they been indecorous or disrespectful; they had "only played ball." "Mr. Meagre, couldn't you preach a special sermon agin ball playin." To the holy horror of the committee, Rev. Petit refused point blank.

"Yes, but Mr. Meagre, your particular friend, Dr. Kay, even has published a sermon agin balls and popular amusements in general You might at least preach one. It's demanded by the times."

The juvenile preacher a curly head shook horizontally. He had an opinion of his own in which Dr Kay would probably concur What that opinion was no one knew, until the afternoon of the fourth of July, when Rev. Petit showed his colors by taking a game of ball with the boys himself.

When he first came on the ground, the youngsters were as startled as if old Mr. Krimehad caught them in his peach orchard. Those who were not scared too badly ran away; those who were, stood still and beat the ground with their clubs and bats. All were certain that the preacher had come there with some sinister motive. Even when he proposed to play with them, they thought he meant to commit them to some overt act, and then bear witness against them. But, by degrees they gained confidence and had a fine game, although it was remarked that not a single oath was sworn during the whole hour.

Various constructions were put upon this action of Mr. Meagre's by the elder members of the congregation. Some thought he was young himself and had not yet gotten over his own boyish propensities. A great many said the preacher was taking part with the boys over against their parents. One person was kind enough to say that Mr. Meagre evidently thought that ball playing was not sinful in itself, and not only intended what he did as a deliverance on the subject, but, perhaps, had some good design so far as the boys themselves were concerned. This seemed to satisfy some, but outraged the holiness of others, who declared that they would not go to hear any such preach who held such theories and indulged in such practices. In this determination one or two persisted for two weeks, and even kept their sons from "Catechise," now, when for the first time in their lives they wanted to go. Mrs. Gibbs shut her Jim up in the smoke house all day on the fifth of July, and did not allow him to leave the yard for ten days for fear "Meagre might spoil him." At the end of that time her necessities made her relent. She wanted salt, and sent Jim down the street with three cents to buy a quart. The boy was so glad to be free from "durance vile" that he not only staid all day, but went to the tavern and lost the three cents at a game of toss. Nor did the evil stop here. Jim was arrested and held to answer the charge of petty gambling. In this state of affairs, Mrs. Gibbs sent for her pastor to relieve her distress.

"What have you been doing, Jim?" asked Mr. Meagre, as he entered the Mayor's office.

"Playin' orack-loo!" sobbed Jim.

"And what is crack-loo? How do you play it, Jim?"

"Why you go to a place where there aint no carpet on the floor, and fillip up a cent, and the feller that gits nearest to the crack in the boards when the cent falls—why he wins."

Of course, Jim's confession was not taken as evidence against him, but there was proof enough to establish his guilt without that.

Mr. Stanhope, the Mayor, a noble-hearted man, called Mr Meagre aside for consultation He was unwilling to destroy the boy's self-respect by sending him to jail—a disgrace from which very few boys recover sufficiently to be emulous of good. He, therefore, proposed to let Jim go, as this was his first offence, with a reprimand, if Mr. Meagre would personally go his bail for future good behavior. This the young parson agreed to do and the fact was announced in open court. Then Presto! Change! Mrs. Gibbs, who but a few hours before thought her pastor a very dangerous man, now declared that he was the best friend she ever had. She almost fell upon his neck, perhaps, would have quite done so had he not quickly changed his position.

"O! Mr Meagre," she said, "I'll never, never, never forget your kindness, but do tell me, what shall I do to keep Jim from taverns and gambling?"

"Let him play ball," said the pastor. Mrs. Gibbs changed her robe for a look of mute surprise, which seemed to ask Mr Meagre if he was not ridiculing her, but as she remembered that he never trifled with his people, she soon concluded that he was in dead earnest

"I mean what I say," said Rev. Petit, "and as I am not only your pastor, but what is more to you just now, Jim's bail, and am liable for him, I think my advice is worthy of some respect"

"What difference can playing ball make?" asked the worthy dame.

"A great deal madam. You teach your boy that every thing is wrong. He finds out that that is not true, and soon learns to think that nothing is wrong. You make his home so hot for him that he is glad to run away from it whenever he can. Make his home the most pleasant place to him in the world, and he will prefer it to any place in the world. Allow him innocent amusements, and he will not run into wickedness for the sake of mere variety. Every engine ought to have a safety-valve Mrs. Gibbs to let off surplus steam, and if you do not allow your boy some vent for his animal life and boyish feelings, he will burst one of these days and blow you up in the process. Old Fritz, of Prussia, broke his son's flute over his head, and the young prince went to playing cards."

Mrs. Gibbs took her pastor's advice, and Jim improved in his disposition and morals. He did not care to run the risk of going to jail for playing crack-loo when he could play ball without the fear of being penned in the smoke house for it. The very next Saturday, Jim came home from his sport at 3 o'clock, and nursed with the play and company he had enjoyed, did not care to run off down the street, but went into the garden and hoed potatoes without being told to do it. Mrs. Gibbs said she had often stood over him with a stick and made him do it, but he never did it as well as he did it that day.

Not very long afterwards Jim persuaded the boys to forego the pleasure of a game of ball entirely, and form a white-washing association to improve the appearance of the fence back of the church, and when Mr. Meagre came to give them lessons in the catechism, he expressed his gratification at the work. Jim's part was especially well done. He had covered every spot in the boards with lime without splashing a bit on the ground, and for this the parson complimented him. This gave birth to a new idea in the boy's mind. He had always wanted to get a situation as driver of a circus wagon, but now concluded that he would learn to be a house-painter. The next week he called to consult his pastor about it, and was confirmed in the idea that house-painting would be the better of the two vocations. In the following spring, Jim was duly apprenticed and two years afterwards he was not only a consistent communicant member of the congregation, but what was more in the eyes of some of his older brethren, when the church was repaired, he varnished the tops of all the pews for nothing, and saved seven dollars and a half.

CHAPTER THIRTEENTH.

THE YOUNG PARSON BECOMES A SON OF JUBAL.

Before Jim Gibbs' improvement was developed by him, Mr. Meagre had other cases somewhat like his in their general character. Only one of them can now be given.

Mrs. Rate's idea of religion was expressed fully and only by the word "solemnity." A visit from her pastor always invested her house with an air of peculiar sanctity. Upon one of these pious occasions, little Sam broke into the room, blowing a willow whistle vociferously. Mrs. Rate was, of course, horrified at this piece of unhallowed temerity; and in order to show her minister that she was in no way accountable for such wickedness, she disclaimed all knowledge of the affair, by demanding of Sam to confess, instantly where he got that ugly thing To the surprise of the good woman, Rev Petit acknowledged that he had made the whistle for the boy himself.

A clap of thunder from a clear sky could not have surprised her more. Did she understand Mr Meagre? There must be some mistake, and to re-assure herself, she repeated the inquiry, and the young parson avowed distinctly, emphatically and unequivocally that he was the author of the eccentric production in Sam's mouth.

"I made it," he said, "and I made it for Sam. I found him down by the Indian Spring, fishing for tad-poles, in the mud, and to keep him from getting wet and dirty, as well as to stop her persecution of a crop of prospective frogs, I made him that whistle from a willow branch that hung over the stream, and taught his infant lips to blow it."

"Yes, and mam," said the name-sake of Weller's son, "he broke a bran spinner new knife a doin' it, and didn't cuss nor say nuthin' bad like you did when you broke pap's old one, trimmin' the currun' bushes."

Mrs. Rate looked daggers at Sam, and said something to the effect that "children and fools never speak the truth," but part of the remark was lost to the parson, as his apt pupil had nearly drowned the maternal voice by a long shrill toot of his new instrument. The non-pluss mother compromised with her hopeful by sending him into the kitchen to have his hands washed, and tried to score up some other topic of conversation. When Mr. Meagre arose to leave, he said, "Mrs. Rate, I have a request to make of you."

The good lady had hardly the courage to ask what it was, as she feared he might say, "Do not use any more bad words when you break an old knife," but at last she stammered out, "what is it, Mr Meagre?"

"Don't whip Sam when I am gone."

She was of course relieved in one way, but awfully embarrassed in another. At length she asked, "Now, Mr. Meagre, what makes you think I am going to lick him?"

"I do not think any thing about it," said he, "for I know it. I know it by intuition. Besides, I saw it in the thunder storm on your face awhile ago, and I am sure it is the intention of your heart now. You can hardly wait until I am gone, and I will not go until I have your promise"

"But, Mr. Meagre, what am I to do to keep him from telling every little bad thing that happens?"

"Do not say or do any bad things. Now promise me, you will not whip Sam."

Mrs. Rate was reluctant to give her assent. Revenge was sweet, she was longing, yea, bursting to tan Sam's hide completely, not for whistling, she did not care a fig for that after she knew where the whistle came from, but for exposing her. But she, perhaps, argued that if she did whip him the parson would "get mad and have her before the meetin' for bad words," so she gave her promise, and Mr. Meagre took his hat and left.

A few weeks after this, Mrs Rate sent for her pastor in great haste. He of course thought some one was sick, dying, or dead, and obeyed the summons without a moment's delay

"What's the matter, Mrs. Rate?" asked he, "can I do anything for you?"

"Why, Mr. Meagre, I sent to see if you wouldn't make Sam another whistle. He didn't scratch the furniture or break anything while he had it—just sot still and blowed; but I tramped on it with my foot yesterday and broke it, and I have'nt had a bit of peace since. A body can put up with his noise when he is so good other ways."

Unfortunately the season was too far advanced for willow whistles: the sap would not run, and the parson could not gratify Mrs. Rate's wish, but he bought Sam a Jews-harp, and having convinced the boy that it was an advancement on his broken whistle, that answered every purpose placed it in his eager hands. When the parson left this time, he told Mrs Rate to send for him at any hour in the night, rather than get angry and say bad words, or whip Sam when there was no necessity for it

It soon became apparent that Mr Meagre differed from his congregation in regard to the symptoms exhibited by the sin-sick boys, and that he held a different method of treatment. He probably gave a "diagnosis" of the prevailing disease in a sermon on "binding heavy burdens and grievous to be borne, and laying them on men's backs." From the theory therein set forth, Mr. Absalom Strapiron dissented. "I count myself a Christian," he said, "and yet I never feel like playing." As, however, father Absalom acknowledged that he had fought "humble-bees" and robbed birds' nests on Sunday, when he was a boy and as he remembered how his own kid gloves had risen before him like the ghost of Banquo when he commenced to rail about those the parson were, he subsided, and was content with solemn silence. Mr. Crimp, too, thought all playing was wrong: —the boys wore out so many clothes, and his Bob had broken a poor widow's window one day, which every body said, "Bob's father ought to pay for." But as Mr Crimp had boasted not long before of his success at a shooting match, and as a certain hostler who witnessed the operation, said Mr Crimp would not have got the turkeys if he had not cheated black Sambo, his opinion was of very little weight in questions of morality. As for Mr. Flailer, he said right out, that the boys who did such things, ought to be served like the bad boys in the time of Moses—"put out of the city and stoned to death," but as he had been known to curse as well as beat Billy, it was said that he could not throw the first stone.

The women were generally tired of beating their children, and glad to have a cessation of hostilities, on the ground, that it saved them trouble if on no other. And besides they could whip their children as much as they pleased any how—so they yielded the theory of leniency; and as they were the power behind the throne, the popular sentiment of the congregation soon vastly preponderated in favor of Mr Meagre's views. Indeed, they inclined to the other extreme. The pastor was to be an undiguised and universal Santa Claus to furnish their children with toys, and practise pleasing arts that would lull their teething babies to sleep; the church was to be a playroom and religion a matter of mere fun; even the severest duties of the Christian were to be a sugar plum affair, and Rev. Petit was to supply the confections free of trouble and cost. It was suggested that he might say some funny things in the pulpit, like Mr. Buffoon, the tract agent, just to make the children laugh a little. One prominent member with a philosophical mind—a sort of Lord Bacon, had noticed that the Sunday School was well filled, "just before the pic-nic," and suggested that it would be well to have a regular series of pic-nics. Of course, ginger-bread and ice-cream were to be the chief incentives to early piety. Another one of these inductive philosophers thought Mr. Meagre was "very inconsistent in taking him to task for getting tight and tearing down a few fences just for sport."

Mr. Meagre recollected the proverb, "Incidit in Scyllam qui vult vitare Charybdem." In getting his bark off the rock, there was danger of its being swallowed up in the whirlpool, and he tried to steer between the two.

MALE GOSSIPS.

The world, especially the masculine part of it, has always had a great deal to say about female gossips, and one would almost conclude that no other species existed. Now, it is doubtless true that the female portion of the community are generally good talkers, and not indisposed to pretty large liberty in the use of the unruly member. There are, indeed, very many honorable exceptions: women of lovely spirit, upon whose tongue ever dwells the law of kindness—whose gentle and generous speech is a soft mantle of charity—whom natural refinement and superadded culture of mind and heart have raised far above this weakness of their sex. What more beautiful than these ministering angels! Their very presence rebukes all unkindness.

But it is by no means true that no gossip exists outside of hoops and crinoline. He it knows to whomsoever it may concern, that there are male gossips. They are not confined to any particular locality, but are generally found in the greatest numbers and perfection in small country towns, the chief theatre of their operations being the tavern or store. Here they congregate, especially in winter evenings, and such using up of their neighbors—the ladies are nothing to them! Before this self-constituted tribunal or petty court in which every man is lawyer, judge and jury, all combined in one, every person, every event, and many things that never happened in the neighborhood, pass in review No one too high or too low—nothing too sacred or too profane to be discussed. The doings, even the sacred privacy of every family, of every church, minister, deacon, schoolmaster, school-ma'am, and school-committee, are the theme of free and exaggerated talk.

Now we believe in a large freedom of speech, but not at all in that unlicensed, meddlesome spirit which catches and makes the theme scandal whatever is calculated to disparage or harm a neighbor's reputation—which breeds strife and ill-will among families—which kindles fires that would go out or have no existence but for its interference. And how much precious time is thus wasted—what an evil influence is exerted upon the young who sit by and listen, and learn to take part in the vulgar or profane discourse. The young who, at home, where they should be, might store their minds with useful knowledge, are here schooled in the most unprofitable learning. They learn too much of many things of which they should be ignorant; they become bold, meddlesome and profane. Truly this male gossiping is an evil and a nuisance.

ARAB HORSES.

An English lady of rank and wealth, now in Egypt, writes home as follows: "I fear you may deem me rather boastful of my horsemanship, when I tell you that two Arab horses which threw their cavaliers did not throw me. The cause, however, was not in my skill, but in the very remarkable predilection these animals feel towards the weaker sex. Let the wildest and fiercest Arabian be mounted by a woman, and you will see him suddenly grow mild and gentle as a lamb. I have had plenty opportunities to make the experiment, and in my own stable there is a beautiful gray Arab which no one but myself dare ride. He knows me, anticipates my wishes, and judiciously calculates the degree of fatigue I can bear without inconvenience. It is curious to see how he manages to quicken his pace without shaking me, and the different sort of steps he has invented to remedy contradictory purposes.

Horses being as liable to forgetfulness as other organized beings, my incomparable grey would allow his natural ambition to overcome his gallantry, and if another horse threatened to pass him, would start off with the speed of a whirlwind. Wo to me if, under such circumstances, I were to trust to the strength of my arm or the power of the bridle! I knew the gallant charger better. Leaving my head loose, and abandoning all thoughts of competition, I would take to persuasion; pat him on the neck, call him by his name, beg him to be quiet, and deserve the piece of sugar waiting for him at home. Never did these gentle means fail. Instantly would he slacken his pace, prick up his ears as if fully comprehending his error, and come back to a soft amble, gently neighing, as if to crave pardon for his momentary offence."

THE FAITHFUL DOG.

An instance of canine fidelity is thus narrated by a Chicago correspondent of The Boston Transcript: "A remarkable incident is related of the manner in which Mrs. Pfeff, the wife of Lieutenant Louis Pfeff of Chicago, who was killed at Shiloh, was enabled to find her husband's body. No person, when she arrived on the field, could tell exactly where her husband's body was buried, and after searching among the thousands of graves for half a day, she was about to abandon the pursuit in despair. Suddenly she saw a large dog coming towards her, which she recognized as one which had left Chicago with her husband. The dog seemed delighted to find her, and led her to a distant part of the field, where he stopped before a single grave. She caused it to be opened, and found the body of her husband. It appears by the statements of the soldiers, that the dog was by the side of the Lieutenant when he fell, and remained with him till he was buried. He then took his station by the grave, and there he had remained for twelve days, until relieved by the arrival of his mistress, only leaving his post long enough each day to procure food."

CHARACTERISTICS OF CHRISTIANITY.

We proceed with the characteristics of the new dispensation in that which concerns the mutual religious duties of men. The commandments of old were written upon stone, but the time was to come, and did come, of which the Lord said, "I will put my laws into their minds and write them in their hearts." (Heb. 8: 10.) The outward glory and manifestation of the old dispensation were the temple and the worship and ceremonial of the temple, but now every servant of God is a temple—"the kingdom of God is within you." The outward glory and manifestation of the new dispensation consist now in deeds of brotherly kindness and charity performed for his sake and in obedience to him who is the Mediator of this new and better covenant; in preaching the Gospel to the poor, in feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, in giving water to the thirsty, in visiting the sick and imprisoned, the fatherless and the widow in their affliction, and in doing to others what we would that others should do to us. Under the old dispensation God was pleased to train men specially to his worship and to the service of his temple, but now men are to worship neither in this mountain nor in that, nor yet in Jerusalem, but to worship Him, a Spirit, in spirit and in truth: then the outward task was to build and maintain a gorgeous temple; then only the sons of Jacob participated in the benefits of this special worship; but under the New Commandment, which by unbounded favor we now enjoy, all the human family are included, and the task of the disciples of Christ by which they are to exhibit their obedience to their Divine Master is not to rear a mighty temple or temples to his glory, but that the labors of his disciples shall be employed mainly in promoting human welfare, in doing good to men for time and eternity. Neither justice, nor morality, nor generosity, nor social expediency are now singly or unitedly the sole rule of conduct as between men. Higher and holier motives and principles intervene. Religion is interposed in all the relations of men. Whatever benefit or blessing a man seeks for himself that he must as a pious man desire for his neighbor; what men desire others to do for them they must be willing to do for others. The whole race is one family and God is their Father: "He so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish but have everlasting life." (John 3: 16.) And then emphatically,—"This is my commandment, That ye love one another as I have loved you." (John 15: 12.) "If God so loved us we ought also to love one another." (1 John 4: 11.) How fully is the love of Christ evinced by the fact that the active duties of religion as they are set for

Who can unfold the results upon suffering humanity of social errors? Who can lay open the sources of vice? Who can fully expose the [illegible] Over all these subjects and interests of humanity, religion casts her eye, and to all this suffering she extends not only the light of the Gospel but the hand of help and remedy; the arm of prevention and defence. It is a broad field for the active duties of religion which is thus opened; broad not only because the field is the world and the multitude of its inhabitants, but broad in the extent and nature of the religious duties enjoined, and the principles laid down in the teachings of Christ and his disciples, from which these duties are to be inferred and unfolded, or developed.

ANCIENT LITURGY.

In use in the year 1796.

"Universal Church-Prayer."

Most merciful and gracious Father in Christ, who has promised to hear the prayers of the poor, and not to turn thine ears away from their cry: We come united before thy face, the whole congregation for this purpose has assembled itself together: but thou hast commanded us to pray not only for ourselves, but for all mankind; yea thou hast graciously promised to hear our weak prayers, and to fulfil our humble petitions; we obey thy command, and in deep humility represent thy promise before thee: shew thyself as the father of mankind, whom thy Son has dearly purchased with his own blood; remember those who are enveloped in darkness, and those upon whom the light of thy gospel has not yet shined; break the bands of Satan, and let the light of thy knowledge prevail over all the earth. Remember thy Christendom (Zion:) help that therein may be found both name and power. Destroy the power of bigotry and superstition, and work a deliverance against the power of unbelief. Let thy Evangelical Zion be particularly favored, and grant, that all who belong thereunto may experience the power of her evangelical doctrines in their hearts. And as we have the commandment in thy word, to pray for all those that rule and are in power in the world, so we recommend to thy favor all kings and princes of the same, grant them all true kingly and princely impressions, that thy fear may be before their eyes and in their hearts. Especially remember, for Christ's sake, this western world, and as thou hast already begun to shew thyself as the God of its inhabitants, so still manifestly reveal thyself the same. Praised be thou that thou hast broken the chains, wherewith men thought to bind us; praised be thou for the freedom which thy powerful arm hath obtained for us; praise be to thee for the freedom which we now enjoy: but protect us for Christ's sake, that the same may not lead us to an unreasonable contempt of danger. Keep thine eyes consantly over this thy people, whom thou hast chosen as thine heirs; to this end fill the fathers of these United States, the rulers, with the spirit of wisdom and the fear of the Lord. Grant that peace and union may, through their endeavors, be extended over and continued in the land, and that the honor of thy name, and the prosperity of the kingdom of thy Son, may be the uttermost care of their hearts. Help that these United States may constantly continue in the bonds of peace and love, that their bond may be a bond which shall continue until the end of days. Remember, O Father, in particular, the State in which we dwell, crown the rulers thereof with wisdom and the love of righteousness. Fill our law-givers with thy spirit, that all the laws which are, or shall be made, may tend to the happiness of the citizens of the State. Help that right and justice may be observed by our judges without partiality or respect to persons. Cleanse the land from vice, and let much fruit of true Godliness be perceived in the same. Help that wickedness may hide its face before Godliness, and that it may have no reason to fear on account of vice.

In particular be gracious to our congregation, that peace and brotherly love may be kept in the same. Bless the officers of the church, bless parents and children, and especially bless our schools.

Bless the cultivation of land, bless all business that are pleasing to thee, both by sea and land.

Receive under thy gracious protection all that are pregnant and give suck, all widows and fatherless children. Help every individual in their need, and be gracious to all who in any place cry to thee, keep us in thy love, and let every thing work for our good. Turn away from us in mercy all richly deserved land troubles, war, hunger, and scarcity; fire and water perils; pestilence and other evils on mankind or on cattle, and every thing else which our sins have richly deserved.

Grant us pleasant weather, and let the fruits of the earth prosper abundantly. Be a Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe. Thou holy God protect us from sin and shame, and assist us with thy good spirit, that we may not forfeit thy blessing by our transgressions, nor draw down thy righteous judgments on us. We acknowledge, O Lord, that when thou dealest according to thy long-suffering toward us, that it was not our righteousness that draws thee unto it: for we are unprofitable servants before thee; but it is purely on account of thine own free and undeserved mercy, according to which be still gracious unto us, and draw our hearts in love toward our neighbors, to sorrow with all who are in distress, that we may never forget to do good to every man, yea even to our foes, that we may thereby manifest ourselves to be the children of God. Protect us from sudden death, and prepare us more and more, through thy spirit and grace, for an happy end. To this end teach us to seek no desire but thy love, no profit but the gifts and graces of thy holy spirit, no honor but that we should be thy children and made one with thee, no adornment but the righteousness of Jesus Christ, no life and support but thy grace and union. Especially in the last hour of death keep satan with all his temptations from us, and encrease our faith in thy Son Jesus Christ, that thereby we may overcome all the fears and terrors of death. When our ears can no longer hear, let thy holy spirit bear witness with ours that we, as thy children and the co-heirs of Christ, shall soon with Jesus be in Paradise. When also our eyes can no longer see, then grant that the eyes of our faith, may be open, that then we may see thy heaven open, and the Lord Jesus at the right hand of his Father.

When also our tongues can speak no more then let thy spirit make intercession for us before thee with unutterable groanings, and teach us to call upon thee Abba! dear Father! in thy hand I commit my spirit Grant also most faithful God, that we may live in thy fear, die in thy grace, depart in thy peace, rest in the grave under thy protection, be raised again through thy power, and then heir the glorious hope of eternal life, through Jesus Christ, thy dearly beloved Son our Lord, to whom with thee and the Holy Ghost be ascribed all honor, praise and glory now and forevermore. Amen.

After this church-prayer the petitions for the sick, and then the Lord's prayer, our Father, &c. Then the appointments, notices, &c. After all this is accomplished, the minister concludes with the following sentence.

The peace of God which passeth all understanding keep your heart and mind, in Jesus Christ, unto everlasting life—Amen.

TIME DIFFERENCES IN THE U. STATES.—Boston time is, of course, nine hours faster than that of all the leading cities of the United States. The figures given below indicate how many minutes slower the time is in the cities named than it is in Boston. New York 12 minutes, Philadelphia 16, Baltimore 22, Washington 24, Richmond 20, Charleston 35, New Orleans 76, Buffalo 30, Cleveland 42, Detroit 48, Cincinnati 53, Indianapolis 57, Louisville 57, Chicago 65, Cairo 70, St. Louis 76, St. Paul 88, San Francisco 207, minutes. The difference of time is quite important in these days, when the telegraph is so generally used.

BATTLE OF LIFE.—If life be a battle, how sad must he be who fails to arm himself for the contest. If life be a storm, how infatuated is he who sleeps while his bark is driven amid unknown waters. If life be a pilgrimage, how unwise is he who strays from the right road, nor seeks to return until the twilight shadows gather round his pathway

Battle on the Chickahominy.—Washington, June 1.—The following despatch was received at the War Department this morning:

From the Field of Battle, June 1st, 12 o'clock, noon.—To the Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War:—We have had a desperate battle, in which the [illegible] Summer, Hunter's and Keyes have been engaged against greatly superior numbers. Yesterday, at one o'clock, the enemy, taking advantage of a terrible storm, which had flooded the valley of the Chickahominy, attacked our troops on the right Bank

Casey's Division, which was in the first line, gave way unaccountably, and this caused a temporary confusion, during which the guns and baggage were lost, but Generals Heintzelman and Kearney most gallantly brought up their troops, which checked the enemy, and at the same time, however, succeeded by great exertions in bringing across Sumner's and Richardson's Divisions, who drove back the enemy at the point of the bayonet, covering the ground with his dead.

This morning the enemy attempted to renew the conflict, but were everywhere repulsed.

We have taken many prisoners, among whom is General Pettigrew and Colonel Long.

Our loss is heavy, but that of the enemy must be enormous.

With the exception of Casey's Division, the men behaved splendidly.

Several fine bayonet charges have been made. The Second Excelsior made two to-day.

GEO. B. MCCLELLAN,
Major General Commanding

THE SCENE VIEWED FROM A BALLOON—AN AERIAL TELEGRAPH STATION.

Washington, June 1.—During the whole of the battle of this morning, Professor Lowe's balloon was overlooking the terrific scene from an altitude of about two thousand feet.

Telegraphic communication from the balloon to General McCLELLAN, and in direct connexion with the military wires, was successfully maintained, Mr. Parker Spring, of Philadelphia, acting as operator. Every movement of the enemy was observed and instantly reported.

This is believed to be the first time in which a balloon reconnoissance was successfully made during a battle, and certainly the first time in which a telegraph station has been established in the air to report the movements of the enemy and the progress of a battle. The advantage to General McClellan must have been immense

The offensive movement of the rebels proves conclusively that the rumored evacuation of Richmond was incorrect, and that the so-called Southern Confederacy does not intend to relinquish possession of their capital without a formidable resistance and a sanguinary struggle.

General McClellan and the Southern Generals—It is rare to repent the cruelties sung that war is a science; that no one knows it but those who have passed a life pretending to study it—that Generals have done so; newspapers were not done so; that it is impossible to deliver battle to superior forces in unassailable positions; that our Generals offer battle to McClellan, he will not accept it, &c. But an appeal from common conceit to common sense and to history is always justifiable. The greatest masters of the military profession have left on record this unanimous judgment—that war is an art, not a science, much less a mystery; that it cannot be taught or reduced to rules; that success in it depends upon mother-wit, and study; that quick perception, strong sense, courage, enterprise, and general mental resource are the qualities that make a commander; that the worth of an officer is to be tested by his success, and the merit of a campaign is to be estimated by its results, and not by the opinions or criticisms of persons having military pretensions. Now what have been the results of the campaign in Virginia? The war has lasted a year. Many battles have been fought. In every one of the battles fought in Virginia, with the exception of Chest Mountain and Roanoke, the Confederate soldiers have had the advantage; yet the Confederate armies have been always in retreat, never in advance, abandoning position after position, according to rule and square, till now the State is nearly all swallowed by the enemy, its fields desolated, farm-houses sacked, the slaves wandering in troops, the people a nation in exile, and the capital still safe only on the supposition that the president of the past shall here be abandoned. It is time to put in a protest against precedent, and to give solemn warning to all those, if any there be who propose to continue the campaign in Virginia as it has been commenced.

But our Generals have often "offered battle." McClellan would not accept it. Therefore, they could not fight him. On this point we would refer to a memorable piece of military history. When the great General of the civil wars of Rome was engaged in his campaign against Publius Silo, a distinguished commander of the other party, he bothered him much with his trenches and slow advances. Silo often led out his legions in choice positions, "offering battle," which Caius Marius would never accept. At last Publius Silo resorted to this simple expedient: he sent a herald in the lines of his adversary to make him this speech—"O, Caius Marius, if you are indeed a great General, why do you not come out of your ditches and fight me a battle?" Marius sent back his own herald to make him this reply—"Oh, Publius Silo, if you are a great General, why do you not make me come out and fight you a battle?"

An Eventful Week at Front Royal.—A brief occupation was that of the rebels at Front Royal. Saturday, the 24th of May, brought us the news of its capture, and Saturday, the 31st, brought the welcome tidings of its restoration to the shelter of the flag. The forces which drove out the Louisiana and Georgia troops left in possession by the rebels, we presume, was detached from McDowell's corps. Its march was rapid, its work well-done, and its success complete. With but trifling loss on our side, the lately victorious enemy was promptly expelled, quite a large number slain, one hundred and fifty prisoners taken, eighteen of our own captives were rescued, and a large amount of transportation captured, including two railway trains. This must be held to be a brilliant exploit for which officers and men deserve high praise. May all the people of the valley receive so prompt assurance of the power and the presence of the Union.

The Retreat of General Banks.

REPETITION OF THE NEWS IN PETERSBURG AND RICHMOND.

The Petersburg Express of the 27th says: "Yesterday morning early the telegraph caused all hearts to rejoice with the glorious news that Generals Jackson and Ewell had entered Winchester, taking two thousand prisoners and captured all the enemy's vast ordnance and commissary stores." "When Jackson was last heard from, he had captured four thousand prisoners, secured small arms, artillery, ordnance, and commissary stores of great value, and was still in hot pursuit of the retreating enemy." "What Jackson's plans are, we have not been informed. We think it more than probable, however, that he will drive the fleeing columns of Banks into the Potomac at or near Harper's Ferry, and then destroy the bridge of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad at that point. For miles and miles he can then tear up the railroad track, burn bridges, and blow up culverts. In the meantime, as it is to his exact route for the destruction of the bridges, he may probably encounter Milroy and Schenck's forces, at or near Romney, serve them in the same way he has Banks, and then the Valley will be clear. Or he may come on down to Stafford, and attack McDowell in his rear, while Anderson, who, at the head of an army of Confederates, now confronts McDowell, will be prepared to strike a telling blow at the proper time." A despatch from Richmond of the 26th says Jackson took prisoners the First Maryland Regiment of Infantry and the First Vermont Cavalry at Front Royal, and two thousand more at Winchester, and that his own loss was two hundred killed and wounded.

The feeling at Richmond is represented as one of confidence of success in the battle about taking place, the success of Jackson having had an electric influence on the spirits of the troops.

The Richmond Despatch of the 27th has an article on The Struggle over the Metropolis: "It says—"There is yet a battle and the enemy is known to be [illegible] his whole line on the north bank of the Chickahominy. He has been engaged in this labor most robust nearly for several days. He will next commence the shelling of our army. Some people say from this [illegible] he can pitch a shell into the city. That would be, ugh it must be confessed that the line [illegible] by one of the great [illegible] if the age is rather nearer than the compass can. We know very little of war and do not presume that our own opinions will receive any more weight than they are entitled to. It seems to us, however, that as an attack has been made on our [illegible] it is reasonable to suppose the enemy is pretty well fortified, there will not be any at all of his present position. What our Generals intend to do, of course they alone know. They have learning, large capacity and experience. The country has retired and is relying on them—and if there is occasionally some misgivings, let us hope that the result will prove that there is no reason for it. But it is a fact that the commonest observer must know that delay is not the thing for us, the enemy has great facilities of water transportation, and has even made the York River Railroad, from the White House to near the Despatch [illegible] useful to him by putting upon it locomotives and trains of cars. The surest way to defeat his plans and movements is promptness and energy, directed by sagacity."

Beauregard's Report of the Battle of Shiloh.—In the [illegible]

"About six o'clock on the morning of the 7th of April, however, a hot fire of artillery and musketry [illegible] the enemy's position on our left centre, assured me of the junction of his forces, and soon the battle raged with a fury which satisfied me that I was attacked by a largely superior force. But from the onset our troops, notwithstanding their fatigue and losses from the battle of the day before, exhibited the most cheering veteran like steadiness. On the right and centre the enemy was repulsed in every attempt he made with his heavy column in that quarter of the field; on the left, however, and nearest to the point of arrival of his reinforcements, he drove forward line after line of his fresh troops, which were met with a resolution and courage of which our country may be proudly boastful. Again and again our troops were brought to the charge, invariably to win the position at issue, invariably to drive back their foe. But hour by hour thus opposed to an enemy constantly reinforced, our ranks were perceptibly thinned under the unceasing, withering fire of the enemy, and by twelve meridian eighteen hours of hard fighting had sensibly exhausted a large number, my last reserves had necessarily been disposed of, and the enemy was evidently receiving fresh reinforcements after each repulse: accordingly, about one P. M., I determined to withdraw from so unequal a contest, securing such of the results of the victory of the day before as was then practicable."

He sets down his loss at 10,000 men, of whom 1,800 were killed.

Evacuation of Corinth.—In this incomprehensible system of military events we are only enabled to judge of deeds by results. A battle only becomes respectable when we see an extended mortality list, and a campaign when we can traverse the occupied territory by leagues and furlongs. When the rebels left Yorktown we applauded it as a glorious triumph of military strategy, and justly so. We obtained command of the peninsula; we invested Richmond; no lives were lost. Genius triumphed over gunpowder. We see the same thing at Corinth. There was a terrible and fruitless battle; the enemy assumed a new position, fortified, and held it. Then came weeks of silence, skirmishes, and flags of truce, and a war with newspaper correspondents. The public began to be impatient; a great battle was anticipated—we might almost say desired—when the news comes that Corinth is evacuated. Without a blow, in the face of their braggadocio and bluster, after defiance and menace and preparation, the rebels have fallen back, and are now retreating through the Cotton States.

Honor to General Halleck! He has organized victory by combining the elements of victory; he has achieved a triumph undimmed by blood; and this is the highest glory of the soldier.

Slavery in Maryland.—The Annapolis Gazette says:

"We candidly confess that the conditions of slavery in Maryland is a serious and perplexing one. We think Congress has acted unwarrantably in abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia, because they have thus, indirectly, injured slavery here. But it is beyond dispute that this state of affairs could not have come about but for the insane efforts of the Secessionists. And it is equally beyond dispute that an exceedingly large majority of the slave owners in Maryland are Secessionists, and have aided the rebels in every way in their power. 'As ye sow, so shall ye reap.' Verily, by their aid to the rebels have they 'sown the wind,' and, in the destruction of the value of their slaves, are they 'reaping the whirlwind.'

"But, criminal as has been their course, no man in Maryland desires to see slave owners deprived of their property. If slavery must perish here, let it be with the least possible loss to the owners of slaves. In justice, they have forfeited all claim to remuneration. But our nature is, we hope, too magnanimous to punish them in such a way for their treason."

Fremont—On Saturday (24th) late in the day, General Fremont received a despatch from the Secretary of War to fall back with his entire command to the support of General Banks, and at daylight on Sunday the troops commenced breaking camp by regiments, and by twelve o'clock in the day that whole army of over twenty thousand men were on the move. Within the last twenty-four hours they had succeeded in getting full rations, something which they had not had for several days previous. They were eager for a fight, and the whole line sang exultant songs as they filed out into the main road.

New Orleans and Pensacola.—The Pensacola Advertiser states that the residents welcomed our troops with joy. General Arnold occupied the house of Major Chase, and Billy Wilson the residence of S. R. Mallory.

The New Orleans dates are to May 23d. General Shepley has assumed the duties of Mayor, Major Bell that of the Recorder of the city, and Captain Louis French has been appointed Chief of Police. These functionaries will take charge of the city until some loyal citizens shall be elected to fill these offices.

The Bank of Commerce had re-opened its doors, and commenced business, refusing the rebel shinplasters.

Foreign Summary.

The International Exhibition—The great exhibition, so far, has attracted only a moderate daily attendance. Most of the visitors are the holders of season tickets, and the class is found to be quite small who are willing to pay a dollar and a quarter for a single admission. Many, also, have been deterred on account of the unfinished state of some portions of the building, and the various annoyances and discomforts everywhere manifest, owing to the presence of workmen of all sorts, to say nothing of the rubbish scattered in every direction. It is evident that the whole of the first month will expire before the various departments are in proper order. The entire management is almost universally condemned—the Commissioners appear to have not only satisfied no one, but to have given special offence to almost everybody. There are a few very curious things to be seen, among the great mass of contributions, more or less interesting, probably to particular individuals, but really as a whole not generally attractive to the general visitor. One of these is a talking machine which comes from Austria. By a complicated series of machinery, not only are sounds elicited, but letters, words, and even sentences quite distinctly enunciated. Instruments of this sort have been before constructed, but have always been defective in some particulars. In this the previous difficulties have been overcome, especially in the pronunciation of "th" and the lightenings, and the machine talks in several different languages with perfect ease. It is, of course, very ingenious; but for all practical purposes it is intrinsically valueless.

One of the Court jewellers, in a space perhaps twelve feet square, exhibits jewels and bijouterie valued at nearly two millions of dollars. A single pair of brilliants is worth one hundred thousand dollars; a brooch, the centre of which is a magnificent emerald and the pendant an immense pearl, rates at fifty thousand; and there are various articles ranging from five to forty thousand dollars. This case, or stall, as well as another in which the famous Koh-i-noor diamond is shown, is constantly surrounded by a crowd, and a posse of police is always in attendance.

Mr. Babbage's calculating machine occupies a prominent position, but so far no one has been present to show its mode of operation. It may not be generally known that he has so far perfected it, after years of labor, that it now successfully works quadratures and calculates logarithms up to seven places of figures. One of the instruments is now in constant operation at Somerset House, working out annuity and other tables for the Registrar-General. The inventor is under the exclusive patronage of the Government, and still pursues his labors assiduously, in the hope of yet producing still more extensive results.

A collection of bullion and chemical scales attracts much attention. The former, when weighted with three thousand ounces, will turn with the addition of a single grain and the latter will readily move with the thousandth of a grain. Of course these are kept under glass cases, almost hermetically closed, as the weight of a single grain of dust will affect them, and two of these throw them out of order. They seem, certainly, to be the perfection of machinism.

In the French Department there is to be for, at least it is as yet uncured, although it has not yet been published, a [illegible] glass preserving very extraordinary properties and producing very curious effects. Standing before it at any hour in the [illegible] one sees his ordinary reflection within. Requesting a pace or two, he finds his image reversed; and, stepping back still further, he "counterfeit presentment" has disappeared from the glass, and he seems to see his second self standing midway between it and his real person. It is said this effect is so startling that only persons of the strongest nerves can witness the apparition unmoved, while many have fainted outright from terror. Inquirer.

PERRY & FITZGERALD'S
PROCESS FOR MAKING LIGHT, NUTRITIOUS, AND UNADULTERATED BREAD, WITHOUT FERMENTATION.

The new process of bread-making, patented by Perry & Fitzgerald, consumes all the obstacles which have hitherto rendered it impossible to manufacture perfectly pure, sweet, and palatable bread. The entire process is performed by mechanical means, and is eminently cleanly.

The process consists in mixing the flour in a closed vessel, and the application of pure carbonic gas under pressure, by which the dough mass is made thoroughly light and ready to be dis harged from the pans for baking in the brief space of Four or twenty minutes. The "change" is nearly All Sounds, and each machine completes the operation, in all its details, from the putting in of the flour to the discharging of the dough, in from twenty-five to forty minutes.

The invention of Perry & Fitzgerald effects a revolution in the preparation of bread, by establishing a system of wholesale means hitherto not subject to the vicissitudes and evils of farmentable, but exact and certain in its results. It becomes, by the substitution of mechanical for manual labor, and in the superior value of the article produced, it promises more profits upon a the capital employed. It becomes such employment of capital as well as the protection afforded by the patent, gives adequate security against competition. But whilst preventing undue competition all the above uses of the evils of a monopoly, because it leaves the consumer at all times in possession of his former means of supply, to be resorted to, should the monopoly become prejudicial.

The application of pure carbonic acid gas, under pressure, to a mechanically kneaded dough-mass, as in the invention of Perry & Fitzgerald, did not occur to Dr. Lee, though he seems to have had a clear foreshadowing of the importance of the artificial use of the gas, when he stated, they thereby that "if water highly impregnated with carbonic acid gas be used for kneading the dough, the resulting bread will be somewhat at spongy. Could a light article," he continues, "be produced in this way, then as the sugar would be made unnecessary, the bread would be so much the sweeter and more nourishing."

What, to Dr. Lee, was evidently a clearly comprehended theoretical truth, has been practically developed by the brilliant invention of Perry & Fitzgerald. Posterity will hold their names in grateful remembrance, as among the most eminent benefactors of mankind

ITS SUPERIORITY.—The superiority of unfermented bread to by no means new. Dr Cullen, who wrote more than seventy years ago, says:—

"In Scotland, also tenths of the lower class of people, and that is the greater part of the whole, live upon unfermented bread, & d per[illegible] lowness in other forms; and there are not a more healthy people anywhere to be found. In the course of fifty years that I have practised among them, I have had occasion to know this, and have hardly met with a disease, or any consequence that I could impute to the use of the unfermented nutriment."

At a later period, Professor Thompson, of Glasgow, in his work on the "Food of Animals," after alluding to the facts referred to above by Dr Cullen, & d other kindred to, observes:

"Such, then, being sufficient evidence in favor of the wholesomeness of unfermented bread, it becomes important to discover in what respects it differs from fermented bread. The result gained by this process (fermentation) may be considered to be merely the expansion of the particles of which the loaf is composed, so as to render the mass more readily divisible by the preparatory organs of digestion. But, as this object is gained at a sacrifice of the nutritive we can, it becomes a matter of interest to ascertain the amount of the loss sustained in the process."

The result of Professor Thompson's experiments showed a difference in favor of unfermented bread of nearly seven per cent. over that made by the ordinary process. In other words, there was a loss of over one-thirteenth of the nutritive properties of the flour, which, by the process of fermentation, was driven into the air and lost.

We now come to a more particular consideration of the superiority of the bread made without fermentation, or the use of chemical agents, over the bread made by those processes. Although, from what has already been said, this superiority appears in most vivid contrast, yet the public will be better satisfied to have the points stated specifically, for it only needs that the advantages secured by this method be clearly understood in order to its universal introduction in the manufacture of Bread

I. Its CLEANLINESS.—Instead of the dough being mixed by the naked hands or feet the bread, from the weighing of the flour to the completion of the baking, is not, and scarcely can be, touched by any one. "One decided advantage," says Dr Willard Parker, "is its entire cleanliness. Says he "the bakery of the process is not only purely scientific, but pre-eminently cleanly."

II. Its PRESERVATION OF ALL THE NUTRIENT PRINCIPLES OF THE FLOUR.—As the raising of the dough is by the mechanical introduction of pure carbonic acid gas, under pressure, in a closed vessel or receiver, it takes a perfect vehicle or sponge texture. All the constituents of the flour remain wholly unchanged, while the process of raising bread by fermentation inevitably marrhaus some of them, as has been already shown.

III. Its UNIFORM CHARACTER.—Bread made by the New Process is uniformly light, sweet, and nutritious. The conditions being simple, and not liable to variation, no failure can occur in always producing bread of the same quality. It retains its moisture much longer than fermented bread, and may be eaten warm with impunity. The process also insures a perfect freedom from all acidity even in the hottest weather. Says the Lond n Times:

"The object to be accomplished is the separation of the constituents of the flour as they are left by the mechanical and chemical processes, the resulting loaf being absolutely pure."

IV. Its WHOLESOMENESS.—Being free from the deleterious substances which are to be found in fermented bread, it is universally recommended by the faculty as the best food for the invalid, as being easy of digestion and agreeable to the most delicate stomach. "In dyspepsia," says Dr Dunglison, of the University of Pennsylvania, "it will be invaluable as they will be able to use it when the fermented manufactured bread has been found to have signally failed as an article of diet." Says the London Medical Times and Gazette:—

"Since the introduction of the new unfermented bread, there have already been received from members of the medical profession who have been induced to try their practice as well as from many families, many instances of the results not falling to satisfy that have followed its use in cases of deranged digestion and constipation. Many persons have been restored to their accustomed health after years of suffering and distress, by the simple use of the bread as a diet. Many cases have been reported by medical men of positive, in which certain distressing forms of dyspepsia, which had resisted [illegible] under every kind of treatment, have yielded as if by magic, almost immediately after adopting the use of the unfermented bread

"The beneficial effects of the new bread are attributable in two modes. The one is the absence of the prejudicial matters imparted to ordinary bread by the process of fermentation, and the other to the presence in the bread, unchanged, of those elements which are the essential agents of digestion and nutrition."

The most eminent members of the medical profession, both in Great Britain and in the United States, not only speak in the highest terms of the one with which it is digested, and of its rich, nourishing qualities, but especially of its peculiar relaxing, and wonderful keeping properties. The absence of acidity and other strong flavors, which, in a greater or less degree, are characteristic of fermented bread, renders the new bread peculiarly delicate to the taste.

V. Its RAPIDITY AND ECONOMY.—By the use of mechanical means, instead of manual labor, a barrel of flour is converted into baked loaves in forty-five minutes; whereas, by the ordinary process, four or five hours are occupied in the formation of the "sponge," and a further time in kneading, raising, and baking the dough.

The steadiness of the operation, it is said, saves a correspondent at the Journal of the Society of Arts, "renders it an article particularly suitable to be prepared and supplied by a public company. And as the new process requires less of the institution of manufactories, and the expenses of the machinery gives a comparative monopoly, the supply of bread is placed at once to the same category with gas, water, or other articles of prime necessity."

THE MYSTERY OF LIFE.

"A thoughtful and prescient poem, embodying reflections familiar to all" with a pure and high Psychology, contained by but few

So many years I've seen the sun,
And called these eyes and hands my own,
A thousand little acts I've done,
And circumstanced and manhood known
O what is Life! and this dull round
In treat why was a spirit sent?

So many airy draughts and lines,
And warm excursions of the mind,
Have filled my soul with great designs,
While practice grovelled far behind:
O what is Thought! and where withdraw
The glories which my fancy saw?

So many tender joys and woes
Have on my quivering soul had power;
Made life with brightening passions rose,
The boast or burden of their hour.
O what is all we feel! why feel
Those pains and pleasures o'er my head?

So many human souls divine,
By close intercourse displayed,
Some oft and freely mixed with mine,
In lasting bonds my heart have laid;
O what in Friendship? why impressed
On my weak, wretched, dying breast?

So many wondrous gleams of light,
And gentle ardors from above,
Have made me sit, like seraph bright,
Some moments on a throne of love:
O what in Virtue? why had I,
Who am so low, a taste so high?

Ere long when sovereign wisdom wills
My soul an unknown path shall tread,
And strangely leave, who strangely fills
This frame, and waft me to the dead:
O what is Death? 'tis Life's last stage,
Where vanities are vain no more;
Where all perceive their good obtain,
And Life is all returned again:
Where in their bright result shall rise
Thoughts, virtues, friendships, griefs and joys.

JOHN GAMBOLD, 1711-1771.

PARABLES IN HOUSEHOLD THINGS.

The sick girl lay in her shaded room in the street of a great city, and thought, "If I could only leave this prison of mine, and look at the beautiful world, I know I should grow happier and holier with every breath I drew. The thorny bud on the brown branches in spring would give me promise of resurrection; every butterfly would tell me of life through death; every flower would lift my heart to Him who cares for our little pleasures; every bubbling spring would murmur to me of the living water; every corn-field and garden would repeat the sacred parables. But here I can see nothing of God's making but the sky, and that is too high and far. I want some steps to take my feeble thoughts gently up to heaven. But around me are only manufactured things, which speak to me only of earth, and time, and man."

She leant back listlessly on her couch. Twilight came over the room, the glowing coals stirred quietly as they burnt away, and then it seemed as if an angel's hand touched her ears and opened them, for the dark and silent room became full of soft and soothing harmonies. All the mute and inanimate things about her found voices and spoke comfort to her heart.

Together they said—"It is true we are only manufactured things; but do not despise us for that! We came originally, as much as you yourself, or the flowers, and the trees, and the sunbeams, from one Divine Hand. It is only that we have been trained and moulded by human hands to be what we are. And just so are you; God creates you, but life moulds you. Your trial and your training come like ours, mostly through human hands, although you are destined for higher place and more blessed services. Listen to us, for we have messages for you, each one of us."

Then the stones from the wall said—"We come from the mountains far away, from the sides of the craggy hills. Fire and water worked on us for ages, but only made us crags. Human hands have made us into a dwelling where the children of your immortal race are born, and suffer, and rejoice, and find rest and shelter, and learn the lesson set them by our Maker and yours. But we have passed through much to fit us for this. Gunpowder has rent our very heart; pickaxes have cleaved and broken us, it seemed to us often without design or meaning, as we lay misshapen stones in the quarry; but gradually we were cut into blocks, and some of us were chiselled with finer instruments to a sharper edge. But we are complete now, and are in our places, and are of service. You are in the quarry still, and not complete, and therefore to you, as once to us, much is inexplicable. But you are destined for a higher building, and one day you will be placed in it by hands not human; a living stone in a heavenly temple."

Then the glass water-breaker said—"I was hard flint and waste sand on the desolate sea-shore once, but human hands gathered me, and fused me in furnaces heated seven times, and took me out to let me cool, and cast me in again, and shaped and cut me till at last I carry your water from the spring, and am pressed with many a thankful glance to your parched lips. I am complete. But you, when you have passed through your fires, will be a vessel of living water in a better hand, and bear many a draught of refreshment to weary and thirsty hearts."

"I also have been in many furnaces," said the china flower vase. "The colors you see often admire in me, have been burnt in slowly, stage by stage, every fresh color requiring a fresh fusing in the furnace. But you, when your trial is over, shall carry flowers of Paradise and leaves from the tree of life for the healing of the nations."

"And I," said the clock, "am scarcely an individual being. I am a little world in myself—a wondrous combination of mechanism. Each of my wheels and springs, with my unwearied pendulum, has its own history of fires and blows and ruthless instruments. None of us could form the slightest idea, as we lay dismembered in our various workshops, what we were designed for. Only in combination with every other part, has any part of us any meaning. You are not a little world like me, but a fragment of a great world. When all that belongs to you are gathered together, you will understand it all as we do now. And your voice will mark with joyous music the flight of blessed ages which only lead to others more and more blessed throughout eternity."

"And I," said the bronze pastille-burner, "came from ages of darkness in the depths of the earth. Human hands brought me to the light, moulded and sculptured me, and set me here to burn sweet perfumes, and diffuse fragrance around me. But you will be an incense-bearer in a Temple by and by, and from you shall stream a fragrance of love and praise acceptable to God."

"The quarries were my birthplace also," said the alabaster night-lamp; "but you shall be a light-bearer, when your training is complete, of a light which is life, and which has no need of night, like my dim flame, to make it visible."

"I," sang the guitar, with the wooden frame and metallic strings, "am a threefold being. I lived and waved in the forest once; and then the woodman's axe was laid on me, and I fell,—I fell, and the life departed from me; and from a living, life-bearing tree, I became mere inanimate timber. More blows, more tearing with saws, more sharp cutting with knife and chisel, and I became melodious again, simply from being united with these metallic strings, which never had life, but lay silent in mines, till the hand of man woke them into music. And thus together we respond to your gentle touch, and soothe for you many a lonely hour. Life from death, music through fires of trial; this is also your destiny. Hereafter every nerve of your tried and perfected being shall respond to the slightest touch of the Hand you love, filling heaven with happy music."

"As for me," said the pages of the hymn-book, "my discipline has, perhaps, been the severest of all. Once rustling in the flax-field, rejoicing in the dews and sunshine, I was torn, racked, twisted, and woven by many iron hands into linen. Then, for a time, treated carefully, decorated and treasured, and washed and perfumed, I was afterwards thrown scornfully away. Yet, even in that low estate, I found comfort. Even as a rag I bound up the wounds of suffering soldiers in a military hospital. But I was to sink lower yet. I was thrown into a mill, and pounded, crushed and torn, till I was a mere shapeless pulp. Yet from those depths my true life began. Process after process succeeded, till here, at last, I am to speak to you morning by morning. I hope you hear me. You, you also, one day, shall shine for the living epistle, proclaiming to angels and men for ever and ever such words as speak to you from my pages now!"

The sick girl smiled, and was comforted. "Yet," she said, "the fires are fierce, the blows are heavy, the trial is long. The end is, indeed, well worth them all; but sometimes the end seems distant."

"Yes," responded the hymn-book, "my history resembles yours in one happy feature more than that of any of us besides. For even in your days of training you are of service. You may clothe cold limbs, and bind up many wounds even now, as I did when I was a poor linen rag. And, more than that even now, in your time of trial, the ministries you are destined for at last may be begun. Even now you may be a living epistle, a book wherein many may read lessons of hope and patience, and sing praises, as they look on you, as you do when you look on me."

"Yes," responded the stones; "even now you are a living stone. The temple you are to form is building even now."

And the pastille burner:—"Even now your prayers and praises may rise like sweet incense."

And the water glass:—"Many a draught of living water may you carry, even now, in the dry and thirsty land, to hearts that need it."

And the night-lamp:—"Even now in the night, then, child of the day, aboddest light around thee—a little light, it may be, in a narrow circle, yet which, though thou mayest not know it, cheers and guides not a few now."

And the guitar:—"Many a strain of thankful song has come from the depths of your heart, even now, in these your days of trial, to blend with my harmonies, and to rest to regions which my poor metallic music can never reach!"

And all the mute things sang together—"We are complete and rejoice to serve you, vessels meet for your using. One day you also shall be perfected, a vessel meet for the Master's use. And then He will take you into His house, unto the temple which is a home and your home for ever. Like us, when you are perfected, you shall serve; but, unlike us, even whilst you are being perfected, you may serve!"

Then the sufferer turned over the leaves of another Book, and saw how the Master had written His parables, not in streams, and corn fields, and birds, and flowers, and fruitful earth, and starry sky alone, but in common household things, and common human ties. And henceforth, not nature only, but every-day cares, and duties, and relationships, and all things around her, became for her illuminated with the lessons of His love.

CHILDREN.

Whatever you wish your child to be, be it yourself. If you wish it to be happy, healthy, sober, truthful, affectionate, honest, and godly, be yourself all these. If you wish it to be lazy and sulky, and a liar, and a thief, and a drunkard, and a swearer, be yourself all these. As the old cock crows, the young cock learns. You will remember who said: "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." And you may, as a general rule, as soon expect to gather grapes from thorns, and figs from thistles, as get good, healthy, happy children from diseased, and lazy, and wicked parents. Let me put you in mind, seriously, of one thing you ought to get done to all your children, and that is, to have them vaccinated. The best time for this is two months after birth, but better late than never, and in these times you need never have any excuse for its not being done. You have only to take your children to the Old or the New Town Dispensaries. It is a real crime, I think, in parents to neglect this. It is cruel to their child, and it is a crime to the public. If every child in the world were vaccinated, which might be managed in a few years, that loathsome and deadly disease, the small pox, would disappear from the face of the earth; but many people are so stupid, and so lazy, and so prejudiced, as to neglect this plain duty, till they find to their cost it is too late. So promise me, all seriously in your hearts, to see to this if it is not done already, and to see to it immediately. Be always frank and open with your children. Make them trust you and tell you all their secrets. Make them feel at ease with you, and make free with them. There is no such good plaything for grown-up children like you and me, as weans, wee ones. It is wonderful what you can get them to do with a little coaxing and fun.

THE FAMILY AND REVIVALS

Many persons are forever running around for revivals, careless of home, neglectful of children, and seeking their own pleasurable excitement, frequently, in a kind of religious carnival. The regularity of the family, often, is almost lost in the tumultuous exhilarations of religious excitements. Now, any conception of religious culture and life that leaves the family out, or that is at the expense of the family, is fundamentally wrong, and in the end cannot but be mischievous. Social and general religious excitements have their benefits. The world could not get on without them. Man is a social being, religiously, as much as in other respects, and revivals of religion are normal. But, good as are religious excitements, they have evils and dangers, which must be watched against; and this is one of them: when they do not spring as the proper streams out of the family; or when they go forward only as church movements, and not as family movements. The divinity of revivals may be testified by their effect on the family. If they turn the hearts of the parents towards their children, and the hearts of the children towards their parents, they are of God. If they increase the love of the family; if they cause the tendrils of love to draw the members of the family closer and closer to each other; if under their influence blossoms and clusters of love hang in abundance on the family tree, then you may be sure that it is the true religion that is revived. But if the family has no blessing, and the dew is on the church, you may be in doubt whether it is a divine blessing, or any blessing at all. If religious excitements make home dull, and parental and filial duties and relations tame or tasteless, they may be suspected of being spurious, carnal, worldly.

H. Ward Beecher.

KITTY A KITTEN

"I wish I were a kitten," said Kitty one day, pouting over her book, "then I should not wear shoes, or learn spelling, or have to behave myself. I shouldn't be naughty and feel so sorry for it afterwards."

"That's because you have a soul," said Bridget.

"Then I don't want to have a soul," cried Kitty, hastily. "When you have a stomach-ache, do you want to get rid of your stomach, or the ache?" asked Bridget. "Why the ache, Bridget; what could I do without a stomach? Maybe I ate something to hurt me," said the child.

"Sure," said Bridget, "and when you feel a soul-ache, it shows you've been doin' wrong, and it hurts you; and it's that you want to get rid of, not your soul." Medicine won't cure that," said Kitty. "The right sort will," answered Bridget.—"What?" asked Kitty. "What do you and your ma do when you mistehave and do wrong?" asked Bridget. Kitty thought; then she said, "We go and tell Jesus, and we pray for his forgivness, and I ask his Holy Spirit to help me to do right, and to love to do right; but I don't always."

"And that's the reason the Lord's called the great Physhion," said Bridget, "'cause he doctors the soul. Scripture tells about it. And he has different sorts of medicine: sometimes 'tis forgivness; sometimes 'tis love; and sometimes stripes, accordin' as we need; and we feel so much better after it."

Kitty still looked pouty. "Well," she said, when she spoke again, "I wish I were a kitten. I'd be one this minute, if I could"—for this little child, like many older persons, thought more of escaping difficulties, than of overcoming them.

"Oh, well," said Kitty's mother, who sat sewing in the next room, and overheard the talk, "suppose you be one. You can give up all Kitty King's duties, and be a kitten." "And do nothing but play all day," cried Kitty, jumping up and clapping her hands. "Do nothing but what kittens do," said her mother. "Then I'll mew at this old Reader," cried she, throwing the book on the floor; "and you can't ask me to pick it up, Bridget, because I'm a kitten." "Sure," said Bridget, "and as your ma has no little girl now, maybe she won't want me to stay; for she did not hire me to take care of kittens, but to nurse children." "No," said mamma, "kittens take care of themselves."

Kitty looked sober; but presently she got down on the carpet, went about on all fours, and capered round as much like a kitten as could be. She mewed at Bridget; but Bridget not understanding cat-talk took no notice of her.

Not long after, a lady called on her mother to visit a beautiful picture of Jerusalem, and she put on her bonnet to go. "Mamma, you promised to let me go," cried Kitty jumping up; "I want to see where the Jews live." "I promised my own little girl to go," said mamma; "but she's gone. It would be foolish to take a kitten; it cannot understand the beautiful picture; very likely it would only think of catching its tail." Kitty laughed; but she saw that it was gave up her duties, she must be content to give up her privileges also.

At dinner no Kitty's chair was set at the table, or her plate or napkin. She followed her parents to the dinner-room, and, true to kittenhood, played around their feet under the table, and sometimes mewed to her papa. He stroked her hair, but said nothing, for kittens could not understand his talk. Kitty wondered if she were to have no dinner. Oh, yes; her mother directed Bridget to feed the kitten in the kitchen. How did Kitty like that? I do not know, or how she passed the afternoon, but at bedtime she wondered Bridget did not come to undress and wash her.

"Bridget," she at last said, "isn't it my bedtime?" "I don't know," answered Bridget, "kittens go to bed almost any time. They don't need any help, your mamma says, to go to bed with." Kitty looked almost ready to cry as she buried herself undressing and going to bed all by herself. But how could she go to sleep without her mother's sweet twilight talk and their evening prayers together? Kitty curled up on the bed, not like a happy little kitten, but a poor, unhappy little girl, as she was.

Presently she called out in a distressed tone, "Mamma, mamma," and her mother heard, and came to her little daughter's bedside: "Oh, mamma," she cried, "ain't you going to pray with me? I'm Kitty King again. I'd rather be Kitty King with a soul, than eight kittens without one. Mamma, I'd rather do things and learn, and be papa's companion, and have you talk with me about being like Jesus, and thank God for his goodness, and pray. I'd rather do hard things than play all the time. I'd rather mind everybody than have nobody to care for me. Oh, mamma, I'm your own Kitty King again; and, mamma, help me to be God's good child;" and she laid her curly head on her mother's shoulder, while the tears ran down her cheeks.

And the little girl learned that day what older people are so slow to learn, that change of condition brings no escape from trial, and that our true work is to master evils, rather than dodge them

DEEDS OF KINDNESS

Suppose the little cowslip
Should hide its golden cup,
And say, "I'm such a tiny flower,
I'd better not grow up:"
How many a weary traveller
Would miss its fragrant smell,
And many a child would sorry be,
To lose it from the dell.

Suppose the glistening dewdrop
Upon the grass should say,
"What can a little dewdrop do?
I'd better shrink away."
The blade on which it rested,
Before the day was done,
Without a drop to moisten it,
Would wither in the sun.

Suppose the little breeze,
Upon a summer's day,
Should think themselves too small to cool
The traveller on his way;
Who would not miss the smallest,
And softest ones that blow,
And think they made a great mistake,
If they were talking so?

How many deeds of kindness
A little child may do,
Although it has so little strength
And little wisdom too,
It wants a loving spirit
Much more than a strength, to prove
How many deeds a day it may do
For others by his love

JUST GOING TO

"Now, mother, isn't Hal too provoking! He promised to take me strawberrying with him, and now he's gone and left me," cried Jessie, winking back her tears.

"Our Hal broken his promise!" Her mother looked as if she could hardly believe it.

"Why so, mother, I suppose not, exactly. You see, he said I might go if I would be ready at two o'clock, and I was just going to put on my things, when he started off as hard as he could run. There he is now, way down the other side the Common!" she added with a little sob.

"And it is a quarter past two. Why didn't you get ready in time?"

"I didn't think it was so late. Besides, I was going as soon as I finished dolly's apron. But Hal said the rest were waiting, and he could not stay another minute."

"And you don't blame him, Jessie? He had no right to keep the other children waiting, any more than you had to keep him. I am sorry you have lost your afternoon's pleasure just because you were behind the time, but you can do nothing now but make the best of it, and learn that while you are 'just going,' your chance may be just gone."

Jessie, who had early learned that "it is of no use to cry for spilled milk," drew a deep sigh, and sat down to console herself with a "Lucy book."

By and by, her mother put down her work-basket and went out of the room, saying,

"Jessie dear, look after the baby, and don't let him go out of your sight."

"Yes, mother, I'll watch him. Here, Birdie, come see what Jessie has got!"

Baby took the china doll she gave him, tasted of its head, pounded the floor with it, shook it as a cat would a mouse, and then crept off on an exploring expedition. Presently Jessie heard a crash and a cry that made her heart stand still. She rushed into the next room, and there sat baby Dick on the floor, covered with bits of broken glass, and a little stream of blood running down his white forehead. He had pulled over a teapoy and broken a vase on his own head. His screams soon brought their mother, and while she was bathing the wound, Jessie stood by, saying,—

"I had missed him, and was just going after him, when I heard him cry. Poor little Dick!"

"If you had only gone, my daughter, instead of meaning to go," was the sober answer, "he would have been saved this sad cut."

When Jessie's mother went up to bed with her that night, she asked,—

"Has this been a pleasant day to my little girl?"

"No, mother, it has been the worst kind of a day. In the first place I was tardy at school this morning, and that put me out of humor for the whole forenoon. Then I couldn't go with Hal, and worst of all poor baby got hurt. Hasn't it been a day of misfortunes?"

"And every one of them has happened because you were 'just going to' do, instead of doing."

Jessie unlaced her boots in sober silence. At last she said, "But I never mean to be late."

"Of course you don't. But the mischief is, my dear child, that you feel as if it were all well enough as long as you are just going to do your duty. That is a great mistake; 'just going to' amounts to nothing. Do it. Don't stop to mean to do it;" and Mrs Richmond spoke so earnestly that Jessie looked up into her face and said,—

"Why, mother, what makes you care so much about it? Do you think I am so very bad?"

Her mother took her in her arms and answered. "I am sick at heart, Jessie, because I am afraid 'just going to' will spoil your whole life. It cheats you of your pleasures, and hinders you from your duties—and sometimes, Jessie, I am dreadfully afraid that when my darling comes to heaven's gate at last, and her Father asks, 'My child, did you give your heart to me down on the earth?' my poor child will have to say, 'O Lord, I always meant to;—I was just going to when the pale angel took me away.' Then he would have to say, 'Inasmuch as you did it not . . . depart!'"

The last words sank to a whisper, and Jessie felt hot tears dropping on her head.

She sank down on her knees and prayed earnestly,—

"O Lord Jesus, please cure me of my naughty fault. Make me do right the first minute, without waiting to be just going to. Dear Heavenly Father, take my heart now for Christ's sake. Amen."

TALKS ABOUT HEALTH.

By Dio Lewis, M. D.

OUR HAIR.

God covered the skull with hair. Some people shave it off. Mischievous practice. It exposes the brain. God covered a part of man's face with hair. Some people shave it off. Mischievous practice. It exposes the throat and lungs—the eyes, likewise, say wise physiologists.

Men become bald. Why? Because they wear close hats and caps! Women are never bald except by disease. They do not wear close hats and caps. Men never lose a hair below where the hat touches the head, not if they have been bald twenty years. The close cap holds the heat and perspiration. Thereby the hair glands become weak; the hair falls out. What will restore it? Nothing after the scalp becomes shiny. But if in process of falling out, or recently lost, the following is best: Wash the head freely with cold water once or twice a day. Wear a thoroughly ventilated hat. This is the best means to arrest the loss and restore what is susceptible of restoration.

What will beautify a woman's hair? Whatever will invigorate the hair glands! Oils and most other applications debilitate the hair glands. Cold water is best. At first the head looks like a witch, but after a few weeks it makes the hair luxuriant. By the persistent use of cold water I have seen this, poor hair become rich and curly. Only the part of the hair next the scalp should be wet. It must be thoroughly dried.

JUNE.

"Amid his subjects safe,
Slumbers the monarch swain; his careless arm
Thrown around his head, on downy moss sustained;
Here laid his scrip, with wholesome viands filled;
There, bleating every nook, his watchful dog.
Sight fly his slumbers, if perchance a flight
Of angry gad-flies fasten on the herd,
That startling scatters from the shallow brook,
In search of lavish stream."—THOMSON.

Of all months of the year, commend us to June for sight seeing and enjoyment. The poet's picture is in keeping with the month—the bank of a placid stream half guarded by woodland and half by meadow, the farmer taking his noon-day rest, the herd, the dog and the speckled trout that we only think of under the bank. Nature is never so fresh and beautiful as now; the leaves that have lingered so long in buds, have burst all their encasements and are expanded to their full size. How delicate and glossy they are! How rapidly the wood is making! You can almost see the process of growth. Beneath your feet, the grasses are springing in the greatest luxuriance, and some are already waving their little plumes and tassels in the air. The endless verdure is relieved by the blooming dandelions and buttercups.

And the mouths for which Nature has made ready this abundant supply, are here to be filled. The peaceful kine are grazing quietly in the meadow. They stop a moment to stare at you with their large liquid eyes, but only a moment, for they go to grass without any bidding, and will not rest until their maw is filled, and the noon-tide heat drives them to shelter. They make music as they move on slowly in column, plucking the grass like a band of reapers. When chewing the cud in the shade, with half-closed eyes, they make another familiar sound suggestive of the fullest animal content. It is an anodyne for fretted nerves, to see them thus tranquil.

Yonder, upon the distant hill-side, you see the flocks of sheep and the young cattle that do not need to be brought home at night. They are a beautiful sight, with their lambs which are now nearly large enough to be separated from their mothers. They are not the less beautiful in the eyes of the farmer that they are turning the grass into money with very little of his labor or supervision. It is one of the delights of June that the days are so clear that you can see distant objects with the greatest distinctness. The clouds are brought down to you, and the far off hills and mountains become your neighbors. But the creatures that help man are by no means confined to his domestic animals. Here in the orchard are a multitude of birds, robbins, blue birds, woodpeckers, sparrows, and wrens, all busy helping him. They make money without thinking of it. Watch that pair of robbins as they tend their young. First the mother comes with earth worms or caterpillars that she has plucked from the apple trees. The little birds know the sound of her wings, and their mouths open with a murmur of delight as soon as she alights upon the nest. The worms are dropped into their mouths. She is hardly gone before her mate comes with his bill full of insects, and thus the whole day is spent in ostering for their young. Hundreds of noxious insects are thus destroyed each day, by every family of robbins. The appetite of the young for animal food is astonishing. There seems to be no limit to their capacity to devour, save the capacity of the birds to bring supplies. Where insects are abundant, the growth of the young is very rapid; in a few weeks from hatching they are on the wing, apparently as large as old birds.

But we have some insects that hide under the bark, and burrow in the wood, doing their mischief out of sight of human eyes. The woodpecker is the artist to attend to these sly depredators. Murder in said to be one of the fine arts. It is, in the hands, or rather in the bill of the woodpecker. He perches in the top of an old tree, with his buoyant chivalric song, bidding all his fortified enemies "Wake up, Wake up," as if he would not surprise them, or take any advantage of their pusillanimity. He is in no hurry for slaughter. He hops along the limbs, scans the underside closely where the holes are most likely to be found. He knocks gently on the limb near the premises of the grub as if he expected a cordial invitation to come in. He stops to listen as if he would find out whether his gentle knock has waked up anybody. Possibly he hears a gnawing inside as if his neighbor was retreating at the back door. He work sharp now, and the bill is driven into the decayed wood with strokes so rapid that you cannot count them. The chips fly, and the artist wages war on over his work. At length he strikes his enemy, and with his long bill drags him from his hole and bears him off in triumph to the knot-hole cabin that you see in yonder tree. His young family have a feast, and another of the farmer's enemies is disposed of.

Listen again: here is another sound in the orchard. The apple trees are full of blossoms, and almost as full of bees, and the murmur of their myriad wings falls on the ear with a soothing melody. Their legs are covered with a yellow dust, [illegible] of the [illegible] and the hives is a busy highway for these little laborers. They preach industry to man while they fill their hives with honey. There is a charm in apple blossoms, and bee music is none the less pleasant to the farmer because they bring honey.

And now that we have taken it upon us to look up the humble helpers of the farm, we must say a good word in behalf of that much abused animal, the Mephitis Americana. You think at once of his bad name, of the eggs he has stolen, of the setting hens and turkeys he has broken up, of the roosts he has invaded, and the breezes he has polluted. Mr. Skunk is guilty of some misdemeanors, as all useful animals are. The cat catches your chickens, the dog runs mad and destroys man and beast with his virus, the horse runs away, smashes the carriage, and breaks your bones, the cow breaks down the shrubbery with her wicked horns, and the hogs get into the corn. They are all very good creatures in their place, not so good out of it. The same can be said of our hero. Possibly the hen roost might have been made proof against vermin, and the fowls might have been confined to a yard—to your profit as well as to the safety of the eggs. If the eggs were out of place, the wandering animal whose instinct prompts him to eat eggs, wherever he finds them, is hardly as much to blame as the owner of the eggs. The eggs which you leave at loose ends are only a fair compensation for his services. All summer long he roams your pastures at night, picking up beetles and grubs, poking with his nose potato hills where many worms are at work. He is after the grubs, not the tubers. He takes possession of the apartments of the woodchuck, who has quartered himself and family upon your clover field or garden, and makes short work with all the domestic arrangements of that unmitigated nuisance. With this white backed sentinel around, you can grow clover in peace, and the young turnips will flourish. Your beans will not be prematurely snapped, and your garden sauce will be safe from other vermin. The most careless observation of his habits shows that he lives almost exclusively upon insects. While you sleep he is busy doing your work, helping to destroy your enemies. In any fair account kept with him the balance must be struck in his favor. Thus among the animals we often find friends under the most unpromising appearances, and badly abused men are not unfrequently the benefactors of society.—American Agriculturist.

THE OPENING OF THE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

[The following are the words (by the Poet-Laureate) to be sung to Professor Bennett's music at the Opening of the International Exhibition at London:]

Uplift a thousand voices full and sweet,
In this wide hall, with earth's invention stor'd,
And praise th' invisible, universal Lord,
Who lets once more in peace the nations meet
Where Science, Art, and Labor have outpour'd
Their myriad horns of plenty at our feet.

Oh, silent father of our Kings to be,
Mourn'd in this golden hour of jubilee,
For this, for all, we weep our thanks to thee.

The world-compelling plan was thine,
And, lo! the long laborious mine
Of Palaces; lo! the giant aisles,
Rich in model and design;
Harvest-tool and husbandry,
Loom and wheel, and engin'ry,
Secrets of the sullen mine,
Steel and gold, and corn and wine,
Fabric rough, or Fairy fine,
Sunny tokens of the Line,
Polar marvels, and a feast
Of wonder, out of West and East,
And shapes and hues of Art divine!
All of beauty, all of use,
That one fair planet can produce,
Brought from under every star,
Blown from over every main,
And mint, as life is mixt with pain,
The works of peace with works of war.

And is the goal so far away?
Far, how far, no man can say;
Let us have our dream to-day.

Oh ye, the wise who think, the wise who reign,
From growing commerce loose her latest chain,
And let the fair white-winged peace-maker fly
To happy havens under all the sky,
And mix the seasons and the golden hours,
Till each man finds his own in all men's good,
And all men work in noble brotherhood,
Breaking their mailed fleets and armed towers,
And ruling by obeying nature's powers,
And gathering all the fruits of peace, and crowned with all her flowers.

THE IRVINGITES.

New York, May 23d, 1862.

MR. EDITOR:—Seeing a notice the other Sunday, of a sermon in the "Catholic Apostolic Church," I was attracted thither to add to my stock of knowledge. Your unsophisticated readers may not be aware that this is the same as the Irvingite church. The celebrated Edward Irving, formerly of the Scotch church, London, was the founder of the new sect. It was under his eccentric ministry the speaking in unknown tongues occurred, and was received by him as a return to apostolic times. This gifted man, laboring under a partial insanity, showed his piety at bottom, by his meekness in submitting to his inferiors. He never himself attained to the gift of tongues, nor any miraculous powers; and in these regards was content to sit with the humility of a child at the feet of others, for whom neither nature nor education had done as much as for himself. There are chapels in London, Edinburg, and Glasgow, capacious and elegant, and a small one here in New York, in Sixteenth street

The worship is a combination of Roman Catholicism, Episcopal liturgy, and Presbyterian preaching. I am not aware that any of the sect here lay claim to prophecy, or the gift of tongues. On the contrary, the preacher evidently had not the gift; for though he read from a manuscript, he read badly, boggling and stammering, and making mistakes, and going back to correct them. The sermon was announced at 4, P. M. The liturgical services followed.

The preacher was dressed in a white surplice, with a scarlet silk stole crossed over his breast. The under robe was of a purple or dark violet color. There were eight or nine assistants, all dressed in white surplices, some with black stoles, others with white ones, and some with crimson ribbons hanging from the left shoulder. The priest wore a long purple robe, and over it a white linen short gown, with a purple cape over his shoulders. It was his function to kneel before the altar, and to pronounce the benediction. The prayers were principally taken from the Episcopal liturgy, and intoned; the psalms were chanted responsively, assisted by a melodeon, which was played by a young lady. The congregation, which did not amount to more than fifty, joined in heartily.

The sermon was a much more sensible affair than might have been expected from such an amount of man-millinery. It was meant to show the tearing of the Apocalypse on our own times, and contained a great deal of criticism on the four and twenty elders, the four living creatures, the seven seals, &c. Their church, with its apostles and prophets, was the restoration of the Gospel economy. The discourse was entirely directed to the intellect. One commendable thing about it was refraining from fixing dates and epochs.

The service was concluded by chanting the "Magnificat," or the Virgin's song, the priest kneeling before the altar, from the tabernacle on which he brought out (only to look at) a goblet and decanter, containing the holy sacrament. I noticed, however, that the prayers alluded to it only as the "memorials," of the body and blood of Christ.—Standard and P. E.

AN IMPORTANT DECISION.

A decision of great importance to churches and congregations has just been rendered by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Thereby the party who separated from the First Dutch Reformed Church of the city of Philadelphia, although constituting the majority of the congregation, are debarred from the possession of the property and the minority, who adhered to the Dutch church, are placed in full possession of the books, papers, and property of the church, and recognised as the First Dutch Reformed church of the city of Philadelphia. The court held that the Trustees had no lawful right or authority to provide supplies, or a pastor, for the vacant pulpit of the church, or in any way to interfere as Trustees, therein; but that duty, according to the constitution of the Reformed Dutch church, belongs to the consistory of the particular church, a body which corresponds to the session in the Presbyterian churches. In the above case, the party which steadily opposed the settlement of the Rev. Mr. Smiley has been successful But the decision is of interest to all the Christian churches in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. It assures them that money contributed to build churches of any particular faith and order will not be lost by changes in sentiment and feeling in the congregation—that even majorities cannot take away church property from those who hold fast to the doctrines and worship which the church was founded to teach and observe.—Presbyterian.

LONG PRAYERS AND LITURGIES.

The Methodist says:—We repeat, it is hardly possible for physical human nature to endure this constrained position through the long prayers of some of our pulpits. In long liturgical services the difficulty is wisely averted by the brevity of the prayers and the frequent variation of the service by singing and reading. Liturgical congregations really have an advantage, in this respect, over some of our non-liturgical assemblies. In not a few of the latter the leading prayer becomes, itself, a sort of liturgical or stereotyped form, failing usually, however, of the fine old language of the Anglican Liturgy, and occupying half, or more than half the time, required by the latter, but this all in one wearisome intolerable "stretch"—a much more difficult thing to endure than the whole of the old "morning service," with its frequent variations of attitude and of sublime music and Scriptural lessons.

Virginia Desolate.—Nothing can be more pitiable than the present condition of the Old Dominion. nothing more hopeless than her prospects. In a very important sense, in the hour of the nation's peril, she held the place of arbiter. She was the acknowledged leader of the Southern States, and her suffrage, cast in favor of the national government, would have altogether prevented the war, or, at least, greatly reduced its dimensions. Providence had put this power in her hands, and the very Convention which committed her to rebellion had been sent to Richmond for the opposite purpose. The final accession feeling of the State capital, however, was too much for the Union majority. The result was, that Virginia, invited by Providence to become the pivot of peace, became and remains the pivot of war

She has received into her own bosom and has borne, from the beginning, the armies of both belligerents. The furore of the rebel confederacy, leaving their own territories, for the most part in peace, have swarmed upon her soil and devoured her substance. True, wherever these armies of terrible friends came, they brought with them a market for whatever the people of the State had to sell; but they bought for a currency to which nothing but the presence of the army could impart the character of money. If the money seemed too plenty to be good, if it was difficult to imagine what of value was represented by it on accept the steel of rebel bayonets, if persons hesitated to receive it in exchange for army supplies, their scruples were overruled by the gentle assurance that the reception of this money was the delicate test of loyalty to the Confederacy. This currency, which is only money upon the impossible condition of the success of the rebellion, is scattered all over the State, and in a few months is destined to be a more fearful cause of desolation than hail, or drought, or mildew The people have been bought out with it, they have nothing else left. They have been eaten out of house and home, and have their pockets full of this paper in return. In a little while the State will be swept of rebel soldiers, and the people will have plenty of money which will buy nothing. This very circumstance of their having converted their all into the worthless notes will make them more desperate in their treason. It will be hard to give up a cause that will convert this paper into money, or to accept one that turns this money into trash.—Methodist

Not Generally Known.—Martin Van Buren is the only man who held the office of President, Vice President, Minister to England, Governor of his own State, and member of both Houses of Congress.

Thomas H. Benton is the only man who has held a seat in the United States Senate for thirty consecutive years.

The only instance of father and son in the United States Senate at the same time, is that of Hon. Henry Dodge, Senator from Wisconsin, and his son, Augustus C. Dodge, Senator from Iowa.

Gen. Jas. Shields is the only man who ever represented two States in the United States Senate. At one time he was Senator from Illinois, and subsequently Senator from Minnesota.

John Quincy Adams held position under the Government during every administration from that of Washington to that of Polk—during which he died He had been Minister to England, member of both Houses of Congress, Secretary of State, and President of the United States. He died while a member of the House of Representatives

The only instance where three brothers occupied seats in the lower House at the same time, was when Elihu B. Washburne represented the First District in Illinois, Israel Washburne, Jr., the Third District in Maine, and Cadwallader Washburne the Third District in Wisconsin.

From General McClellan's Army.

Particulars of Sunday's Battle—Reconnaissance towards Richmond—The Advance within Four Miles of the Rebel Capital.

HEADQUARTERS, McCLELLAN'S } June 2

We have about 500 prisoners, among whom are several prominent officers.

On Sunday, as soon as it was daylight, the fight was renewed by General Sumner, with marked success, lasting nearly the whole day. The rebels were driven at every point with heavy loss.

The ground gained by General Sumner was about two and a half miles.

General Heintzleman, on Sunday morning, retook the ground lost the day before by General Casey

Our loss in the two days' engagements, in killed and wounded, will amount to about three thousand (3,000.) A great number are missing, who will probably return, having strayed away. All of the enemy's killed and most of his wounded fell into our hands.

The country in which the battle was fought is swampy, with thick underbrush. Most of the fighting was in the woods. Owing to the nature of the ground, very little artillery was used. Both balloons were up nearly all day.

Yesterday all the troops left Richmond and marched out in the direction of the battle-field.

The railroad has been of inestimable service to us, the cars running within a mile and a half of the battle-field, bringing forward ammunition and supplies. The wounded were immediately put aboard the cars and sent to the White House.

General McClellan arrived on the battle-field on Saturday evening, where he has remained ever since, directing all the movements in person. His presence among the troops had great effect.

Four separate charges with the bayonet were made during yesterday. In one instance the enemy were driven a mile, during which 173 were killed by the bayonet alone.

Lieutenant Worthington, an aid to General Joe Johnson, was taken prisoner. The enemy's dead, left on the field, amounted to twelve hundred (1,200.)

Colonel Hazard was wounded twice in the arm. Colonel Miller, of the Eighty first Pennsylvania, and Colonel Rippey, of Pittsburg, were killed. Colonel Campbell, of Pennsylvania, was wounded in the thigh.

The rebel officers, unable to rally their troops this morning, have retreated back towards Richmond.

Our men have moved forward to Fair Oak, five miles from the city.

Jeff. Davis and Gov. Letcher were both at the fight of yesterday.

The dead are now being gathered and buried.

Headquarters Army of Potomac, } Monday Evening, 9 P M

General Hooker made a reconnaissance to-day on the Williamsburg turnpike, to within four miles of Richmond, without meeting the enemy in force. Their pickets kept in sight, but retreated on his approach.

Every one feels sanguine of the fall of the rebel capital whenever our troops advance for an engagement The fight of Saturday and Sunday sealed the fate of that city, when the body of the rebel army assailed the troops on our left wing with the view of crushing it, but were defeated after two days hard fighting, and forced to retreat.

Among our wounded were Colonel Hunt, 22d New York, in the leg; Lieutenant Colonel Parry, of the 83th Pennsylvania, in the leg; and Col. Van Wyck, of the 10th Legion, slightly in the leg.

THE FRIGHTFUL MORTALITY

amongst our officers during the battle on Sunday, at the "Seven Pines," sufficiently attests the desperate character of the struggle. One regiment lost its Colonel, Lieutenant-Colonel, Major and Adjutant, nine Captains and eleven Lieutenants. We have reports of the death of six Colonels, and that six others are badly wounded. In regard to the confusion into which Gen. Casey's division was thrown, it appears that only one brigade behaved badly.

REAL BAYONET CHARGES.

The carnage by the bayonet upon this field probably exceeds anything recorded in history for many a score of years. The English could find but half a dozen men killed by the bayonet at Waterloo. The Excelsior Brigade and the Irish Brigade, both from New York, distinguished themselves greatly by the impetuosity of their onslaughts with this terrible weapon. They were maddened by the persistency with which the enemy sought every mover and shelter, from which they drove them repeatedly. At every charge the enemy reeled and fled before the unwavering line of flashing steel

ADDRESS OF GEN. M'CLELLAN TO HIS TROOPS.

Headquarters of Gen. McClellan's Army. } Tuesday Evening, June 3.

The following address was read to the army this evening at dress parade, and received with an outburst of vociferous cheering from every regiment

Headquarters of the Army of the Potomac, } Camp near New Bridge, June 2, 1862

Soldiers of the Army of the Potomac:

I have fulfilled at least a part of my promise to you. You are now face to face with the rebels, who are held at bay in front of the capital

The final and decisive battle is at hand. Unless you belie your past history, the result cannot be for a moment doubtful. If the troops who labored so faithfully and fought so gallantly as Yorktown, and who so bravely won the hard fights at Williamsburg, West Point, Hanover Court House, and Fair Oaks, now prove as worthy of their antecedents, the victory is surely ours.

The events of every day prove your superiority. Wherever you have met the enemy, you have beaten him. Wherever you have used the bayonet, he has given way in panic and disorder.

I ask of you now one last crowning effort. The enemy has staked his all on the issue of the coming battle. Let us meet him and crush him here in the centre of the rebellion.

Soldiers! I will be with you in this battle, and share its dangers with you. Our confidence in each other is now founded upon the past. Let us strike the blow which is to restore peace and union to this distracted land.

Upon your valor, discipline and mutual confidence, the result depends.

GEO. B. McCLELLAN, Major General Commanding

Headquarters of Gen. McClellan's Army, } Thursday Evening, June 5

The severe storm which set in on Tuesday afternoon lasted during the whole of yesterday The water in the Chickahominy rose to an unprecedented height. The railroad trains from White House to the late battle-field were detained for several hours, and the telegraph line was down in many places.

A contraband who left Richmond on Sunday night, states that all the carts, furniture cars, omnibuses and carriages to be found in that city, were impressed into the service for the purpose of carrying the dead and wounded from the battle-field, and that the Spotswood and Exchange Hotels, together with a number of public and private buildings, were turned into hospitals. All the information shows that the enemy suffered terribly.

The rebels opened with artillery, this morning, from five different points opposite New Bridge, with a view of preventing the reconstruction of the bridge. Three of our batteries opened on them, causing them to retreat after a hot fire of two hours

Our loss was one killed and two wounded

No further interference took place during the day

A heavy shower, which set in about dark, had the effect of again raising the water in the Chickahominy

Gen. Birney, of Philadelphia, was relieved of his command on the battle field by General Heintzelman, he having failed to bring his brigade into action when ordered on Saturday.

Reconnoissances made to-day show no material change in the enemy's position.

Further information received shows that our troops on Saturday and Sunday engaged six divisions, instead of four, making a force of seventy-five thousand rebels.

Glorious News from Gen Halleck's Department!—Washington, June 4.—The following despatch was received this afternoon at the War Department:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY OF THE MISSISSIPPI, June 4, 1862.

To Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War.

General Pope, with 40,000 men, is thirty miles south of Corinth, pushing the enemy hard.

He already reports 16,000 prisoners and deserters from the enemy, and 15,000 stand of arms captured.

Thousands of the enemy are throwing away their arms.

A farmer says that when Beauregard learned that Colonel Elliott had cut the railroad on his line of retreat, he became frantic, and told his men to save themselves the best they could.

We have captured nine locomotives, and a number of cars. One is already repaired, and is running today. Several more will be in running order in two or three days.

The result is all I could possibly desire.

H. W. HALLECK, Major General Commanding.

Particulars of the Pursuit.—A Fight Six Miles South of Corinth.—The Rebels Surrounded and Thousands Captured.—Chicago, June 4.—A special despatch from Cairo, says:

Immediately on the occupation of Corinth, our forces from General Pope's Division, were sent out in pursuit of that portion of the rebels that fled west ward

General Granger, in command of two regiments of cavalry, soon came in the rear of the enemy, six miles southwest of Corinth, and engaged him in a fight, in which he lost fifty men, but was afterwards reinforced, when the rebels were surrounded.

It is said that 5,000 or 10,000 have been captured.

A portion of the prisoners have reached Pittsburg Landing, en route to the Northern military prisons. At the last accounts, General Pope was nine miles southwest of Corinth, which point his whole corps had reached.

This is Great News from Corinth—Beauregard has at last been heard from. He has given the North a great deal of trouble lately, and we have felt much anxiety about his whereabouts and his condition. His mysterious retreat from Corinth is now explained. He fled from his intrenchments with a disheartened and demoralized army. According to General Halleck, we have captured ten thousand of his soldiers, fifteen thousand stand of arms, and immense quantities of commissary and quartermaster stores. We have broken the line of retreat, and now he flies down the Mississippi valley with a confused, disordered and panic-stricken mob. Such a retreat was never before known. All the splendor of the armies of "Corinth and Eikhora" vanishes before this shameful and inglorious fight. We cannot account for it except in attributing the result to the great genius of General Halleck, and the wonderful combination of his armies, which led to Beauregard's being overwhelmed, outgeneralled and outflanked. Results like these are rarely attained—and to attain them is to realize the highest glory of the soldier. We have all the fruits of a most substantial victory; we have shed no blood. The rebellion passes away from the Border States forever. Memphis soon must fall. Tennessee is wholly within the Union. The fate of Richmond is sealed. Virginia will resume her place in the Union, and before many weeks are over McClellan and Halleck may exchange a soldier's greeting in Montgomery.

From the Army of the Potomac.—Headquarters Gen McClellan's Army, June 6, 1862 - Two deserters, who came in this morning, state that General Johnson was seriously, if not mortally, wounded through the groin by a Minie ball during the late battle. General G W Smith is now in command of the rebel troops. Other information goes to corroborate the fact.

These deserters state that the rebel loss is estimated at ten thousand killed, wounded and missing. No material change has taken place in the position of the enemy.

A contraband has arrived who left Richmond on Tuesday evening. He represents things there as in a terrible state of confusion and uncertainty.

No troops are in the city, except those doing guard duty and tending to the sick and wounded, all being compelled to remain outside.

There were no signs of evacuation, but, on the contrary, everything goes to show a determined resistance on the part of the rebels.

The contraband states that during the fight of Sunday the house-tops, and all elevated positions, were covered with people to witness the battle, every one expecting to see our troops driven into the Chickahominy, but when they saw the Confederates running towards the city, the greatest consternation prevailed. Many of the inhabitants have crossed the James river, expecting the city to be occupied by our troops soon.

It is rumored that Gen. Magruder is going to resign, having become disgusted with the rebel military administration

We are informed that there are no troops between the Army of the Rappahannock and the Army of the Potomac, under command of General McClellan.

A flag of true came in to-day from General Huger, asking for the bodies of General Pettigrew and Colonels Davis, Lightfoot, Long and Britton, who were supposed to have been killed in the late battle.

Colonel Davis was the only one killed. Colonels Lightfoot and Long are prisoners, and Colonel Britton was wounded, as was also General Pettigrew. Colonel Davis' body will be returned.
